I have heard arguments and have carefully considered the evidence in the case. There can be no doubt that the plaintiff is a man whose word is not to be trusted at all. In his plaint, he prevaricates. In the original plaint, he stated that the girl's age was 18 at marriage and that she lived with him for a month after wedding. In his amended plaint, he repeats his other allegations but puts the girl's age at marriage of 14; and on the day after the presentation of that plaint, he stated orally that defendant No. 1 lived with him for six months after the marriage, which took place four years previously, and also six months during the past year. Now, it seems to me on reading the evidence that the marriage ceremony did undoubtedly take place; but I entirely disbelieve the evidence to the effect that the girl after that took up her abode with the plaintiff. The evidence of Jaimal, Lambardar, is very important. It appears quite certain from that evidence and from other indications in the case that immediately the marriage ceremonies had been performed, a question arose about payment of a sum of money and I am satisfied that because of this dispute, the girl, who is said to have been living with her husband, returned to her own home with her mother. This is a reasonable inference from the evidence of Jaimal, Lambardar, and it is expressly stated by Atru, Chowkidar, witness for the plaintiff. No doubt, there is some evidence of cohabitation, but I do not believe it at all. The girl herself denies the marriage and so does her mother. This, of course, is one of those foolish statements that people make in order to defeat the opposite party; and my opinion, therefore, is that the marriage took place but that no cohabitation followed.

It seems to me also that the girl must have been under the age of puberty at the time of marriage and that this in itself was the main reason why the girl did not accompany her husband to his house. Now, the girl having arrived at puberty, refuses to consummate the marriage. In these circumstances, this Court ordinarily allows the girl freedom of choice. It seems to me, therefore, that in the peculiar circumstances of the case, the plaintiff was not entitled to a decree at all.

For these reasons, I accept this appeal, set aside the decree given by the lower Appellate Court and dismiss the plaintiff's suit; but, in the circumstances, I direct that the parties do pay their own costs throughout.

Appeal accepted.

GERALD FRANK BRIERLY—RESPONDENT.

Consideration—Contract of management—No personal liability—Consideration for contract cannot be consideration for later pro-note.

One S. and the defendant obtained a manganese concession in Mysore and agreed to admit E. to a share of the profits arising therefrom. In consideration thereof, E. caused the plaintiff Company to undertake the management and development of the rights comprised in the said business and to finance the concern. The sums so advanced were to bear interest at 2 per cent. above the current Bank of Madras rate and were to be paid or deducted from the sale-proceeds of the ore as disposed of or shipped. The plaintiff Company were also entitled by way of remuneration to a commission. The Company found after some time that the mines were not working profitably and refused to make any further advance. E, who was really the plaintiff Company, represented to the defendant that he was bound to pay to the plaintiff Company a share of the monies alleged to be due to the Company and the defendant executed the suit promissory-note:

Held, (1) that there was no consideration for the promissory-note because under the agreement there was no personal liability on the part of the members to pay to the plaintiff Company the monies advanced by it;

(2) that the plaintiff Company did not make any advance on account of any request made by the defendant but only made an advance in consideration of the previous agreement and that the advance could not be treated as consideration for the promissory-note also.

Appeal from the judgment and decree of the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Wallis, dated the 27th day of September, 1910 in the Ordinary Original Civil Judicature of the High Court and made in Suit No. 66 of 1909:—The Anglo-Indian Trading Company Limited v. Gerald Frank Brierly, 8 Ind. Cas. 302; (1910) 1 M. W. N. 618; 9 M. L. T. 17.

Messrs. Short and Bewes, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The suit is brought by the plaintiff, the Anglo-Indian Trading Company, to recover a sum of money due on a promissory note. The defendant pleaded that there was no consideration. The admitted facts are these; one Mr. Subba Row and the defendant had obtained a manganese concession in Mysore and they agreed to admit Mr. W. J. Eales to a share of the profits arising from this concern. In consideration thereof, Mr. Eales caused the Anglo-Indian Trading Company to undertake the management and development of the rights comprised in the said license and to finance the concern. The Company agreed to advance the monies required from time to time for working, prospecting, mining and developing the lands comprised in that license and also all monies for kist and other purposes. They promised also to maintain proper books of account, and it was further stipulated in the agreement entered into between the Anglo-Indian Trading Company on the one hand and Subba Row, Brierly and Eales on the other, "that all sums so paid or advanced by the said Anglo-Indian Trading Company, Limited, as aforesaid, shall bear interest at 2 per cent. above the current Bank of Madras rate for the time being and shall be taken to account monthly and be paid or deducted from the sale-proceeds of the ores as disposed of or shipped. The said Anglo-Indian Trading Company, Limited, shall be entitled by way of remuneration for their services to a commission of one rupee per ton of ore despatched from the Thasarapalle Railway Station, and shall be paid immediately after shipment." The Company found, after working the mines for some time, that they were not profitable and, therefore, closed the concern and refused to make any further advance. Mr. Eales, who was really the Anglo-Indian Trading Company, represented to the defendant that he was bound to pay to the Anglo-Indian Trading Company a share of the monies alleged to be due to the Company by him and he accordingly executed the promissory-note on which the suit was now filed. Wallis, J., decided that the promissory-note had no consideration because, under the agreement, dated 17th February 1908, above referred to, there was no personal liability on the part of Subba Row, Brierly and Eales to pay to the plaintiff Company the monies advanced by them. He also held that the promissory-note cannot be treated in law as the consideration for the monies advanced by the plaintiffs because such monies were advanced really in consideration of the agreement of the 17th February 1903. On these grounds, he dismissed the suit.

On appeal, it is contended that the learned Judge is wrong on both these points. We are of opinion that the learned Judge is right. It was urged before us that the learned Judge has failed to consider the stipulation in Exhibit I, which is styled an indenture between Subba Row, Brierly and Eales that the management of the mining, etc., of the lands comprised in the license was to be in the hands of the Anglo-Indian Trading Company in accordance with the agreement, Exhibit A above referred to, and "That in the event of monies being advanced by the parties hereto or by any person or persons, company or companies on their behalf, the same shall be accounted for to or by the parties in the same proportion to which they are entitled to profits." Now, the Anglo-Indian Trading Company, the plaintiff, was not a party to this agreement, Exhibit I. The plaintiff is not bound by it and he cannot claim any rights under it. We may look at it, no doubt, to ascertain what the intention of the parties thereto was, but that intention had only reference to any mutual rights and obligations. Leaving this document, therefore, out of consideration, the intention of the parties as expressed in Exhibit A seems to be perfectly clear. The Anglo-Indian Trading Company had to find all the monies that were required and they were to take them back "from the sale-proceeds of the ores as disposed of or shipped and they were entitled to get a commission of one rupee per ton of ore despatched from the Railway Station. It seems to us quite clear that there was no intention to impose any personal liability on any of the parties and the probabilities also are in favour of that conclusion. Mr. Eales, besides being really the Anglo-Indian Trading Company, was also a partner with others, i.e., Subba Row and Brierly, and if there is no personal obligation imposed upon him, there is no reason to suppose that it was intended that the others were to be personally liable.

We agree with the learned Judge also in his decision that the Anglo-Indian Trading Company did not make any advance on account of any request made by the defendant and Subba Row. They made such advances in consideration of the agreement of the 17th February 1908. We agree with him, therefore, that it cannot be treated as consideration for this promissory-note.

For these reasons, we dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Hindu Law—Joint Mitakshara family—Conversion of one member to Christianity, effect of—Migration from Oudh to Bengal—Presumption of carrying succession laws—Conversion not to affect right of inheritance—Family ceases to be joint—Separation of one co-parcener—No presumption that others remain united—Strict proof.

When a person migrates from Oudh to Bengal, the presumption is that he carries with him the laws and customs as to succession and family relations prevailing in Oudh.

Parbati Kumari v. Jagadis Chunder, 29 C. 433; 29 I. A. 82 (P. C.); 4 Bom. L. R. 335; 6 C. W. N. 490, relied upon.

This presumption may be rebutted by proof that the family has adopted the law and usage of Bengal.

Surendra Nath v. Hiramanee, 12 M. I. A. 81; 1 B. L. R. (P.C.) 26; 10 W. R. (P.C.) 35; Govind Chandra v. Radha Kristo, 31 A. 477; 6 A. L. J. 591; 3 Ind. Cas. 533; and Jagannath v. Narayan, 34 B. 553; 12 Bom. L. R. 545; 7 Ind. Cas. 459, followed.

If one member of a joint Mitakshara family converted to Christianity, such conversion does not inflict on him forfeiture of rights or property or impair or affect in any way any right of inheritance. He retains his interest in the ancestral property. But the family ceases to be a joint Hindu Mitakshara family. He becomes, upon his conversion to Christianity, at once severed from the family, and the Hindu Law ceases to have any continuing obligatory force upon him. He continues to hold the property as joint owner.

There may be no presumption that when one coparcener separated from the others, the latter remained united; the separation of one may be a virtual separation of all, and, in this sense, where it is asserted that the remaining members remained united or agreed to re-unite, the fact has to be established from all the circumstances of the case.

JUDGMENT.--The subject-matter of this litigation is ancestral immoveable property, owned at one time by a Hindu family of which one Amrita Lal Pandey was the head. The father of Amrita Lal Pandey, originally resident in Oudh, in 1857, migrated to Bengal, where he continued to live with his family in the District of Bankura, and acquired the properties now in dispute which passed after his death to his son. Amrita Lal had eight sons, of whom two, the husbands of the eighth and ninth defendants, respectively, died in his life-time in 1880 and 1883. Three other sons, the first and second plaintiffs and the fifth defendant, embraced the Christian faith; the first plaintiff became a convert in 1890, the second plaintiff in 1896, and the fifth defendant in 1904. On the 19th March 1900, Amrita Lal transferred the disputed property for a sum of Rs. 2,000 to the first four defendants, and he was joined in the execution of the conveyance by three of his sons, the fifth, sixth and seventh defendants. Amrita Lal died on the 26th December 1900. The third plaintiff, one of the sons of Amrita Lal, attained majority in 1905. On the 19th March 1907, the plaintiffs, the three sons of Amrita Lal, who had not joined him in the conveyance and of whom two were Christian at the time of the transfer while the other was and is still a Hindu, commenced the present action for a declaration that the transfer was not operative against them in respect of a three-sevenths share of the property, and for recovery of possession and mesne profits. The plaintiffs founded their claim on the assumption that the transfer had been effected for the satisfaction of illegal and immoral debts of their father, which they would not otherwise be presumably liable to satisfy out of their share of the ancestral property. The purchasers defendants contested the claim and alleged that the plaintiffs, who had embraced Christianity, had lost all interest in the ancestral property, that the other plaintiff who was still a Hindu was liable to satisfy the debt, and that in any event his claim was barred by limitation as he had attained majority in 1902 and had failed to obtain cancellation of the conveyance within three years thereof. The Courts below have concurrently dismissed the suit. They have found that the debts satisfied by the consideration for the conveyance were neither illegal nor immoral, and that, consequently, the father could make a valid alienation of the ancestral property for the discharge of those debts. The plaintiffs have appealed to this Court and on their behalf the decision of the District Judge has been assailed on two grounds, namely, first, that the two plaintiffs, who had embraced Christianity during the life-time of their father, had, by reason of their conversion to the Christian faith, ceased to be members of a joint Hindu family and were, consequently, not liable to satisfy any debts incurred by their father; and, secondly, that the effect of the conversion of the first two plaintiffs to Christianity, was a complete dissolution of the family, and, that, from this point of view, it was not competent to Amrita Lal to alienate the share of the third plaintiff who did not join him in the conveyance and could not do so as he was an infant at the time. These positions have been controverted on behalf of the respondents as unsound in law, and it has further been suggested that the plaintiffs have sought to put forward a case inconsistent with that set out in the plaint, though it has not been disputed that it is in some measure conformable to the position taken up by the defendants in their written statement. Before we deal with the questions argued at the Bar, it is necessary to premise that the family must be taken, before the conversion of the first plaintiff to Christianity, to have been governed by the Mitakshara law. When the grandfather of the plaintiffs migrated from Oudh to Bengal, the presumption is that he carried with him the laws and customs as to succession and family relation prevailing in the Province from which he came: Parbati Kumari v. Jagadis Chunder (1). This presumption might have been, but has not been, rebutted by proof that the family has adopted the law and usage of the place to which it has migrated: Surendra Nath v. Hiramanee (2), Gobind Chandra v. Radha Kristo(3), Jagannath v. Narayan(4). We start, therefore, with the position that, in 1890, there was a Hindu family, consisting of Amrita Lal Pandey and his six sons, and owning immoveable property which had descended from the father of Amrita Lal. In 1890, one of the sons of Amrita Lal, the first plaintiff Kulada Prosad, became a convert to Christianity. What was the legal effect of this incident upon the family and upon the rights of Kulada Prosad himself? In so far as the latter question is concerned, it is clear that under the Caste Disabilities Removal Act (XXI of 1850), the conversion did not inflict on him forfeiture of rights or property or impair or affect in any way any right of inheritance. The inference is, therefore, irresistible that, notwithstanding his conversion, the first plaintiff retained his interest in the ancestral property. In so far as the question of the status of the family is concerned, it is equally indisputable that it ceased to be a joint Hindu Mitakshara family. This position has not been seriously controverted; but it has been ingeniously argued that, notwithstanding the conversion of one of the members to Christianity, they continued to hold the ancestral property subject to the operation of the rule of survivorship and of the principle which imposes a pious obligation on a Hindu son to pay his father's debts. This view, in our opinion, is opposed to the decision of the Judicial Committee in Abraham v. Abraham (5), where Lord Kingsdown, referring to the position of a member of a Hindu family who has become a convert to Christianity, observed as follows: "He becomes at once severed from the family and is regarded by them as an outcast. The tie which bound the family together is, so far as he is concerned, not only loosened but dissolved. The obligations consequent upon and connected with the tie must be dissolved with it. Parcenership may be put an end to by a severance effected by partition; it must equally be put an end to by severance which the Hindu Law recognises and creates. Upon the conversion of a Hindu to Christianity, the Hindu Law ceases to have any continuing obligatory force upon the convert. He may renounce the old law by which he was bound, as he has renounced his old religion, or, if he thinks fit, he may abide by the old law, notwithstanding he has renounced the old religion." Stress, however, has been laid by the respondents upon the concluding sentence of this passage, and it has been argued that a Hindu family converted to Christianity may continue to be joint even after conversion, and if the fact be established, effect will be given to it. In support of this position, reference has been made to Francis Ghosal v. Gabri Ghosal (6). This doctrine, even if it be assumed to be well founded, is of no assistance to the respondents; but it is worthy of note that there is divergence of judicial opinion on the subject: Tellis v. Saldanha (7). Here the whole family was not converted to Christianity, and this circumstance differentiates the present case from Jalbhai v. Louis Manoel (8) and Lastings v. Gonsalves (9). If all the members of the family had become Christians, the position might possibly have been supported that, notwithstanding conversion, they adhered to the old law, and that, consequently, the rights of co-parcenership were not affected by their renunciation of the old religion. In the present case, such a theory cannot possibly be maintained; one of the members renounced the old religion, the others continued their adherence to the ancestral faith. If the family is deemed to have continued as a joint family with right of survivorship among the coparceners, it could only have been by common consent of all the members; but there is no indication that the members of the family had, or indeed could have, any such intention. We must hold, then, that the first plaintiff, upon his conversion to Christianity, became at once severed from the family, and this view is supported by the cases of Govind

Krishna v. Abdul Quayyum (10) and Khunni Lall v. Gobind Krishna (11), where their Lordships of the Judicial Committee reversed the decision in Gobind Krishna v. Khunni Lall (12). In so far, therefore, as the first plaintiff is concerned, he is not bound by the conveyance of the 19th March 1900, and it is inoperative in respect of what was his share in ancestral property in 1890. His claim to recover possession thereof is also plainly not barred by limitation. By reason of his conversion, he ceased to be a member of the joint Hindu family, but thenceforward he continued to hold the property as joint owner. There is no evidence of his exclusion or assertion of hostile title against him, such as is essential to constitute adverse possession between co-owners, Jogendra Nath v. Baldeo Das (13), before the conveyance of the 19th March 1900, when his father professed to deal with the property, though he was not competent to do so under the law. No question of limitation, therefore, arises, as the suit has been commenced within twelve years from the date of the conveyance The first plaintiff is thus entitled to recover possession of an one seventh share of the property on the basis that in 1890, upon the dissolution of the family which consisted at the time of Amrita Lal and his six sons, the plaintiff became entitled to such share.

We next proceed to consider the case of the second plaintiff who became a convert to Christianity in 1896. It has been contended on behalf of the appellant that when the first plaintiff became a convert in 1890, the legal effect was not merely his severance from the rest of the family but a complete dissolution of the entire family, and that from that time onwards, all the members must be taken in law to have been no longer members of the joint family. In support of this proposition, reference has been made to the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the cases of Ram Pershad v. Lakhpati Koer (14), Bala Bux v. Rukhmabai (15), and Balkishen v. Ram Narain (16). These cases are, in our opinion, distinguishable and are of no assistance to the appellants. No doubt, there may be no presumption that when one co-parcener separates from the others, the latter remain united ; the separation of one may be a virtual separation of all, and, in this sense, where it is asserted that the remaining members remained united or agreed to re-unite, the fact has to be established from all the circumstances of the case. In the case before us, the inference is irresistible that after the conversion of the first plaintiff to Christianity in 1890, the remaining members continued to form a joint Hindu family. In 1896, therefore, when the second plaintiff Gopeshwar embraced Christianity, he ceased to be a member of the joint family, and it became thereafter incompetent to his father to alienate his one-seventh share by the conveyance of the 19th March 1900. The second plaintiff is thus not bound by that conveyance, and, so far as he is concerned, no question of limitation arises, because his severance from the family took place within twelve years of the commencement of the suit. But a question of considerable nicety arises as to the terms, if any, subject to which he should be allowed to recover his share of the property. The debts, for the satisfaction whereof the conveyance was executed, were in part incurred on the 18th March 1892, and 3rd August 1895, under mortgage-bonds executed by his father Amrita Lal. When in 1896 he became a convert to Christianity, he was liable to satisfy these debts, some of which in fact were charged upon the ancestral property. Consequently, he may, in our opinion, be justly called upon to bear a share of these debts. Reliance, however, has been placed by the appellants upon the cases of Krishnasami v. Ramasami (17) and Rathna v. Aiyanachariar (18), to show that it is not open to a Hindu father to deal with the property of his divided son so as to bind the latter, even though it be in respect of an antecedent debt. This doctrine, if it be assumed to be well founded, is, as is explained in the first of the cases mentioned, subject to the important qualification that the severance had not been made with a view to defraud or delay creditors. It is further worthy of note that the case of Krishnasami v. Ramasami (17) was distinguished in Ramachandra v. Kondayya (19). In the case before us, we are clearly of opinion that the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to recover his one-seventh share of the property except upon payment of a proportionate share of the debts due under the bonds of the 18th March 1892 and 3rd August 1895 and of other debts which could be recovered by sale of his share of the ancestral property at the time of his conversion in 1896. This amount we have approximately determined to be Rs. 210. The second plaintiff is entitled to a decree on these terms.

We have finally to consider the case of the third plaintiff. He is plainly not entitled to any assistance from the Court. The theory that in 1890 or 1896, there was a complete disruption of the family and each member continued thereafter to live as a separate unit, has already been found unsustainable. Amrita Lal, therefore, was competent in 1900 to alienate the ancestral property in his hands, not merely in respect of his own interest but also that of his sons other than the first two plaintiffs. The third plaintiff must, consequently, be deemed bound by the conveyance of 1900.

It is worthy of note that an objection as to misjoinder of causes of action might possibly have been taken in the Court of first instance, if the case had been presented in that Court from the point of view developed here. No such objection, however, was taken, and it is obvious that the parties have not been prejudiced by the frame of the suit; consequently, as explained in the case of Sarala Sundari v. Srada Prasad (20), effect could not be given to the objection of misjoinder even if it had been urged before us.

The result is that this appeal is allowed and the decrees of the Courts below discharged. The first plaintiff will have a decree for possession of one-seventh share of the disputed property with mesne profits only from the date of the suit, the amount to be determined by a supplementary proceeding in the Court of first instance. The second plaintiff will similarly have a decree for one-seventh share of the property with mesne profits from the date of the suit; but, in his case, the amount of mesne profits will be reduced by Rs. 210 which, we have held, is payable by him to the contesting defendants. The claim of the third plaintiff will stand dismissed. Under the circumstances, we direct all the parties to bear their own costs of this litigation in all the Courts.

Appeal allowed.

JUDGMENT.

APPEAL No. 215 OF 1907 AND CIVIL MISCELLANEOUS PETITION No. 519 OF 1909.—The principal ground on which the appellant asks us to appoint a Receiver in this case is the gift of Rs. 10,000 by the 1st defendant, the widow in possession, to the 2nd defendant, her mother-in-law. We are, however, of opinion that, in the circumstances in which that gift was made, we ought not to consider it a ground for depriving the first defendant of the control of the securities and investment which she inherited from her husband. We agree with the Subordinate Judge that she made the gift under pressure as the then best apparent way of securing possession of the documents, many of them unregistered, which formed a considerable part of the estate. These documents were, it is clear, in the possession of the 2nd defendant and her son-in-law V. Ramaswami Iyer with or without the knowledge of the 1st defendant's relations. Exhibit M indicates that on the 11th of August, the 1st defendant knew that the 2nd defendant or Ramaswami Iyer or both were attempting to collect outstandings and shortly afterwards, on 17th August, the complaint of theft of documents was prepared. Whether that complaint was borne out or false, that is to say, whether or not Ramaswami Iyer or 2nd defendant had taken possession of the documents with the knowledge of the first defendant and her father, or, as the 1st defendant alleges, without their knowledge, its principal aim and object was the recovery of the documents which the 2nd defendant and her son-in-law were holding, apparently, in the hope of securing a satisfactory provision for the 2nd defendant and effecting the adoption by the 1st defendant of the plaintiff's son, an adoption on which the evidence indicates the 2nd defendant had set her heart. It is necessary to examine the evidence of the negotiations which followed immediately on the threat of criminal proceedings. The 2nd defendant's son-in-law in the end agreed to restore the documents, if some land and Rs. 10,000 were provided for the 2nd defendant and the idea of the adoption appears to have been dropped at any rate for the time. The Subordinate Judge was justified on this evidence in coming to the conclusion that the payment of Rs. 10,000 or the agreement to pay it—for the 1st defendant afterwards tried to stop payment (Exhibit D) but failed—was not an act involving a disqualification for the management of the estate. The 1st defendant was at the time 19 years of age and her father and brother-in-law made an arrangement which at the time, no doubt, seemed forced upon them and possibly was better than leaving the documents in the hands of the 2nd defendant and her son-in-law. Of the other grounds dealt with by the Subordinate Judge, only one, the sale of paddy, was touched on in the argument, and we are not satisfied that the sales of paddy have not been properly accounted for. Mr. Ramachandra Iyer strongly urged on us that a Receiver ought to be appointed because the first defendant's brother-in-law who was managing her affairs did not produce, till a late stage of the suit, the documents and accounts which would show the extent of outstanding debts due to the estate. This, he urged, showed that the estate is not being honestly managed and he pointed to the difference between the estimate of outstandings given in the written statement (Rs. 45,000) and that given by the witnesses at different times; he also drew our attention to a list made by himself from the accounts and documents in the suit which showed that the amount should be about Rs. 67,000 and claimed that these discrepancies are indications of dishonesty on the part of the 1st defendant's agent. This part of the case, so far as it rests on the alleged understatement of assets in the written statement and oral evidence, does not appear to have been pressed upon the Subordinate Judge, as it has now been put before us, and we do not think we can satisfactorily deal with it. On the evidence before the Subordinate Judge of facts as they stood at the date of the plaint, we should not be disposed to hold that any case for a Receiver has been made out, or that the amount of outstandings was deliberately suppressed or understated; and, so far as the case is based on allegations of misconduct, evidenced by acts during the pendency of the suit and subsequent to its disposal during the pendency of the appeal, we do not think it desirable now to deal with any material which was not before the Subordinate Judge ; and we do not take any evidence of such acts into consideration in disposing of the appeal or express opinion as to their effect.

The evidence contains in different places various different estimates by different people: it is not said that any documents have been suppressed or that the list made out now by Mr. Ramachandra Iyer is not exhaustive. In these circumstances, we do not think the late production of the accounts and documents affords sufficient evidence of dishonest dealing with the estate to warrant our taking the management out of the hands of the widow.

There is not sufficient ground for appointing Receiver and we dismiss the appeal and the petition.

There will be no order as to costs.

APPEAL No. 22 OF 1908.—The appeal attacks two declarations made in the decree of the Subordinate Judge: (1) a declaration that "the plaintiff is the next reversionary heir of the deceased Ramayyer" and (2) a declaration that "the arrangement to pay Rs. 10,000 to the 2nd defendant by the 1st defendant is not binding on the plaintiff. As to the first, we think it may remain in the decree. The question whether the plaintiff was entitled to sue as next reversionary heir of Ramayyar was fought out in the suit and much evidence taken: the Subordinate Judge decided it on the evidence and though the declaration asked for in the plaint was not essential and he might have dismissed the suit, yet the peculiar circumstances of this class of suits seem to make it not undesirable that it should remain to prevent further litigation on the question between the plaintiff and the 1st defendant, should the former find it necessary to attack again the latter's management of the estate. The 2nd declaration was not asked for and appears to be of no practical value; it may be struck out.

The decree of the Subordinate Judge will be modified.

There will be no order as to costs.

Guardian ad litem—Non-appearance of proposed guardian—Plaintiff's duty to ask Court to appoint guardian—Decree against minor not represented—Decree null and void—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 90—Personal decree against mortgagor—Essential elements—Second personal decree not to be made—Mortgage decree for sale and also personal decree—Not in conformity with Act, yet binding between parties.

Where the proposed guardian of a minor defendant does not enter appearance, the plaintiff ought to ask the Court to appoint one of its officers as guardian ad litem. If this is not done and the minor is wholly unrepresented, a decree made against him is absolutely null and void.

Narsingh Narain v. Sheikh Jahi Mistry, 13 Ind. Cas. 414; 15 C. L. J. 3, relied upon.

Three essential elements must be established before a decree under section 90 of the Transfer of Property Act can be obtained; namely, first, that though there has been a decree for sale and the mortgaged property has been exhausted thereunder, the sale-proceeds have proved insufficient to pay the amount due to the plaintiff; secondly, that the balance is legally recoverable from the mortgagor otherwise than out of the property sold, and, thirdly, that a personal decree has not previously been made.

Purna Chandra v. Radha Nath, 33 C. 867; 4 C. L. J. 141, relied upon.

If the decree-holder has obtained a personal decree against the judgment-debtor, he cannot subsequently invite the Court to repeat the operation already performed and thus obtain a second personal decree against the mortgagor.

Dina Nath v. Bejoy Krishna, 7 C. W. N. 744 and Sadho Singh v. Maharaja of Benares, 29 A. 12; 3 A. L. J. 606; A. W. N. (1906), 251, followed.

A mortgage-decree, which is not merely the usual decree for sale but also a personal decree against the defendant mortgagor in the event of non-satisfaction of the mortgage dues by sale of the mortgaged properties, is not in strict conformity with the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act.

Lal Behary v. Habibar Rahman, 26 C. 166; 3 C. W. N. 8; Raja Ram Ranjina v. Indra Narayan, 33 C. 990; 10 C. W. N. 862; Damodara v. Vyanku, 31 B. 244; 8 Bom. L. But such a decree is a good and valid decree as between the parties thereto.

Bechu Singh v. Bichharam Sahu, 1 Ind. Cas. 677; 10 C. L. J. 91, relied upon.

DINABANDHU NANDI v. MASHUDA KHATUN.

And the decree-holder, who has obtained that decree and has executed it, cannot be permitted to turn round and contend that the decree is inoperative and ask for a second personal decree against the mortgagor.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal on behalf of the plaintiff against a decree in a mortgage suit whereby a decree previously made therein under section 90 of the Transfer of Property Act has been discharged.

The plaintiff sued to enforce a mortgage security and obtained a decree on the 28th January 1897. This was not merely the usual decree for sale but also a personal decree against the defendant-mortgagor in the event of non-satisfaction of the mortgage dues by sale of the mortgage properties. That this decree was not in strict conformity with the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act is clear from a long series of judicial decisions: Lal Behary v. Habibur Rahman(1), Raja Ram Ranjin v. Indra Narayan (2), Damodara v. Vyanku (3), Badri Das v. Inayat Khan (4) and Abbakke v. Krishnayya (5). The decree, for sale, was, however, repeatedly executed, and the mortgage properties were exhausted. The decree-holder then proceeded, in one instance at least, to execute the personal decree, apparently without objection on the part of the mortgagor judgment-debtor. Thereafter, the judgment-debtor died. For some unexplained reason, the decree-holder did not take any further steps to execute the decree he held; but at a time when an application for execution of that decree would have been successfully met by the plea of limitation, he applied under section 90 of the Transfer of Property Act for a personal decree against the infant representatives of the judgment-debtor, then living under the protection of their maternal aunt. It is a matter for controversy between the parties, whether notice of this application was duly served upon the infants and their proposed guardian as it ought to have been served, on the principle explained in Abdul Sattar v. Satya Bhushan Das (6). The Subordinate Judge has found that the story of service of notice is an invention; but it is not necessary for our present purpose to pronounce any opinion upon that question, because even if we assume that the notice was duly served, it is obvious that the proceedings under section 90 were wholly infructuous as against the infants. The proposed guardian did not enter appearance, and did not accept the office of guardian. The result was that the infants, even if it be assumed that they were duly served, were not represented at the hearing, yet a decree under section 90 was made against them. They subsequently applied to the Court to cancel this decree as improperly made; this application was granted, and the decree was discharged. We are now invited to hold that the decree ought not to have been set aside. It is impossible, in our opinion, to accede to this contention. No effective steps were taken for the representation of the infants in the proceeding under section 90, which was essentially a proceeding in a pending suit for a supplementary decree. Purna Chandra v. Radha Nath (7), Rahmat Karim v. Abdul Karaim (8). Where the proposed guardian did not enter appearance, the Court ought to have been asked by the plaintiff to appoint one of its officers as the guardian ad litem of the infants. This was not done and the infants were wholly unrepresented at the hearing of the application. That a decree, made under these circumstances, is absolutely null and void, in so far as the infants are concerned, is clear from the case of Narsingh Narain v. Sheikh Jahi Mistry (9), where the earlier decisions on the point will be found analyzed and reviewed. This decree, which does not bind the infants and cannot be executed against them, has, consequently, been very properly discharged. This conclusion is sufficient for the disposal of the appeal. But, if the appeal be dismissed on this ground alone, the decree-holder will still be free to revive his application under section 90 of the Transfer of Property Act and proceed with it after he has taken steps for the proper representation of the infants. We are of opinion, however, that this litigation should not be further protracted, and we, therefore, proceed to examine the grounds mentioned in the judgment of the Subordinate Judge.

It has been argued on behalf of the decree-holder that as this mortgage-decree was not in conformity with the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act, it is open to him to repudiate that decree and to ask for a personal decree against the judgment-debtor or his representatives in terms of section 90. This position is clearly untenable. The original decree, though not strictly in conformity with the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act, is a good and valid decree as between the parties thereto: Bechu Singh v. Bichharam Sahu (10). At any rate, the decree-holder who has obtained that decree and has executed it, cannot now be permitted to turn round and contend that the decree is inoperative. It is further clear that the decree under section 90 of the Transfer of Property Act cannot be made in the present case. As was pointed out in the case of Purna Chandra v. Radha Nath (7), three essential elements must be established before a decree under section 90 can be obtained, namely, first, that though there has been a decree for sale and the mortgaged property has been exhausted thereunder, the sale-proceeds have proved insufficient to pay the amount due to the plaintiff; secondly, that the balance is legally recoverable from the mortgagor otherwise than out of the property sold; and, thirdly, that a personal decree has not previously been made. If the decree-holder has obtained a personal decree against the judgment-debtor, he cannot subsequently invite the Court to repeat the operation already performed and thus obtain a second personal decree against the mortgagor: Dina Nath v. Bejoy Krishna (11), Sadho Singh v. Maharaja of Benares (12). In this view also, the decree under section 90, which was made notwithstanding the personal relief granted by the original decree, has been rightly set aside.

(11) 7 C. W. N. 744.
(12) 29 A. 12; 3 A. L. J. 606; A. W. N. (1906) 251.

The result is that the decree of the lower Court is affirmed and this appeal dismissed with costs.

It is conceded that this order will govern R. A. No. 352-2 of 1909, which is accordingly dismissed with costs.

As there was a consolidation order, there will be one hearing fee in the two Appeals Nos. 352-1 and 352-2.

The Appeal No. 368 of 1909 against the order in proceedings in execution of the decree under section 90, necessarily fails and is dismissed with costs. We assess the hearing fee at two gold mohurs.

Usufructuary mortgage—Lease—Subsequent execution of mulgeni lease to stranger—No change of character as lessee—Lessor entitled to possession—Merger.

Sundara Aiyar, J.—Where, at the time of the execution of a usufructuary mortgage, the mortgagor takes a lease from the mortgagee of the mortgaged properties, the position of the mortgagor is that of a tenant of the mortgagee and the value of the possession is not changed, till the mortgage is redeemed, by the execution of a mulgeni lease or by the assertion of any mulgeni right in himself.

Second appeal against the decree of the District Court of South Canara, in Appeal Suit No. 329 of 1909, presented against that of the Court of the District Munsif of Udipi, in Original Suit No. 202 of 1908.

Mr. K. Ramanatha Shenai, for the Appellant.

Mr. K. Y. Adiga, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

SUNDARA AIYAR, J.—There is no ground for interference in this second appeal. The members of the Kini family gave a mortgage to the plaintiff in 1860 and took a lease from him of the mortgaged lands. Their possession, therefore, was that of tenants under the plaintiff. It was not shown that that possession came to a legal termination. Neither the execution of the mulgeni lease to Rahman nor the assertion of mulgeni right in Narayana Kini subsequently would have the result of changing the nature of the possession originally had in 1860 as lessees. Whether, therefore, the execution of the mulgeni has been properly proved or not, whether the mulgeni was valid or not, and whether it is a mulgeni lease that now subsists after the partition in the family of the Kinis and the allotment of the lands at that partition to persons, who subsequently sold the lands to others from whom the plaintiff derived his title, it is clear that until the mortgage is redeemed, the plaintiff is entitled to recover on the tenancy which came into existence at the time of the mortgage. The plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to recover possession. The District Judge has not recorded a finding on the question of notice. Whether that question was argued before him does not appear, but the Munsif's judgment on the point is obviously right. It is quite immaterial that the plaintiff, at the time of the first notice, Exhibit I, had not purchased the equity of redemption in a portion of the land. His right to give notice was as the lessor under the lease which was executed at the time of the mortgage. The second appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—I am of opinion that the District Judge finds as a fact that the alleged mulgeni lease to Rahman is a myth. Even if his finding is wrong, and even taking it that there was a mulgeni lease to Rahman created by the Kinis, that mulgeni lease right, as it was transferred to Narayana Kini in 1878, when Narayana Kini and his brothers (the then heads of the Kini family) were undivided in interest, ceased to exist by merging in their own mulgeni right and this explains why Narayana Kini hypothecated the land itself under Exhibit III and not merely a mulgeni right in the land. When, therefore, at the partition of 1881, the property fell to the share of the plaintiff's vendor's husband, plaintiff's vendor's husband got title to the property itself subject only to the original usufructuary mortgage right in plaintiff's favour and not subject to the mulgeni right in any body else. No mulgeni right in any other person, therefore, existed at that time. No such right came into existence afterwards. In this view, the second appeal must be and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal on behalf of the tenants defendants in a proceeding under section 105 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. After the final publication of the Record of Rights, in which the tenants were entered as occupancy-raiyats, the plaintiff landlord applied under section 105 for settlement of fair and equitable rents. The defendants resisted the claim principally on the ground that they held at fixed-rates of rent and their rent was, consequently, not liable to enhancement. This objection has been overruled by the Courts below and a decree made in favour of the plaintiff. In this appeal that decree has been assailed substantially on two grounds; namely, first, that the proceeding was not maintainable under section 105 of the Bengal Tenancy Act and that the proper remedy of the landlord was by way of a suit for enhancement of rent under section 30 of the Bengal Tenancy Act; and secondly, that the decision of the Settlement Officer, confirmed on appeal by the Special Judge, is based on evidence inadmissible in law.

In so far as the first of these contentions is concerned, there is clearly no substance in it. The appellants have contended that a proceeding under section 105 can be instituted only when there is no rent payable by the tenant to the landlord under the terms of a contract between the parties; in other words, that the provisions of section 105 are applicable only when no rent has been fixed by agreement of parties. This view is negatived by sub-section 4 of section 105 which provides that in settling rents under the section, the Revenue Officer shall presume, until the contrary is proved, that the existing rent is fair and equitable and shall have regard to the rules laid down for the guidance of the Civil Court in increasing or reducing rents, as the case may be. The appellants have contended that the rejection of their view leads to an anomaly, namely, whereas a decree in a suit for enhancement of rent under section 30 is liable to be challenged by way of a first and a second appeal, an order for settlement of rent under section 105 can be challenged by way of a first appeal only, as provided in section 109A of the Bengal Tenancy Act. In our opinion, there is really no anomaly involved in this result. The Legislature intended that as in a proceeding under section 105, the rent is settled by a Revenue Officer, his decision should not be treated in the same way as the decree of a Civil Court under section 30. The view we take is in accordance with that adopted by Mr. Justice Carnduff in the case of Sheodhani Pandey v. Maharani Beni Pershad Reori (1). The first contention of the appellants, therefore, fails.

In so far as the second contention of the appellants is concerned, it is necessary to premise that their defence was that they held at fixed-rates of rent. They produced rent receipts for 20 years in order to prove that they held at a uniform rate of rent for that period, and they relied upon the presumption mentioned in sub-section 2 of section 50 of the Bengal Tenancy Act; because, notwithstanding the final publication of the Record of Rights, it was competent to them to do so as laid down by a Full Bench in the case of Pirthi Chand Lal v. Basarat Ali (2). As these rent receipts were believed by the Court, the defendants became entitled to avail themselves of the statutory presumption mentioned in section 50. The plaintiff, thereupon, produced his collection papers to show that the rent had varied from time to time at an earlier period of the tenancy. The main question raised in this appeal relates to the admissibility of these collection papers. They were produced by an officer of the landlord who deposed that they were in his custody. No question was put to him as to who had written the papers, nor is their any evidence on the record to show by whom the rents had been collected and when and by whom the entries in the collection papers had been made. Under these circumstances, it has been contended by the appellants that these collection papers are not admissible under section 34 of the Indian Evidence Act; reliance has been placed on their behalf upon a number of judicial decisions to which we shall presently refer, while it has been suggested on behalf of the respondents that there is a conflict of judicial opinion upon this subject.

The cases to be found in the books may be grouped into two classes; namely, first, those that relate to jamabandi papers, and, secondly, those that relate to jamawasilbaki papers. For our present purpose, there is no difference between these two classes of papers, though they are not identical in their nature. Jamabandi papers show the quantity of land held by each cultivator, its different qualities, its rate of rent for each kind, the total rent for all the lands in each cultivator's possession, and, lastly, the grand total of all the lands of every kind held by him. The jamawasilbaki papers, on the other hand, are yearly accounts showing the total rent demandable for the current year, the balance of the previous year, the amounts collected during the year, and the balance due. With regard to jamabandi papers, it was held by this Court under Act II of 1855 that they were not independent but merely corroborative evidence: Chamarnee Bibee v. Ayenoollah Sirdar (3), Gajjo Koer v. Syed Ally Ahmed (4), Dhanookdharee v. Toomey (5) and Kishore Doss v. Pursun Mahtoon (6). The case of Chamarnee Bibee v. Ayenoollah Sirdar (3) arose out of a suit for enhancement of rent, and the collection papers were produced by the landlord to negative the presumption of fixity of rent, which arose in favour of the tenants upon proof of payment of rent at a uniform rate for the statutory period. In the case of Beejoy Gobind Burral v. Bheekoo Roy (7), Mr. Justice Jackson doubted whether these collection papers could at all be treated as books of account. That doubt, however, has not been shared by the learned Judges who decided the later cases. The decisions in D'Silva v. Raj Coomar Dutt (8), Enayetoollah v. Nubo Coomar Sircar (9), Reazooddeen v. McAlepine (10) and Watson & Co. v. Mohendro Nath Paul (11), which are discussed in the case of Akshaya Coomar Dutt v. Shama Charan Patitanda (12), where Taru Patur v. Abinash Chunder (13) was doubted, are not of any real assistance in the determination of the question before us, as there the question raised was, whether jamabandi papers prepared under Regulation VII of 1822 could be made the foundation for enhancement of rent, unless it was established that the rent as entered therein had been agreed to and accepted by the tenants. With regard to jamawasilbaki papers, it was ruled in the cases of Gopal Mundul v. Nobo Kishen (14), Kheeromonee Dassee v. Beejoy Gobind Bural (15), Beejoy Gobind Burral v. Bheekoo Roy (7), Sheo Suhaye v. Goodur Roy (16) and Ram Lall Chuckerbutty v. Tara Soondari (17), which were all decided under Act II of 1855, that these collection papers were not independent evidence of the condition under which the tenants held. Some of these cases, for instance, those of Kheeromonee Dassee v. Beejoy Gobind Bural (15), Gopal Mundul v. Nobo Kishen (14), and Ram Lall Chuckerbutty v. Tara Soondari (17), were suits for enhancement of rent in which the landlord relied upon entries in collection papers to negative the presumption of fixity of rent in favour of the tenant. The case of Shib Persad Doobey v. Promothonath Ghose (18) is of no assistance in the solution of the question raised before us, because there the only question was, whether, if the tenant called for the production of the papers of the landlord, he was not bound by all the entries found therein; and it was ruled that he was so bound, as was subsequently laid down by the Judicial Committee in the case of Rajeswari Kuar v. Bal Krishan (19). The question of admissibility was raised, after the Indian Evidence Act of 1872 had come into force, in the cases of Bhugwan Dutt Jha v. Sheo Mungul Singh (20), Belaet Khan v. Rash Beharee Mookerjee (21), Surnomoyi v. Johur Mahomed Nashyo (22), Roushan Bibee v. Hurray Kristo Nath (23), Akhil Chandra Chowdhry v. Nayu (24) and Mahomed Mahmood v. Safar Ali (25). In the case of Belaet Khan v. Rish Beharee Mookerjee (21), Mr. Justice Markby held that section 34 of the Indian Evidence Act had substantially altered the law as contained in section 43 of Act II of 1855, and that in a suit for enhancement of rent, if the landlord relied upon the entries in the collection papers to negative the presumption of fixity of rent in favour of the defendant, no corroboration was needed, inasmuch as it could not be maintained that the statements were used as evidence to charge any person with liability. This view, however, was not accepted by Mr. Justice Prinsep and Mr. Justice Bose in the case of Surnomoyi v. Johur Mahomed Nashyo (22), where, as we find from an examination of the original record, enhancement was sought by the landlord and was resisted by the tenant on the ground that he held at a fixed-rate of rent. We further find that in the cases of Roushan Bibee v. Hurray Kristo Nath (23); Akhil Chandra Chowdhry v. Nayu (24) and Mahomed Mahmood v. Safar Ali (25), which arose out of suits for recovery of rent, Sir Richard Garth treated the collection papers as inadmissible under section 34 of the Indian Evidence Act. The only case, therefore, decided after the Indian Evidence Act had come into operation, which supports the contention of the respondent, is that of Baleat Khan v. Rish Beharee Mookerjee (21). We are not prepared to follow that decision in view of the dissent expressed in the case of Surnomoyi v. Johur Mahomed Nashyo (22), which has been treated as good law during a period of thirty years. If the question were res integra, it might, no doubt, have been contended with some force that the statements in the collection papers produced by the landlord are not sought to be used by him as evidence to charge the defendants with liability. At the same time, the view adopted by Mr. Justice Prinsep and Mr. Justice Bose may clearly be defended upon a liberal construction of section 34. To take one illustration, in a suit for rent, the matter for inquiry is, whether the rent is payable at the sum named by the landlord or at the figure alleged by the tenant. An entry in the collection papers that the rent, on a previous occasion, had been realized at a certain rate, does not by itself impose any liability upon the tenant; but taken along with the presumption mentioned in section 51 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, it leads to the result that the landlord is able to fix a liability upon the denfendant. In the same way, in a suit for enhancement of rent, the matter for inquiry is, whether, as alleged by the landlord, the tenancy is held at a variable rent, or, whether as asserted by the tenant, the land is held at a rent or rate of rent fixed in perpetuity. The entries in the collection papers of the landlord, which go to prove that the rent has varied from year to year, although they do not directly impose any liability on the defendant, yet ultimately lead to that result. From this point of view, the opinion expressed by Mr. Justice Prinsep and Mr. Justice Bose in the case of Surnomoyi v. Johur Mahomed Nashyo (22) may be supported, and we are not prepared at this distance of time to dissent from that view. At the same time, we are of opinion that there may be cases which show that the law as embodied in section 34 of the Indian Evidence Act is not identical with the law as laid down in section 42 of Act II of 1855. To take a concrete illustration: suppose a question arises, whether a person was on a particular date present in Calcutta. Evidence is adduced to show that in a book of account regularly kept in the course of business, there is an entry that he received a sum of money from X in Calcutta on that date. That entry would be admissible under the first part of section 34, and, apparently, no corroboration would be needed, as no liability is sought to be imposed upon him by virtue of that entry. But an entry of this character would not have been admissible under the terms of section 43 of Act II of 1855. We, therefore, hold that, in th case before us, the jamabandi papers were improperly received in evidence.

(1) 16 C. L. J. 67; 16 Ind. Cas. 935.
(2) 37 C. 30; 13 C. W. N. 1149; 10 C. L. J. 343; 3 Ind. Cas. 449.

The question next arises, what course should be adopted in this view of the matter? On behalf of the appellants, it has been strenuously contended that the jamabandi papers should be excluded and that the claim for assessment should be dismissed. After anxious consideration, we have arrived at the conclusion that this course should not be pursued. The objection urged in this Court does not appear to have been taken in this precise form in the Court of first instance; and it has been forcibly argued on behalf of the respondent that if the objection had been taken, evidence of the description contemplated by section 34 might have been adduced to make the entries admissible under section 32 of the Indian Evidence Act. It was pointed out in the case of Rampyarabai v. Balaji Shridhar (26), that if a statement is admissible under section 32, corroboration would not be needed in terms of section 34. This view was accepted by this Court in the case of Dukka Mandal v. Grant (27) and is in accordance with the opinion expressed by Mr. Justice Norman so far back as 1857 in the case of Kheeromoyee Dassee v. Beejoy Gobind Bural (15).

The result is that this appeal is allowed, the decree of the Special Judge set aside, and the case remitted to the Court of first instance in order that the question of the fixity of rent of the defendants may be investigated again. The parties will be at liberty to adduce fresh evidence. The appellants are entitled to their costs in this Court. We assess the hearing fee at one gold mohur. This order will apply only to the cases of tenants who had produced rent receipts to prove payment of rent at a uniform rate for 20 years. In so far as the other tenants are concerned, the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

This judgment will govern the Appeals Nos. 1081, 1082 and 1083 of 1909 and similar orders will be drawn up therein. Appeal No. 1080 of 1909 is dismissed with costs. We assess the hearing fee at one gold mohur.

Appeals allowed: Appeal No. 1080 dismissed.

BASAWA SINGH—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT

Sardarni BHAGWAN KAUR AND OTHERS REPRESENTATIVES OF Sardar DAYAL SINGH —PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Religious institution—Dharmsala of Sri Tilok Nath, Tahsil Nurpur, District Kangra—Public or private—Suit to remove Granthi—Leave to sue—Religious Endowments Act (XX of 1863), ss. 14, 18—Court-fee for such a suit.

A plaint containing a claim to remove the manager of a religious institution, based on the allegation that the institution is a private one and is founded and maintained by plaintiff's ancestors, and that the plaintiff alone has the power of appointing and dismissing the manager who refuses to leave it, requires ad valorem Court-fee and is not maintainable on a stamp of rupees ten only.

Bawa Mangal Das v. Mahant Narinjan Das, 58 P. R 1893, followed.

Bawa Mangal Das v. Mahant Niranjan Das, 56 P. R. 1895, referred to.

Where the object of a Dharamsala is that the Granth should be read there daily and no member of the Sikh Community who behaves with propriety can be excluded from participating in this service or forbidden from entering it where such recitation is being made, the Dharamsala is a Public Religious Institution, particularly where the Granthi is remunerated wholly or partly from a Government grant. It is immaterial whether the appointment or dismissal of the Granthi rests solely with the founder or his representative.

Sathappayyar v. Periasami, 14 M. 1, distinguished.

The Dharmsala of Sri Tilok Nath, Tahsil Nurpur, District Kangra is a Public Religious Institution and the Granthi of such an institution cannot be removed even by its founder except for good reason.

The provisions of section 14 and other sections of Act XX of 1863 apply to an institution of the above description, and its founder or his representative or any other person interested in the institution suing to remove the Granthi or Manager cannot maintain a suit for the purpose without first obtaining leave, under section 18 of the said Act, of the principal Court of Original Civil Jurisdiction.

BASAWA SINGH v. BHAGWAN KAUR.

Second appeal from the order of the Divisional Judge, Hoshiarpur Division, dated the 4th July 1898, reversing that of the District Judge, dated the 4th Feburuary 1898, dismissing plaintiff's claim.

Bakhshi Sohan Lal, for the Appellant.

Lala Lal Chand, for the Respondents.

ORDER.

CHATTERJEE AND MAUDE, JJ.—A preliminary point is taken by the respondents, viz., that the appeal is insufficiently stamped. In the lower Courts, Rs. 80 were paid but the petition of appeal to the Chief Court bears a stamp of only Rs. 10. Bawa Mangal Das v. Mahant Narinjan Das (1) and Bawa Mangal Das v. Mahant Narinjan Das (2) are quoted by respondents' Counsel in support of his contention. Mr. Sohan Lal argues that the plaintiff did not claim possession but only the removal of the defendant from the charge of the Dharmsala and cites certain judgments of the Allahabad and Madras High Courts to show that the suits of this nature cannot be valued, and that a stamp of Rs. 10 is, therefore, sufficient. We find, however, that plaintiff in his plaint alleged the institution to be a private one founded and maintained by his ancestors and asserts that he alone had the power of appointing and dismissing the manager and his cause of action was that defendant refused to leave when desired to do so by him. This is practically a suit for possession and, at any rate, the ruling of this Court first cited appears to be in point and is supported by the other authority quoted. Following these dicisions, we hold that the petition of appeal must bear a stamp of Rs. 80. We allow the appellant fifteen days to make good the deficieney. He must also pay Rs. 16 for respondent's Counsel's costs of this hearing which will be paid into Court before the next hearing.

JUDGMENT.

ANDERSON AND HARRIS, JJ.—This is an appeal by Basawa Singh against Sardarni Bhagwan Kaur, as representative of late Sardar Dyal Singh Majithia, for reversal of the order of the Divisional Judge of Hoshiarpur removing him from the management of the Dharmsala of Tilok Nath, Tahsil Nurpur, Zila Kangra.

Sardar Dyal Singh, claiming to represent the original founder of the Dharmsala and that he has the right to appoint the manager, sued to eject the defendant, his own nominee, on account of mismanagement, and, previous to suit, obtained an order from the District Judge of Kangra, under section 14 of Act XX of 1863. The defendant having joined issue on these allegations, plaintiff further claimed the right to dismiss defendant without assigning reasons.

The first Court (Mr. Martineau) held that the plaintiff held by custom the right of appointing the manager of the Dharmsala; that the institution had been founded by his ancestors for their private benefit and not for public worship, and that the trusts for it were of the nature of a private trust. He further held that although plaintiff need not have proceeded under section 14 of Act XX of 1863, his suit was not barred, as he had asked for other relief, and went on to hold that, though the institution was private, plaintiff could not claim the defendant's dismissal without assigning reasons and that, as the defendant had not been guilty of misconduct, he was not liable to dismissal.

The Divisional Judge (Captain Martindale) went further, and held that plaintiff had the power to dismiss defendant at his pleasure, and that although defendant had not technically been guilty of misconduct, his conduct had been such as to make his dismissal desirable.

In appeal, it is urged that both Courts erred in treating the Dharmsala as a private institution, inasmuch as it is maintained from a Jagir granted by Government directly to it, and that the Divisional Judge was wrong in holding that defendant could be dismissed when guilty of no misconduct. It was also made a ground that the Courts were bound to treat the suit as brought under the provisions of section 18 of Act XX of 1863, and that, in any case, section 14 of that Act had an application to the case, and that plaintiff should be taken as suing as a person interested in a religious institution of a public nature.

The documents on the file show that the Sikh Government originally granted Jagirs of Rs. 57,000, of which Rs. 18,000 were for dharmarth, to Sardar Desa Singh, the Governor of Kangra. Before retiring to Benares, his son, Sardar Lehna Singh, got new sanads from the Sikh Durbar at Lahore, before the annexation of the Panjab, and it is on a sanad of Sambat 1904, that plaintiff's Counsel relies to show his clients' right to interfere in the affairs of this institution. The following words occur in it:—"As Rs. 1,300 have been granted for ever from the revenue of three villages specified below for the Granthis and Pathis of Sri Tilok Nath, it is right (bayad) that in accordance with the former practice Rs. 300 from Mauza Jindpurah plus Rs. 300 from Mauza Dhesyan and Rs. 700 from Mauza Lehri Gajran should be recognized by you as Muafi in favour of Bhai Kishen Singh Granthi."

(2) 56 P. R. 1895.

Sardar Lehna Singh died at Benares and the Britiish Government on annexation made no objection to continuing the Jagir. The Deputy Commissioner of Gurdaspur (to which District the three villages belong) recommended the resumption of Rs. 1,000 in the event of Sirdar Lehna Singh's death, and continuance of Rs. 300 for the institution as sufficient considering the paucity of Sikhs in the neighbourhood of Tilok Nath, and addressed the Commissioner to that effect on 13th August 1851. It is not quite clear what occured next, but final orders do not appear to have been passed till 1863, when the Financial Commissioner, after reference to the Local Government, directed that the whole of the grant should be continued for the maintenance of the institution in the name of the pujaris and not of the Sardar.

In the Settlement proceedings of 1891, this order was referred to and the Settlement Officer arranged that the income should be divided into 28 shares, viz., 27 for Granthis and one for maintenance of the institution here referred to as a Mandir. The order recited the proceedings of the Financial Commissioner and refers to the grant in these terms:—

"Banam Pujarian Tilok Nath ta marzi Sirkar muaf hai, ab nizr sani men banam 27 kas mundaria khana No. 2 bamujib hukm 26 November 1891 Janab Sahib Muhtmim Bandobast ta marzi Sirkar muaf hai:"

These documents lead us to the conclusion that the institution was one of a public nature. The Sikh Government in Sambat 1904 enjoined on Sardar Lehna Singh the duty of paying the money to Bhai Kishen Singh who was apparently the chief Granthi, possibly only 'primus inter pares.'

The British Government, following the usual practice, treated the free grant as one for a religious purpose and, instead of resuming a portion as suggested by the Local Officer continued the whole, using the phrase pujaris which seems to indicate that the institution was regarded as a place of public worship of the Sikh communtiy to deprive which of its revenue would have caused that community some pain.

The Sardars of Majitha seem to have been formerly benefactors of the institution and to have taken an interest in it, and it was, no doubt, in consequence of their connection with it that the Deputy Commissioner of Gurdaspur, when deciding with whom he should deal as chief Granthi and representative of the body of Jagirdars, thought proper to consult Sardar Dyal Singh, the representative of that family, as he did in 1885.

The object of the institution manifestly was that the Granth should be read daily and, so far as we are aware, no member of the Sikh community who behaves with propriety could be excluded from participating in this service or forbidden to enter a building where such recitation was being made, when the reader is receiving his remuneration from a Government grant. Although the District Judge went carefully into the case, we do not agree with him in holding the ruling, Sathappayyar v. Periasami (3), applicable to the present case. In that case, the endowment of the Matt was derived from an undoubtedly private source, and we cannot suppose that it was the intention of Government in continuing this Jagir of Rs. 1,300 to supplement the private income of the Majitha family for a private religious endowment.

In this view of the case, regarding the institution as public, the plaintiff was bound to obtain sanction for filing the suit under the provisions of section 18 of Act XX of 1863, and it is unnecessary for us to decide whether defendant has been prejudiced by plaintiffs having been permitted to add an allegation of his right to dismiss defendant at will. Mr. Martineau held that this might be included in the prayer for alternative relief, a view in which we should be scarcely disposed to agree. Jan Ali v. Ram Nath Mandal (4) is an authority for holding that the provisions of section 14 of Act XX of 1863 applied to the present suit, and we have no doubt that Sardar Dyal Singh and

(4) 8 C. 32; 9 C. L. R. 433

his representatives had an interest in the institution justifying their proceeding against the Manager or Superintendent, if guilty of misconduct. In this connection, Juggalkishore v. Lakshmandas Raghunath Das (5), Dhurrum Singh v. Kishen Singh(6), Sheorattan Kunwari v Ram Pergash(7); Muhammad Siraj-ul-Haq v. Imam ud-Din (8) were also noted and Gokal Ram v. Kahani Ram (9) referred to as showing the applicability of the Act to the Punjab; Maharanee Indurjeeit Kooer v. Ohandemun Misser (10) and Protap Ohandra Misser v. Brojo Nath Misser (11), cited by other side, do not appear relevant to the present case. Both had reference to family idols, arrangements for the worship of which cannot but be a private matter.

Regarding defendant's conduct, there is a concurrent finding of the Courts in his favour and, after going through the evidence, we see no reason to doubt its correctness. After the death of Bhai Kishen Singh, it appears that for some years, no one held the position of chief Granthi. Since defendant's appointment, the condition of the institution appears to have improved rather than deteriorated.

It is unfortunate that the Dharmsala has no well defined constitution, but as its affairs have been supervised by the Revenue Authorities with regularity, and they have approved of defendant's management, very convincing evidence of misconduct would have been necessary to have justified a Civil Court in acceding to plaintiff's demand for dismissal.

Mr. Lal Chand suggested that a decree might be passed short of dismissal defining the relation of plaintiff to defendants, but the case before us resolves itself into the question whether plaintiff, as a person interested in a religious institution of a public character, can ask the assistance of the Court to dismiss the Manager or Superintendent for misfeasance, breach of trust or neglect of duty, and, as we are satisfied there was none such proved, we can do no more than set aside the order of the Divisional Judge and dismiss the suit, though not on exactly the same grounds as those taken by the District Judge.

The appeal is accepted and suit dismissed with costs throughout.

ADUSUMILLI SINGARAYADU, MINOR, BY GUARDIAN RUNGANNA—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT

SAYANI NARAYANASAMI—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Contract of sale—Liability of vendee to pay interest on consideration money.

An agreement of sale provided for the payment of the consideration on a particular date and for the execution of the conveyance on the date of such payment. By a collateral agreement it was stipulated that if payment was not made on the day specified, interest was to be paid at one per cent. per mensem from the due date. The vendor, however, was not able to give a good title to the property until long after the appointed day as he had to institute a suit for clearing his title:

Held, that the vendee's obligation to pay interest and the vendor's obligation to execute a valid sale-deed were mutually dependent and that interest was payable only from the date on which the vendor could give a clear title.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge of Masulipatam, in Appeal Suit No. 207 of 1908, presented against that of the Court of the District Munsif of Gudivada, in O. S. No. 170 of 1906.

Mr. T. Prakasam, for the Appellant.

Mr. P. Narayana Murthi, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The finding that the plaintiff was not a benamidar for Brahmanandham in the agreement for sale cannot be questioned in second appeal.

The next point argued is that the defendant is entitled to recover from the plaintiff the expenses of the suit he instituted against Brahmanandham to recover the property from him. In that suit costs were decreed to the defendant against Brahmanandham. There is no evidence that he has incurred any additional costs. The agreement must be construed as meaning that, if the defendant had to incur any costs out of his own pocket, he should be reimbursed by the plaintiff. This contention must, therefore, be overruled.

The next and last contention is, that the defendant is entitled, under the terms of the agreement with defendant, to interest from the 31st May 1903. The contract for sale, so far as it is material for this point, runs thus :—"I shall receive the money on any day you may bring the same within the 31st May 1903. . . on any day that you may bring the balance and give me within the due date, I shall execute on a proper stamp paper a sale-deed in your favour in respect of the property mentioned in the letters." There is no convenant in this agreement to pay interest, but in the letter, Exhibit I, we find the following statement:—

"If I fail to pay you the sale amount within the due date (that is the 31st of May 1903) and get the sale-deed executed, I shall pay to you the said sum with interest thereon at one rupee per cent. per mensem, from the due date and get the sale-deed executed." We may, therefore, take it that there was an express covenant to pay interest from the 31st of May 1903 but the defendant was also bound to execute a sale-deed at the same time. As a matter of fact, in this case the defendant was not able to establish a clear title until after he instituted his suit against Brahmanandham and obtained a decree. That decree was passed on the 26th April 1905. Notwithstanding the covenant to pay interest, the defendant would not be entitled to recover it unless and until he was able to make out a good title. Fry in his work on Specific Performance says:—"In a case where there was a stipulation that if, by reason of unforeseen or unavoided obstacles, the purchase should not be completed by the day fixed, the purchaser should from that day pay interest at 5 per cent. on his purchase-money and be entitled to the rents and the vendor did not show a good title till long after the specified day, Leach, V. C., held that the stipulation would not make interest run before the time when a good title was shown, but would only affect its rate." (See page 683, 5th Edition paragraph 1413). This rule commends itself to us as a reasonable one. The plaintiff's obligation to pay interest and the defendant's obligation to execute a valid sale-deed must be treated as mutually dependent covenants. In this case, after the defendant had established his title against Bramanandham, he refused to execute a conveyance in plaintiff's favour. He cannot, therefore, claim interest even for the period after his title was established against Bramanandham. We may, no doubt, award him interest from the date of the first Court's decree. He would at the same time be bound to pay mesne profits from the same date. He does not wish to have a decree for interest on these terms.

The second appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

KHALIL-UD-DIN v. BANNI BIBI.

Mr. B. E. O'Conor (with him Mr. L. M. Banerji), for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

RICHARDS, C. J.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought on foot of a mortgage dated the 11th of July 1893. Various defences were pleaded, and, amongst other things execution and consideration were denied. The Court below has found nearly all the issues in favour of the plaintiff. It has found that the bond was duly executed by Musammat Banni Bibi, the mortgagor, and that the consideration was duly paid to her. The Court, however, somewhat reluctantly found that the bond had not been duly registered. This question of registeration was the question which came before a Bench of this Court. It appears that on the day on which the mortgage purported to have been registered, the husband of Musammat Banni Bibi made an application to the Sub-Registrar of Bareilly Tahsil. The actual application is not before us but there is endorsed on the bond the following note: "This document was presented by Muiz-ud-din Ahmad on Wednesday, the 12th July 1893, between 8 and 9 A. M. in the office of the Sub-Registrar of Parganah and District Bareilly. He stated that Musammat Banni Bibi, the executant of the document, was a parda nashin lady. The document may be attested from the Musammat at her residence by means of a Commission. As the Musammat above-named resides within the local limits of the Municipality, this document may be sent to the Departmental Sub-Registrar of Bareilly for attestation. (Sd) Wasi Uddin, Sub-Registrar (Sd.) Muiz-ud-din Ahmad, the person presenting this document, in autograph".

It next appears that the Departmental Sub-Registrar of Bareilly went the same day to the lady's house. The lady was duly identified and she admitted execution of the deed. The money was paid over and the Departmental Sub-Registrar sent the document to the Sub-Registrar of Tahsil Bareilly who registered the same. It further appears from the endorsement upon the bond that the person who "presented" the document for registration to the Sub-Registrar of Tahsil Bareilly was the husband. It is clear that the Sub-Registrar understood the husband to be the person who was "presenting" the document to him for registration. In the Court below and in this Court, it was admitted that when Muiz-ud-din Ahmad, the husband, "presented" the document for registration, he was not authorised in the manner prescribed by sections 32 and 33 of the Registration Act of 1877, which was then in force. It was, however, strongly contended that what subsequently happened at the residence of the lady amounted to a good "presentation" within the meaning of the Act, and that the document ought, therefore, to be considered as having been duly registered.

At the first hearing of the appeal in this Court, it was never pointed out that the gentleman who attended at the residence of the lady was not the same Sub-Registrar who had, in the first place, received the document from her husband and the question which the Court considered it had before it was whether or not the lady having admitted execution and communicated to an officer competent to accept and register the document her desire to have it registered, the document was not sufficiently "presented" within the meaning of the Act. The Bench before whom the appeal came considered that it was desirable that the question should be decided by a larger Bench and the case was accordingly referred to the Bench as at present constituted.

The arguments in the first instance entirely proceeded upon the basis that the Departmental Sub-Registrar was entitled to receive the document for registration, if in fact it had been duly "presented" to him. It has now, at the very close of the arguments, been pointed out that the Departmental Sub-Registrar had no such authority, and the question which it was intended to have decided by this Bench does not really arise. It seems to me that we have now only to decide whether or not the "presentation" which was made by the husband can, from any point of view, be regarded as a good "presentation"; and, secondly, whether the fact that the Registrar received the deed for registration from an unauthorised person is merely a defect of procedure which might be disregarded under the provisions of section 87. It seems to me that the "presentation" by Muiz-ud-din Ahmad was a complete nullity. He had no authority whatever to present the document for registration, and, in my opinion, this question is completely covered by the ruling of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Mujib-un-nissa v. Abdur Rahim (1). I am also of opinion that, under no circumstances, can what subsequently happened at the house be deemed a good presentation because the gentleman who attended at the house had no authority to receive the document for registration. His authority was confined to ascertaining that the document had been duly executed, that is to say, to examine the executant under the provisions of section 38. I would dismiss the appeal.

KNOX, J.—I concur and have nothing further to add.

BANERJI, J.—I also agree in the conclusion at which the learned Chief Justice has arrived. In the case decided by the Privy Council, namely, the case of Mujib-un-nissa v. Abdur Rahim (1), their Lordships observed:—"It is clear that the power and jurisdiction of the Registrar only come into play when he is invoked by some person having a direct relation to the deed. It is for those persons to consider whether they will or will not give to the deed the efficacy conferred by registration. The Registrar could not be held to exercise the jurisdiction conferred on him if, hearing of the execution of a deed he got possession of it and registered it; and the same objection applies to his proceeding at the instigation of a third party who might be a busy body." In the present case, the document was not presented for registration by a person having a direct relation to the deed, and the subsequent admission of execution by the executant was before an officer who had no jurisdiction to accept the document for registration. Therefore, there was no presentation to a Sub-Registrar having jurisdiction, and the registration of the document must, according to the ruling of the Privy Council, be held to be invalid. I also would dismiss the appeal.

TUDBALL, J.—I fully concur and have nothing further to add.

CHAMIER, J.—I agree with the order proposed by the learned Chief Justice. It appears to me that there was neither in fact nor in law any "presentation" of this document by any qualified person to any person authorised to receive it for registration.

BY THE COURT.—The order of the Court is that the appeal is dismissed but without costs. The objection raised by the respondent as to costs is also dismissed without costs.

Hindu Law—Mitakshara—Dasi—Dasi-putra—Sudra—Permanent concubine.

If a Sudra governed by the Mitakshara Law has a permanent, continuous and exclusive concubine who lives as a member of his family, she is a dasi, and a son born to him by her, who is brought up as a member of the family, is a dasi-putra within the meaning of that expression as used in the Mitakshara.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal on behalf of the plaintiffs in a suit for declaration of title to a half share of the estate of one Dadhibahan Patnaik, who was the father of the first plaintiff and the grandfather of the other three plaintiffs. The defendants include the grandsons and great-grandsons of Dadhibahan, a widow of his deceased son, as also his illegitimate son. The sole question in controversy at this stage is, whether the fifth defendant, the illegitimate son, is entitled to a share of the estate left by Dadhibahan. The Subordinate Judge negatived his claim, but the District Judge has pronounced in his favour. The District

CHATTURBHUJ PATNAIK v. KRISHNA CHANDRA PATNAIK.

Judge has found that the parties are Sudras, that the mother of the fifth defendant was brought into the house of Dadhibahan as a maid servant, that she was his permanent and continuous concubine, that she has always lived in the family, and that her son, the fifth defendant, has been brought up in the family circle, as a member of the joint family. In this view, the District Judge has held that the fifth defendant is entitled to a half share of what would be allotted to a legitimate son. This view has been controverted on behalf of the plaintiffs, and it has been argued that the fifth defendant cannot be deemed a Dasi-putra within the meaning of that expression as used in the Mitakshara, which admittedly governs this family. The text of Yajnavalkya, which is the foundation of the claim of the illegitimate son, is in these terms:—"Even a son begotten by a Sudra on a female slave may get a share by the father's choice; but if the father be dead, the legitimate brother should make him partaker of half a share: one who has no legitimate brother, may take the whole in default of heirs down to the son of daughters" (Yajnavalkya, II, 134; Mandalik page 220). The word which is translated "a female slave" is in the original "Dasi." Upon this text, Vijnaneswar comments as follows (Mitakshara by Colebrooke, Chapter I, section 12): "The son begotten by a Sudra on a female slave obtains a share by the father's choice or at his pleasure. But after the demise of the father, if there be sons of a wedded wife, let these brothers allow the son of the female slave to participate for half a share; that is, let them give him half as much as is the amount of one brother's allotment. However, should there be no sons of a wedded wife, the son of the female slave takes the whole estate, provided there be no daughter or wife, nor sons of daughter; but if there be such, the son of the female slave participates for half a share only. From the mention of a Sudra in this place, it follows that the son begotten by a man of a regenerate tribe on a female slave, does not obtain a share even by the father's choice, nor the whole estate after his demise, but if he be docile, he receives a simple maintenance." The commentators on the Mitakshara, namely, the authors of the Subordhini and the Balambhatti, do not define the term Dasi, but the latter refers to the text of Manu to the following effect (Mitakshara by Setlur, Vol. I, page 717): "A son who is begotten by a Sudra on a female slave or on the female slave of his slave, may, if permitted by his father, take a share of inheritance: thus the law is settled" (Manu IX, 179). It will be observed that the commentators on the Mitakshara make no attempt to elucidate the term Dasi. Apararka, another commentator on Yajnavalkya, similarly takes the word as not standing in need of any explanation (Anandasram edition, page 740). But when we turn to the commentators on Manu (IX 179), we find that two of them, Medhatithi and Sarbajnanarain, do not take the word Dasi in the restricted sense of a "female slave." [Manu by Mandalik, page 1206]. It has been argued before us that the term signifies "a female slave," and that as slavery has been abolished in British India (Act V of 1843), there can no longer be any Dasi-putra in this country entitled to inherit under the rule laid down in the Mitakshara. We are not prepared to accept this contention as well founded. No doubt, slavery has been abolished in this country, but it does not follow that the term Dasi should be interpreted in the restricted sense contended by the appellants. The decisions in Rahi v. Gavinda (1), Sidu v. Baiza (2), Krishnayyan v. Muttasami (3), Hargobind Kuari v. Dhiram Singh (4) Karuppannan v. Bulokam (5), Shesgiri v. Girewa (6), Ram Kali v. Jamna (7), Sarasati v. Mannu (8), Inderan Valungypuly v. Ramaswamy (9), Meenakshi v. Appakutti (10), Annayyan v. Chinnami (11), all undoubtedly support, directly or by implication, a liberal interpretation of the text of the Mitakshara. Wilson in his Sanskrit Dictionary explains the term Dasi as signifying a fisherman, a servant, a slave, a Sudra or a man of the fourth tribe. The term Dasi is defined by him as applicable to a female servant or slave, the wife of a slave or a Sudra. Monier Williams in his Sanskrit Dictionary explains Dasi as a female servant or salve, servant maid, whore, or harlot. To the same effect is the definition given in the Sanskrit Worterbuch by Bohtlingk and Roth, Vol. III, Col. 604, where numerous quotations are given to show that the term Dasa has a much wider meaning than a slave, and the same observation applies to the feminine form Dasi. Burnell in the Dayabhaga of Madhabhya observes that in Southern India the term Dasi is applied also to a female dancer attached to a temple. In fact, the whole difficulty has been created by the rendering of the word Dasi by the expression "female slave" by the earliest translators but, as Sir Michael Westropp points out in Rahi v. Govinda (1), Mr. Colebrooke when he translated the term Dasi-putra as the son begotten on a female slave, must have meant issue by a concubine (Strange on Hindu Law Vol. II, page 68). That the term Dasi-putra is capable of interpretation in a liberal sense is clear from the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Jogendro Bhupati v. Nityanand Mansingh (12), which affirmed the decision of this Court in Jogendro Bhuputi v. Nittyanund (13). There is nothing to indicate that the claimant in that case was the son of a slave in the technical sense of the term; on the other hand, the dates mentioned in the proceedings negative any such presumption. Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee held that under the Mitakshara, among Sudras, where a father left a son by a wedded wife and an illegitimate son by a Dasi (variously translated as female servant or female slave), the ordinary rule of survivorship incidental to a family co-parcenary applies; so that the illegitimate son, having survived the legitimate, is entitled by survivorship to succeed, on the death of his brother without male issue, to the family estate, which was impartible and appertained to a Raj. This decision of the Judicial Committee must be pronounced to be erroneous if the contention of the appellants is correct. The case before the Judicial Committee, we observe, came from the same District as here, namely, the District of Cuttack, and the parties there, as here, were Sudras governed by the Mitakshara Law. We hold, therefore, that if a Sudra governed by the Mitakshara Law has a permanent, continuous and exclusive concubine who lives as a member of his family, she is a Dasi, and his illegitimate son by her, who is himself brought up as a member of the family, is a Dasi-putra, within the meaning of the rule laid down in the Mitakshara. It has been contended, however, that this view is opposed to the decision in Ram Saran v. Tek Chand (14), which is clearly distinguishable, because the only question which arose there for consideration was, whether an illegitimate son acquires by birth a right to the property of his Sudra putative father. There are, however, observations in the judgment which are, in our opinion, at variance with the decision of the Judicial Committee in Jogendro Bhupati Nityanand Mansingh (12), and when the precise question arises again, the matter will require re-consideration. Reference has also been made to the cases of Narain Dhara v. Rakhal Gain (15) and Kirpal Narain v. Sukurmoni (16); these cases were decided under the Dayabhaga law and are, consequently, not directly in point; but we reserve our opinion upon the question under that law when it arises for consideration.

The result is, that the claim of the fifth defendant has been rightly sustained by the District Judge and this appeal against his decree must be dismissed with costs.

Where a Munsif recorded the evidence in a case and heard arguments of Counsel, but judgment was written and pronounced by his successor without hearing Counsel, or giving them notice of the date on which the judgment would be announced; held, that under Order XVIII, rule 15 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, it was not necessary to hear Counsel again: but that the omission to notify the date on which judgment was to be pronounced, as required by Order XX, rule 1 of the Code, was a serious irregularity, if not an illegality, necessitating the setting aside of the judgment, and directing the Munsif to proceed afresh with the case according to law.

Jagramdas v. Narain Lal, 7 A. 857, cited.

Petition, under section 25 of Act IX of 1887, praying the High Court to revise the decree of the Court of the District Munsif of Narasapur, dated 28th day of September 1910, in Small Cause Suits Nos. 1352, 1358, 1368 and 1364 of 1909.

Mr. T. Ramachandra Row, for the Petitioner.

Mr. V. Ramesam, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The District Munsif reports that the allegations in the affidavit are substantially true. The evidence was taken by one Munsif who also heard the arguments of Vakils and reserved judgment. One of his successors read the evidence and, without hearing the parties or giving them notice, delivered his judgment. The first contention is that the Munsif may be entitled to deal with the evidence taken by his predecessor but he should have heard the Vakils on the evidence before pronouncing his judgment, and Jagramdas v. Narain Lal(1) is relied upon. I do not think this is necessary, under Order XVIII, rule 15 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The next contention is that under Order XX, rule 1, notice of the date of pronouncing the judgment should have been given. This contention is valid and its omission is a serious irregularity, if not an illegality. It is unnecessary to consider whether, if it is only an irregularity, this Court should interfere with the decree on that account only, because the Munsif who decided the case was not the same person who heard the Pleaders and it is impossible to say what the result would be if the case had been argued. The case seems to be one in which the Pleaders should have been heard. I, therefore, set aside the decree, direct the Munsif to restore the cases to his file and deal with them according to law with reference to the above observations. The parties will bear their own costs in this Court. The costs in the lower Court will be dealt with in the final decree.

Decree set aside.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), s. 108A, scope of—Power of Settlement Officer—Correction of bona fide mistake—Mistake of party—Inherent power of Court to correct obvious errors in record—Amendment of record after dismissal of appeal.

Section 108A of the Bengal Tenancy Act applies only to Revenue Officers specially empowered by the Local Government in that behalf. The section entitles the Settlement Officer to correct the record where there has been a bona fide mistake; such mistake need not necessarily be the mistake of the Settlement Officer; it may very well be a mistake made by one of the parties concerned. The section in substance authorises a Settlement Officer to re-consider the matter on the merits.

A Settlement Officer, in the exercise of a power inherent in every Court to correct obvious errors or incidental slips in its own record, may correct a clerical or an arithmetical error in the Record.

Mellor v. Swire, 30 Ch. D. 239 at p. 247; 53 L. T. 205; 33 W. R. 785; Lawrie v. Lees, 7 App. Cas. 19, at p. 35; 51 L. J. Ch. 209; 46 L. T. 210; 30 W. R. 185, and Hatton v. Harris, (1895) A. C. 547 at p. 559; 62 L. J. P. C. 24; 1 R. 1; 67 L. T. 722, referred to.

After the final publication of a Record of Rights, fair and equitable rent was settled in a proceeding under section 105 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, at the rate of one rupee per bighi. The tenant's appeal to the Special Judge was dismissed. Subsequently, it was discovered that the area had been erroneously recorded as 5 bighas, 17 cottahs instead of 7 bighas, 5 cottahs. Accordingly, the Settlement Officer amended the record, and a consequential alteration was made in the entry relating to the rent payable. Before the Special Judge on appeal, no question was raised as to the area:

Held, that the Settlement Officer had authority to correct the record.

Appeal from the decree of the District Judge of Tippera, dated the 10th August 1909, affirming that of the Munsif of Chandpur, dated the 23rd December 1903.

Babu Upendra Lal Roy (for Babu Harendra Narain Mitra), for the Appellant.

Babu Brajendra Nath Chatterjee, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal on behalf of the plaintiff in a suit for rent. The plaintiff claims rent at the rate of Rs. 7-4 on account of 7 bighas and 5 cottahs of land in the occupation of the defendants. The defendants contend that they hold 5 bighas and 17 cottahs on a rental of Rs. 5-13-7 and, in support of their allegation, they rely upon an entry in a Record of Rights finally published on the 20th June 1904. The plaintiff, on the other hand, relies on that very record as subsequently amended by the Settlement Officer on the 2nd September 1907. The District Judge has refused to recognise the amendment of the record on the ground that it was made without jurisdiction. The question in controversy, therefore, is whether the alteration in the record was duly made.

It appears that after the final publication of the Record of Rights, fair and equitable rent was settled on the 21st December 1905 in a proceeding under section 105 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, at the rate of one rupee per bigha. The tenants were dissatisfied with this assessment and preferred an appeal to the Special Judge, which was dismissed on the 9th April 1906. Subsequently, it was discovered that the area had been erroneously put down as 5 bighas and 17 cottahs in the Record of rights. Accordingly, the Settlement Officer, on the 2nd September 1907, amended the record, so as to alter the entry about area from 5 bighas, 17 cottahs to 7 bighas and 5 cottahs; a consequential alteration was made in the entry relating to the rent payable. The District Judge has held that this alteration was unauthorised, first, because under section 108A of the Bengal Tenancy Act, an alteration of this description could be made only within one year from the date of the publication of the record; secondly, because such alteration could not be made after an appeal in a proceeding under section 105 had been heard and decided by the Special Judge. In our opinion, the view taken by the District Judge cannot be supported.

It was taken for granted in the Court below that the Settlement Officer proceeded under section 108A of the Bengal Tenancy Act; but there is no foundation for this assumption. The section applies only to Revenue Officers specially empowered by the Local Government in that behalf. It is not shown that the Settlement Officer in this case was so empowered. It is further clear that the Settlement Officer could not have acted under section 108A, because he amended the record more than a year after the date of the certificate of its final publication. It is worthy of note that section 108A has a much wider scope than the correction of obvious errors or incidental slips in a Record of Rights. It entitles the Settlement Officer to correct the record where there has been a bona fide mistake; such mistake need not necessarily be the mistake of the Settlement Officer; it may very well be a mistake made by one of the parties concerned. Section 108A, in substance, authorises a Settlement Officer to re-consider the matter on the merits. In the present case, where apparently a clerical or an arithmetical error had to be corrected, the Settlement Officer, even if he had been duly authorised, need not have availed himself of the provisions of that section. He may be deemed, therefore, to have acted in the exercise of a power inherent in every Court to correct obvious errors or incidental slips in its own record. Lord Justice Bowen observed in Mellor v. Swire(1), that "every Court has inherent power over its own record; as long as the records are within its power, it can set right any mistake in them; it would be perfectly shocking if the Court could not rectify an error which is really one of its own ministers." Equally emphatic are the observations of Lord Blackburn in Lawrie v. Lees (2) and of Lord Watson in Hatton v. Harris (3). Hence, the only question for consideration is, whether the Settlement Officer had authority to amend the Record of Rights at the stage he proceeded to set it right. It has been contended that his authority had terminated, because the Special Judge had already confirmed his order upon the question of fair and equitable rent in the proceeding under section 105. No doubt, the amount of fair and equitable rent must depend upon the area; but, it is plain, as stated by the District Judge himself, that the substantial matter in controversy before the Special Judge was, whether the rate of one rupee per bigha was or was not fair and equitable. No question appears to have been raised before the Special Judge as to whether the area was 5 bighas, 17 cottahs or 7 bighas, 5 cottahs. Under these circumstances, we must hold that the Settlement Officer had authority to correct the record on the 2nd September 1907. We are not concerned with the question whether the record as amended represented the true state of facts. The only effect of our decision is that the landlord is entitled to rely upon the corrected record under section 103B (c) of the Bengal Tenancy Act. But, it is open to the defendants to rebut this presumption and to establish, if they can, that the record as amended is erroneous. This aspect of the matter does not appear to have been considered in either of the Courts below.

The result is, that this appeal is allowed, the decrees of the Courts below set aside and the case remanded to the Court of first instance for re-trial. The Court will proceed on the assumption that the amended record is correct; but it will be open to the defendants to rebut this presumption. Each party will pay his own costs up to this stage of the proceedings.

Appeal allowed: Case remanded.

NARASIMHARAGHAVA IYENGAR AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS.

Negotiable Instruments Act (XXVI of 1881), s. 87—Material alteration—Private International Law.

A suit was brought upon two documents executed in Mysore, and not stamped according to the Stamp Law of Mysore, and, consequently, were inadmissible in evidence and could not be acted upon there. The documents were described in the plaint as bonds, but in the documents themselves, they were described as promissory-notes; the documents were torn in several places and had been pieced together in such a manner that the name of the payee and the words "or order" were missing with the result that the documents could be described as bonds:

Held, that this was an alteration of a material character, whereby documents, which could not be sued upon in the only Court where any suit upon them was likely to be maintainable, were converted into documents which could be sued upon, and that, apart from the express provisions of section 87 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, the suit on these documents must fail.

The question whether the plaintiff's suit, which was not maintainable in Mysore owing to the failure to conform to the Stamp Law there, was maintainable in India, considered.

Mr. V. V. Srinivasa Iyengar, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. V. Sadagopacharair, for the Defendants.

JUDGMENT.—This is a suit brought by the plaintiff upon two documents, which were executed in Mysore by the father of the defendants who was at one time an Advocate and afterwards a District Munsif in Mysore, in favour of the plaintiff, who with her husband is also an inhabitant of Mysore; and the suit has been brought here merely owing to the accident that the defendants are at present residing in Madras for the purpose of prosecuting their studies.

In the plaint, these documents are described as bonds; but in the documents themselves, they are described as promissory-notes. It now turns out that these documents have been torn in several places and have been pieced together again but in such a way that the parts where the name of the payee and the words "or order" would ordinarily appear are missing, with the result that they can be described as bonds as they have been described in the plaint.

Now, it also turns out from an inspection of these documents that, according to the Stamp Law of Mysore, which is Regulation II of 1900 and which admittedly is identical in terms with our own Stamp Law, these documents being made payable more than a year after execution, under Article 13 (c) of the 1st Schedule require to be stamped in the same way as bonds; and have not been so stamped with the result that under section 35, if promissory-notes, they could neither be received in evidence nor acted upon in Mysore and they would, therefore, be entirely invalid in Mysore which, in the ordinary course of things, would be the place where they could be sued upon, because the executant and his family were Mysoreans resident in Mysore.

Now, the first question which arises in that state of things is whether there has been a material alteration in these documents since their execution, because, if there has been, it is clear upon the express terms of the Negotiable Instruments Act, section 87, which we ought to presume under section 137, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, is also the law in Mysore, "any material alteration of a Negotiable Instrument renders the same void as against any one who is a party thereto at the time of making such alteration and does not consent thereto, unless it was made to carry out the common intention of the original parties." And, apart from the express provisions of section 87 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, it is a general principle of law which is applicable to all promissory-notes and further to deeds of all kinds. I may here refer to Daniel's well known work on Negotiable Instruments, paragraph 1373, where it is said:—"Any change in terms of a written contract, which varies its original legal effect and operation whether in respect to the obligation it imports, or to its force as matter of evidence, when made by any party to the contract, is an alteration thereof, unless all the other parties to the contract gave their express or implied consent to such change. And the effect of such alteration is to nullify and destroy the altered instrument as a legal obligation, whether made with fraudulent intent or not."

Having regard to the condition of these documents, it appears to me that there has been prima facie an alteration of a most material character. The materiality of the alteration was contested very courageously by Mr. Srinivasa Iyengar; but to say that an alteration which converts a document which cannot be sued upon in the only Court where any suit on it is likely to be maintainable into one which can be sued upon—to say that such an alteration as that is not material, is an argument which I am really unable to appreciate.

Having come to that conclusion, there really is an end of the case, because the result inevitably follows that this suit must be dismissed. There were some other questions which were, however, argued and about which evidence was gone into. It was contended for the defendants that as these documents could not have been sued upon in Mysore owing to the provisions of the Mysore Stamp Law, neither could they be sued upon here. That is a question not free from difficulty. In England, under section 72 sub-section 1 (a) of the Bills of Exchange Act, mere failure of compliance with Foreign Stamp Law does not prevent bills being sued upon in England. But there is no section corresponing to that in the Negotiable Instruments Act. Section 19 of the Stamp Act does not seem to me to throw any light upon this question. We are, therefore, driven back to the Private International Law on the question, as to which it cannot be said that the leading text writers are all in agreement. If the view of Mr. Westlake, in his very careful consideration of the cases in paragraph 209, is to be followed, then it would seem that as no action could be brought where the contract was made, so no action can be brought here in the absence of an express statutory provision to the contrary. And Mr. Dicey, on the other hand, appears to rely upon the general principle that English Courts take no judicial notice of foreign Revenue Law, but the case which he refers to in Bristow v. Sequeville (1) was really a case that did not raise the question at all but merely raised the question whether a receipt which required to be stamped to make it admissible in the country in which it was made could be admitted as evidence of payment in England, although it had not been stamped according to the law of the country where it was made. It is pointed out by Mr. Westlake there was no question of any contract in that case. A receipt is not a contract. However, I do not find it necessary to express any final opinion on that question.

Then, the further question was raised and evidence was gone into, as to whether there was any consideration for these promissory-notes and I hold that the onus lay on the defendants to show that there was no debt just as it would have lain upon their father, the maker, if he had been alive and been sued on them. With regard to this part of the evidence, I would merely say that I am not satisfied with the evidence for the plaintiff, that the plaintiff, who is the wife of Ranga Srinivasa Chari, ever had this money.

In my opinion, the suit clearly fails on the ground of material alteration of the suit notes and, therefore, is dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.—The subject-matter of the litigation which has culminated in this appeal is the estate of one Jogendra Chandra Ray. The plaintiffs-appellants are the great-grandsons of the great-great-grandfather of the deceased owner, while the defendant is the son of the daughter of the brother of his father. The question in controversy is, who has the preferential title as the reversionary heir. The Courts below have found in favour of the defendant, upon the authority of the Full Bench decisions in Guru Gobind v. Anand Lal (1) and Digumber Roy v. Moti Lal (2). It is not disputed that] if these cases were correctly decided, the claim of the plaintiffs must be negatived. But it has been argued that both the Full Benches took an erroneous view of the fundamental principles which underlie the Dayabhaga, and, consequently, arrived at incorrect conclusions. On this basis, Sastri Golap Chandra Sarkar has addressed to us an able and learned argument to induce us to have the matter re-considered by the Full Court. We have anxiously considered his argument, and we are of opinion that if the matter were res integra, the view put forward by the appellants would deserve consideration. At the same time, we are of opinion that, on well-established principles, the matter should not be re-opened. The law on the subject has been laid down authoritatively by two successive Full Benches, once in 1870 and again in 1883. Attempts have previously been made to re-open the matter, but have never been successful. [See, for instance, Dino Nath v. Chundi Koch (3), where in 1889 Mr. Justice Banerjee stated that the question must be deemed settled by authority]. In these circumstances, we are clearly of opinion that we should act on the principle stated by Lord Cranworth in Young v. Robertson (4) in the following terms: "There is another duty incumbent on all Courts, and pre-eminently upon a Court of ultimate appeal, and which has been invariably observed, namely, that as regards those rules which regulate the settlement and devolution of property, those Courts, which have to interpret instruments and acts of parties, must take care to be very guarded against letting any supposed notions as to the inaccuracy of any rule, which has in fact been acted upon, induce them to alter it so as to endanger the security of property and titles." This doctrine has been recognised by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Sri Raja Rao Venkata Surya Mahipati v. Court of Wards (5), though they did not apply the doctrine to that particular case, because there had not been such a long course of uniform Partition Act (IV of 1893), s. 10—Whether applicable where preliminary decree has been made.

Section 10 of Act IV of 1893 is applicable to a case where a preliminary decree for partition has been made but the final partition has not been effected.

Appeal against the decree of the District Court of Cuddapah, in Appeal Suit No. 107 of 1910, dated 26th July 1910, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif of Cuddapah, in E. P. No. 121 of 1910, in Original Suit No. 847 of 1910.

Mr. S. Gopalaswami Iyengar, for the Appellants.

Mr. T. Anantachari, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The District Judge is in error in holding that the provisions of the Partition Act IV of 1893 do not apply to a suit like the present in which a preliminary decree for partition had been made but in which the final partition had not been effected. Section 10 of the Act makes this plain, as pointed out in Kadir Bacha Sahib v. Abdul Rahiman Sahib (1) followed in Bai Hirakore v. Trikamdas Hirachand (2).

We set aside the order of the District Judge on the preliminary matter and direct him to restore the appeal to the file and dispose of it according to law.

(n), proviso—Restraint on alienation—Involuntary sale—Payer's property vested in Court of Wards—Whether manager under Court compellable to bring money to Court month by month—Whether Receiver may be appointed.

A well marked distinction has been recognised between a right to receive a sum of money for purposes of maintenance properly so called, and a right or interest in property which really forms a fund or estate out of which an annuity is periodically paid to the grantee; in the former case, a purely personal right is created which may be properly deemed inalienable; in the latter case, an interest in property is created which can rightly be deemed alienable. Whether a particular grant falls within the scope of the one principle or the other, must depend upon its terms.

A father, finding himself unable to pay his creditors, conveyed to his son all his properties for the consideration of paying off his debts. The transferee agreed to pay to his father, the transferor, during his life a monthly sum and two annual sums. These sums were made first charges upon the estate in the hands of the son, subject to the then existing mortgages executed by the father. The deed contained a covenant that the allowances were payable to the vendor personally and would be absolutely incapable of transfer in any form whatever:

Held, that the right of the father to receive the annuity was a valuable interest in property and saleable property within the meaning of section 60 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1908, and could not be regarded as a right to future maintenance within the meaning of clause (n) of the proviso to that section; that the clause in the document seeking to impose a restraint on alienation, was illegal; that a restraint on voluntary alienation, even if validly imposed, did not necessarily imply a restraint against involuntary alienation, and that the restraint did not bar a compulsory sale at the instance of the father's creditors.

The father's decree-holder is entitled to attach and sell the right to receive the allowance. The purchaser at the sale will acquire the right of the judgment-debtor. JUDGMENT.—This appeal is directed against an order in execution proceedings. The antecedent history of the litigation may be briefly stated. On the 25th September 1905, the appellant conveyed all his properties in favour of his son for the payment of his debts. The conveyance provided that the purchaser would pay the vendor a monthly sum of rupees four thousand, the first payment to be made on the 1st October 1905, and the payment for every succeeding month, on the first day of the month following, between the hours of 1 A.M. and 6 A.M. The conveyance also provided for the payment of further sums of rupees two thousand and rupees twelve hundred annually in two equal instalments for specified purposes. The deed further contained a provision that the vendor would not, by mortgage or otherwise, seek to charge or alienate the allowance payable to him, and that, on no account and under no circumstances, was the allowance to become payable to or demandable by any person other than the vendor or his duly constituted attorney. There was also a provision that, so far as was consistent with the then subsisting mortgages executed by the vendor himself, the allowance payable was to be a first charge upon a specified share of the estate. The purchaser died sometime after this transaction, whereupon the properties transferred to him vested in his widow, Sashirama Kumari, and are now under the management of the Court of Wards on her behalf. On the 4th April 1910, the respondents before us, who held a decree for a large sum of money obtained against the appellant on the 13th November 1908, applied for execution thereof. They prayed for recovery of the judgment-debt by attachment of the monthly allowance of rupees four thousand from the date of application to the date of realisation. The judgment-debtor objected that the allowance could not be attached before it became due. The Subordinate Judge overruled this objection, and issued a prohibitory order upon the manager under the Court of Wards, directing him to withhold payment of the monthly allowance to the judgment-debtor and to deposit the amount in Court as it accrued due from month to month, till the decretal amount was satisfied. Upon appeal to this Court by the judgment-debtor, the order of the Subordinate Judge was discharged on the 23th June 1911, on the ground that an annuity not yet due, is not garnishable under the provisions of the law. Raja Padmanand Singh v. Ramaprosad Malvi (1). Thereupon, the decree-holders presented an application to the Court below on the 11th September 1911, in which they prayed that the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor in the monthly allowance payable from and charged upon the estate of his daughter-in-law might be attached and sold. The judgment-debtor objected that the right to the annuity was not saleable property within the meaning of section 60 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1908 and was, consequently, not liable to be attached and sold. The Subordinate Judge has overruled this contention, and has not only directed attachment of the annuity but also issued a prohibitory order upon the manager under the Court of Wards directing him to bring into Court, month by month, the amount of allowance payable to the judgment-debtor. We are invited in this appeal to set aside this order as contrary to law.

(1) 14 C. L. J. 127; 16 C. W. N. 14; 11 Ind. Cas. 22.

The determination of the question raised before us, depends upon the nature of the right created in favour of the judgment-debtor by the indenture of the 25th September 1905. The deed recites the previous history of the family and the embarrasment of Raja Padmanand Singh when he found himself unable to pay his creditors, secured as well as unsecured. Under these circumstances, he conveyed to his son all his properties for consideration. The transferee assumed payment of specified debts, and agreed, as we have already stated, to pay to his father, the vendor, during his life, a monthly sum of rupees four thousand and two annual sums of rupees two thousand and rupees twelve hundred respectively. These sums were made first charges upon the estate in the hands of the son, subject to the then existing mortgages executed by the vendor himself. The deed contained a covenant that the allowances were payable to the vendor personally and would be absolutely incapable of transfer in any form whatever. On behalf of the appellant it has been argued that the vendor had no saleable interest in the annuity, that it was purely personal, and that it is in essence a right to future maintenance within the meaning of clause (n) of the proviso to section 60 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1908. On behalf of the respondents, it has been argued, on the other hand, that this right to receive the annuity, the payment whereof was secured by a first charge on the estate in the hands of the son, is a valuable interest in property, that the restraint upon alienation imposed thereon is contrary to law, and, that, in any event, a creditor of the annuitant is entitled, notwithstanding the clause against alienation, to seize the property in execution. This is the substantial point in controversy in this appeal. There is a subordinate point, which would require consideration, if the argument of the judgment-debtor fails, namely, if the right to receive the annuity be deemed saleable property liable to be attached and sold, it is not competent to the Court to issue a prohibitory order upon the manager and to direct him to deposit in Court the allowance as it falls due from month to month.

In so far as the primary question in the appeal is concerned, we have arrived at the conclusion, after anxious consideration of the matter, that the right of the judgment-debtor to receive the annuity is saleable property within the meaning of section 60 of Code of 1908 and cannot be regarded as a right to future maintenance within the meaning of clause (n) of the proviso to that section. The question whether a right to maintenance is assignable or not, was considered by this Court in the cases of Asad Ali Molla v. Haider Ali (2) and Tara Sundari v. Saroda Charan (3). The judicial decisions on the subject, which are by no means easy to reconcile, will be found reviewed in these cases. As was pointed out there, a well marked distinction has been recognised between a right to receive a sum of money for purposes of maintenance properly so called, and a right or interest in property which really forms a fund or estate out of which an annuity is periodically paid to the grantee; in the former case, a purely personal right is created which may be properly deemed inalienable; in the latter case, an interest in property is created which can rightly be deemed alienable. Whether a particular grant falls within the scope of the one principle or the other, must depend upon its terms. In the case before us, the substance of the transaction embodied in the indenture of the 25th September 1905, was that, although the appellant conveyed his entire estate to his son, he retained a substantial interest therein, namely, a right to receive therefrom rupees fifty-one thousand two hundred annually. It may be conceded that there was a personal undertaking by the son to pay this money to the father; but it cannot be overlooked that the due payment of the money was secured by a first charge upon the estate, a charge which, if necessary, could be enforced by sale of the estate. This plainly is not a mere right to future maintenance but a valuable interest in property. It has been contended, however, that the indenture states explicitly that the right to receive allowance is inalienable and that the allowance shall, on no account and under no circumstances, be payable to or demandable by any person other than the vendor or his duly constituted attorney. In our opinion, the clause mentioned seeks to impose a restraint on alienation, which must be deemed illegal, on the same principle on which it has been ruled that where the income of trust property is to be paid to A. during his life, a direction that it shall be paid into his own hands or that he shall not alienate or anticipate it or that it shall not be liable for his debts, is void; Brandon v. Robinson (4) Graves v. Dolphin (5), Barton v. Briscoe (6), Woodmeston v. Walker (7), Jones v. Salter (8) and Brown v. Pocock (9). It may be conceded that there are observations in some of the cases on the subject in the books which may be difficult to reconcile, Twopeny v. Peyton (10), In re Coleman; Henry v. Strong (11), In re Bullock; Good v. Lickorish (12); but the principle recognised by the decisions is that whatever rights, legal or equitable, in property, a man has, those rights are alienable; whatever a man can demand from his trustees, that his creditor can demand from him. This view is not opposed to the observation of Lord Hatherley in Chambers v. Smith (13), where he did not mean to affirm that an alimentary provision is good in England, but that by the law of England, if a trustee has a right to charge the trusts of a fund against a cestui que trust, he has the same right against the cestui que trust's creditor. No doubt, alimentary funds, that is, spend-thrift trusts, are recognised in the law of Scotland, as appears from the authorities mentioned in the judgment of this Court in Raja Padmanund Singh v. Rama Prasad (1). There can be no question that they are not recognised in England, and Lord Justice Stirling observed, in In re Fitzgerald; Surman v. Fitzgerald (14), that he could not appreciate why the English owner of an alimentary provision, created by Scotch law, should be held to be incapable of making a disposition of it when it comes to his hands, inasmuch as the law of England does not in general recognise any restraint as regards the property of a man of full age. It is unnecessary, for our present purpose, to consider whether the English or the Scotch view ought to be deemed consistent with rules of justice, equity and good conscience. The indenture in the present case cannot, as we have already stated, be deemed as a provision for maintenance, and its object clearly is to place property beyond the reach of creditors. I am not unmindful that spend-thrift trusts have been vigorously defended, and probably the most forcible presentation of the doctrine of spend-thrift trusts is to be found in the judgment of Mr. Justice Miller in Nichols v. Eaton (15). The learned Judge maintains that the doctrine that the power of alienation is a necesssary incident to a life-estate in real property, or that the rents and profits of real property and the interest and dividends of personal property may not be enjoyed by an individual without liability for his debts being attached to it as a necessary incident to such enjoyment, is a modern doctrine engrafted upon the Common Law by the Court of Chancery for the benefit of creditors. But if the doctrine is modern, it is only because such trusts themselves are modern; the doctrine is merely an application of a principle older than Taltarum's case. As Professor Gray observes, these decisions are "a part of the struggle of the law against feudalism and against the attempt to give the enjoyment of wealth without its responsibilities; they are modern only because the special form of dishonesty, family pride and sentimentalism at which they aim, is modern." Gray on Restraints, section 168. In the case before us, it is further worthy of note that there is no provision in the indenture, against involuntary sale of the right to receive allowance, and it cannot be disputed that a restraint on voluntary alienation, even if validly imposed, does not necessarily imply a restraint against involuntary alienation; Rochford v. Hackman (16), Joel v. Mills (17); and the restraint, in our opinion, does not bar a compulsory sale at the instance of the creditors ; Hatton v. May (18), Hunt Foulston v. Furber (19), Roper v. Roper (20). We must hold, therefore, that the right of the appellant to receive the allowance is liable to be attached under section 60 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1908. The substantial ground on which the appeal is based cannot, consequently, be supported.

It has been urged, however, on behalf of the appellant, that the Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to direct the manager under the Court of Wards to pay into Court, month by month, the allowance as it fell due. In our opinion, this contention is well founded and must prevail. The decree-holder is entitled to attach and to sell the right to receive the allowance ; the purchaser at the sale will acquire the right of the judgment-debtor ; but before that event takes place, the manager cannot be called upon to pay the money into Court month by month. If this were permissible, a decree-holder who has attached land might claim that the profits from the date of attachment be paid into Court. In fact, the direction that the money be paid into Court is directly contrary to our previous decision in this matter ; Raja Padmanand v. Rama Prasad (1) ; nor can a Receiver be appointed to receive the money month by month, Lucas v. Harris (21), as might have been done if it had been held that the amount of allowance payable for any month was liable to be attached before it fell due. We direct, accordingly, that the sums deposited by the manager be paid out to the appellant, because they have been brought into Court in contravention of the previous orders of the High Court.

The result is that this appeal is allowed in part ; the sums deposited by the manager will be returned to the appellant, but the decree-holder will be at liberty to bring to sale the right of the judgment-debtor to receive the allowance of Rs. 4,000 a month under the indenture of the 25th September 1905. As the victory has been a divided one, there will be no order for costs in this Court.

Appeal allowed in part.

Vendor and purchaser—Whole sale price not paid—Sale pre-empted—Vendor paid by pre-emptor—Vendor again suing vendee for unpaid purchase-money—Lien, discharge of, by payment made by third person—Contract Act (IX of 1872), ss. 69, 70.

The plaintiff sold a certain village to the defendant. A portion of the sale price was paid by the defendant while the rest remained unpaid. The sale was the subject of two rival suits for pre-emption of which one suit was dismissed and the other was decreed. The pre-emptor whose suit was decreed paid the unpaid purchase-money to the plaintiff but that suit was ultimately dismissed on the ground that the purchase-money was not deposited in Court according to law. The plaintiff then brought a suit for the recovery of that very amount from the defendant who remained in possession of the property sold, the pre-emption suit having been dismissed:

Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to bring a suit for the recovery of the same amount from the vendee when he had already received that sum from the pre-emptor. The plaintiff's cause of action, for the recovery of his unpaid portion of the purchase-money, was satisfied by the payment of the said money by the pre-emptor who had stepped into the shoes of the vendee. The mere fact that the decree for pre-emption had since been set aside did not revive the cause of action unless a claim was brought against the plaintiff for the refund of the said money and he was made to reimburse the same to one who had paid it.

Mr. A. P. Sen, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This was a suit by a vendor for the recovery of his unpaid portion of the purchase-money from the vendee by the enforcement of a charge against the property sold. The sale-deed was executed by the plaintiff in favour of defendant No. 1 in lieu of Rs. 22,968 on the 3rd June 1905, out of which Rs. 11,850 were payable by the vendee to the vendor by the end of August 1905. The plaintiff admitted the receipt of the said amount with the exception of Rs. 6,419-0-6, which with interest thereon forms the subject-matter of the present suit.

MUBARAK ALI SHAH v. ADITTYA PRASAD.

The sale-deed was the subject of two rival suits for pre-emption, one of which was brought by Musammat Latif-un-nissa, who was unsuccessful in the Court of first instance, and the other by Musammat Ruqaiya, who obtained a decree and paid Rs. 6,419-0-6 thereunder to the plaintiff on the 28th June 1909 by executing, it is alleged, a promissory-note for that amount in his favour. The decree obtained by Musammat Ruqaiya was ultimately reversed on appeal and the claim of Musammat Latif-un-nissa was decreed by this Court. In pursuance of the latter decree, Musammat Latif-un-nissa paid Rs. 6,419-0-6, to the plaintiff but failed to deposit another part of the consideration money, in consequence of which her decree proved abortive. It is admitted by the plaintiff-appellant that he received Rs. 6,419-0-6 from Musammat Ruqaiya by means of a promissory-note executed by the latter in his favour and a similar amount from Musammat Latif-un-nissa in cash and that he has not yet refunded either of the said amounts. The only question for consideration in this appeal is whether, under the circumstances, he is entitled to bring a suit for the recovery of the same amount from the vendee, who has been successful in retaining the property sold against the onslaught of the rival claimants to pre-emption.

The lower Court dismissed the claim on the ground that there was no cause of action to the plaintiff until he refunded the money realized by him from Musammat Latif-un-nissa and Musammat Ruqaiya. Section 41 of the Contract Act provides that when a promisee accept performance of the promise from a third person, he cannot afterwards enforce it against the promisor, and sections 69 and 70 of the same Act impose upon the vendee a liability to reimburse the persons who had paid the money under the decrees which were afterwads set aside to the extent to which he was benefited by the said payment [see Dakhina Mohan Ray v. Sarodar Mohan Ray (1)].

The plaintiff had, undoubtedly, a good cause of action under the sale-deed for the recovery of his unpaid portion of the purchase-money from the vendee but that cause of action was satisfied by the payment of the said money by Musammat Latif-un-nissa and Musammat Ruquaiya, who, by virtue of the then subsisting decrees for pre-emption, had stepped into the shoes of the vendee. The mere fact that those decrees for pre-emption have since been set aside does not revive the cause of action unless a claim is brought against him for the refund of the said money and he is made to reimburse the same to those who had paid it. Till then, his lien for the unpaid purchase-money cannot be enforced because that lien was satisfied and the purchase-money cannot be said to be still lying unpaid. It is yet possible that Musammat Ruqaiya may go up to the Privy Council and ask to have the decision against her set aside and it is equally possible that Musammat Ruqaiya and Latif-un-nissa may take no steps to claim a refund of the monies paid, or said to have been paid by them within the period of limitation. It would be manifestly unfair, therefore, to allow the plaintiff to recover for the third time from the vendee what he has already recovered from Musammat Latif-un-nissa and Ruqaiya or to saddle the defendant with a liability so long as he is not released by Musammat Latif-un-nisa and Musammat Ruqaiya from a right to reimbursement for what they paid practically on his account. The learned Counsel for the appellant relied on Saunders v. Leslie (2), Grant v. Mills (3), and other English cases in support of his contention that a lien is not discharged by a receipt taken or payment made by a third person unless it was authorized or ratified by the debtor. But, as observed by Pollock (Pollock's Contract Act, page 225), it is not clear that the better modern opinion is not the other way (Leake on Contracts, 5th Edition, page 647). In any case no such reservation is contained in section 41 of the Contract Act and so long as the payments made by Musammat Latif-un-nissa and Musammat Ruqaiya subsist, the plaintiff has no right to recover the same amount over again from the respondents. It was open to him to make a refund to both of them either before or during the pendency of this suit He did not do so and a conditional decree cannot be passed in this case because Musammat Latif-un-nissa and Musammat Ruqaiya are not parties to the present proceedings.

Res judicata—Suit by or against manager of joint Hindu family—Effect of decree in such suit on other members of family.

The manager of a joint Hindu family can both sue and be sued in his representative capacity and a decision fairly obtained against him is binding on the other members of the family and operates as res judicata in a subsequent suit.

Harilal v. Nimman Kunwar, 9 A. L. J. 819; 34 A. 549; 15 Ind. Cas. 126, Madan Lal v. Kishun Singh, 9 A. L. J. 844, 34 A. 572; 15 Ind. Cas. 138, followed.

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge of Ghazipur, dated 16th December 1911.

Mr. Mohanlal Sandal, for the Appellants.

Mr. M. L. Agarwala, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The circumstances of the case out of which this appeal has arisen are as follows:—The present plaintiff Bindhachal Rai, major son of Lal Bahadur Rai, and the three minor plaintiffs formed with the defendants 2nd party Lal Bahadur Rai, etc., a joint Hindu family, the manager of the family being Lal Bahadur Rai. Lal Bahadur Rai and the other defendants of the 2nd party brought a suit in the Revenue Court for the ejectment of the defendants 1st party from two plots of land Nos. 549/2 and 551, claiming that the defendants 1st party were their sub-tenants and the land was their own sir land. The defence to that suit was that the defendants were proprietors and owners of plot No. 549/2 and occupancy-tenants of plot No. 551.

The Revenue Court decided all the questions which arose between the parties and held in favour of the defendants therein in respect of both plots. The present suit has been brought in the Civil Court by the remaining members of the joint family for the ejectment of the same defendants from this land and for joint possession together with the 2nd set of defendants. One of the pleas taken in defence was that the suit was barred by the rule of res judicata. The case was also contested on the merits. The Court of first instance held on the merits against the plaintiffs and also held that the suit was barred by the rule of res judicata. The lower Appellate Court on appeal only decided the question of law, and agreeing with the first Court dismissed the appeal. Hence this second appeal, the point raised being that the present suit is not barred by the rule of res judicata. There is no question that the family is joint and the property in question as claimed is the joint family property. The plaintiffs clearly ask for possession jointly with the defendants 2nd party. It is also not denied that Lal Bahadur Rai was the managing member of the family. There cannot be the slightest doubt that the first suit brought in the Revenue Court was brought by the adult members of the family and the managing member not on behalf of themselves alone but on behalf of the joint family. It seems, therefore, clear to my mind that the principle, on which decisions of the Full Bench in Hari Lal v. Nimman Kunwar (1) and that of Madan Lal v. Kishun Singh (2) rest, applies with equal force in the present case The former suit having been brought by the managing member of the family on behalf of that family and the decision therein having been obtained fairly and without fraud is binding on the other members of the joint family who were duly represented in the former litigation. It is unnecessary, in my opinion, to mention other previous decisions of this and other High Courts in India in reference to the same point. It must be taken as finally and definitely settled that the manager of a joint Hindu family can both sue and be sued in his representative capacity, and decisions fairly obtained against him are binding on the other members of the family who were fully represented by him in the former litigation. There is no question that the former decision by the Revenue Court is binding as against those persons who were plaintiffs in that suit, and as the present plaintiffs were fully represented in that litigation, they are fully bound by that decision. In this view, the present suit is barred, and the plaintiff's appeal in the lower Court was rightly dismissed. This appeal, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs including fees on the higher scale.

Where a prior mortgagee has obtained a decree for sale without impleading the puisne mortgagee in his suit, and has in execution of the decree purchased the mortgaged property himself, the puisne mortgagee, when seeking to redeem the prior mortgage, is bound to pay the prior mortgagee interest at the mortgage rate and not at the decree rate.

The puisne mortgagee cannot treat the prior mortgagee as a mortgagee for one purpose and a decree-holder for another.

Second appeal from the decree of the Court by the District Court of Tanjore, in A. S. No. 874 of 1904, preferred against that of the Court of the Subordinate Judge at Kumbakonam, in O. S. No. 15 of 1903.

Mr. P. R. Ganapathi Aiyar, for the Appellant.

Messrs. T. Rangachariar and V. Narasimha Aiyangar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case, so far as they are necessary for the disposal of this appeal, are as follows:—

The 1st and 2nd defendants mortgaged the suit properties first to the 3rd defendant and then to the assignor of the present plaintiff. The 3rd defendant brought a suit in Original Suit No. 41 of 1887 against the mortgagors without making the puisne mortgagee a party; in execution of that decree, he brought the property to sale and bought it. The plaintiff then brought a suit against the 3rd defendant claiming to redeem.

The 5th and 6th issues in the suit were as to the amount that the plaintiff should pay to the 3rd defendant in redemption. The District Judge on appeal called for findings on those issues as the parties conceded that they were necessary and the Subordinate Judge, on the authority of the case in Thennappa Chettiar v. Marimuthu Nadan (1), decided that the account should be taken on the footing that the prior mortgage of the 3rd defendant was still in existence, and calculated the amount due accordingly. Against that basis, the plaintiff did not appeal but confined himself to objecting to the rate of interest allowed and the calculation of the profits accrued to the 3rd defendant since his possession under the sale. He renews those objections here in second appeal, but in addition seeks to take other grounds. The first additional ground is that the Court should have given him a decree for redemption without ascertaining the amount due. We decline to allow him to raise this contention as the 5th and 6th issues were sent down for a finding with his concurrence. The other additional ground is that the decision in Thennappa Chettiar v. Marimuthu Nadan (1) is wrong and all that he can be called on to pay is the amount found due under the decree obtained by the 3rd defendant in his suit with subsequent interest at the decree rate, and he urges that there is a decision of the Privy Council to that effect since the date when he filed his grounds of appeal in the lower Appellate Court. We have allowed him to raise it. It has now to be seen whether his contention is correct. The decision referred to is reported

BIRJ LAL v. BUA RAM.

Mahomed Ibrahim Hussain Khan v. Ambika Pershad Singh (2). The passages relied on are on pages 558 and 559. The Board lay down that the puisne mortgagee is entitled to redeem the prior mortgage on payment of the principal and interest in respect of which the property was sold to him under the decree for sale. The Privy Council do not say that the amount decreed is to be paid. There is no argument on this point; the head-note does not treat these words as a decision to this effect, and lastly the Privy Council do not purport to be overruling their prior decision on this point reported as Umes Chander Sircar v. Zahur Fatima (3). This case was most carefully considered by this Court in the case above referred to [Thenappa Chettiar v Marimuthu Nadan (1)] and the following passage is extracted from it in the judgment of this Court:—"The plaintiff comes to take away from the prior mortgagee the benefit of her decree. It would be unjust if he could use the decree to cut down her interest while he deprives her of the whole advantage of it. * * * If she is still a mortgagee, she should be allowed such benefit as the mortgage gives her." On this passage, this Court held that there was no room for the contention that the puisne mortgagee ought to be allowed to choose whether to adopt or disregard the account directed by the decree. We are of a like opinion that the question is precluded by the authority of the Privy Council and the principle on which it proceeds is clearly enunciated. The prior mortgagee has lost the right arising out of his decree and purchase in execution sale by reason of his failure to make the puisne mortgagee a party as required by section 85 of the Transfer of Property Act. He is reverted to his position as a mortgagee and is now liable to lose the property by being redeemed. He is, therefore, sufficiently penalised and the puisne mortgagee cannot treat him as a mortgagee for one purpose and a decree-holder for another. There is nothing in the later judgment of the Privy Council which is inconsistent with the reasoning of their Lordships in this case, and we are bound by it. That objection, therefore, fails. As to the two grounds taken in appeal, both in the lower Appellate Court and before us, we agree with the lower Appellate Court in its construction of the 3rd defendant's mortgage as to the evidence of the compound interest and we are also of opinion that if the provision is penal, it is not in excess of what would constitute reasonable compensation. The result is, that this second appeal is dismissed with costs.

Time for redemption is extended to three months from this date.

BUA RAM AND OTHERS—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLI, r. 19—Appeal dismissed in absence of both parties—Restoration—Notice to other side, whether necessary.

If an appeal is dismissed on account of both the appellant and respondent being absent on the day of hearing, no notice to the respondent is necessary before passing an order of restoration of appeal.

Civil revision against a decree of the Additional Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore, dated the 28th of August 1911.

Mr. Benode Behari, for the Applicant.

Mr. Govind Prashad, for the Respondents.

ORDER.—This is an application in revision under section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure against the order of the learned Additional Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore, restoring the appeal of the opposite party which had been struck off for default. It is contended on behalf of the applicant that the order of the lower Court restoring the appeal is bad inasmuch as no notice was sent to or served upon the applicant to show cause why the appeal of the opposite party should not be restored. It is further contended that the affidavit filed by the opposite party in the lower Court explaining his absence on the day of hearing of the appeal is insufficient and does not excuse his absence. The order of the lower Court was passed under rule 19, Order XLI of the Code of Civil Procedure.

That rule does not require any notice to be issued to the respondents prior to making an order of restoration of an appeal, struck off for default. But, it is said for the applicant that under section 107 clause 2, the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure applicable to Courts of first instance are also applicable to the Appellate Courts and under the rules applicable to the Courts of first instance, no suit dismissed for default can be restored without notice to the defendant. The rules on the subject of dismissal and restoration of suits are given in Order IX of the Code. If a suit is dismissed in the absence of both the plaintiff and the defendant, the suit can be restored on the application of the plaintiff without issuing any notice to the defendant. But in cases where the plaintiff is absent and the defendant is present, the law requires that notice should be given to the defendant before restoring the suit. Even if the contention of the applicants that under section 107, clause 2, the rules under Order IX, applicable to the Courts of first instance, are also applicable to the Appellate Courts be conceded, it does not show that the order of the lower Court is erroneous. For it appears from the record that neither party was present on the day of hearing of the appeal, when the order of dismissal of the appeal was passed. In a suit dismissed under similar circumstances, no notice would be required to be issued to the defendant before passing an order of restoration of the case. The second contention that the affidavit of the opposite party does not disclose sufficient reason for his absence on the day of hearing of the appeal is not made out. If the allegations made in the affidavit are correct, and there is no reason to believe otherwise, the opposite party was unavoidably absent on the day of hearing of the appeal. The application fails and is dismissed with costs.

Application dismissed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 47 (2), 50—Execution—Suit for money due under order against legal representative—Objection by legal representative to procedure—Jurisdiction of execution Court to convert suit against legal representative into execution proceedings.

An order for payment of batta, recoverable as in execution, was passed by a Court and the petition in execution for its recovery was transferred to another Court. Subsequently, the party against whom the order was made died. A suit for recovery of the money was then filed in the second Court against his legal representative, who objected that the matter was one for execution and under section 50, Civil Procedure Code, he could only be brought in by the Court which passed the order. The executing Court decided to treat the suit as an execution petition and the legal representative as a party to it, and proceeded to make an order against him:

Held, (1) that the order was wrong;

(2) that the legal representative had not been brought in under section 50, Civil Procedure Code, and could not be proceeded against in execution;

(3) that the Court, which passed the order sought to be executed, could only bring the legal representative on the record.

Petitions, under section 115, Act V of 1908, praying the High Court to revise the orders of the District Court of Salem, in Appeal Suits Nos. 189, 193 and 223 of 1909, respectively, preferred against those of the Court of the Principal District Munsif of Salem, in E. P. Nos. 299, 300 and 301 of 1909, respectively, in O. S. No. 176 of 1902, on the file of the Court of the Additional District Munsif of Salem.

Mr. T. M. Krishnaswami Aiyar, for the Petitioner.

Mr. B. Sitarama Rao, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The Additional District Munsif's Court at Salem passed an order under section 182 of Act XIV of 1882 (Order XVI, rule 4 of Act V of 1908) for payment of batta, which is recoverable as in execution under rule 13 of Order XVI of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The petition in execution was transferred to the Principal District Munsif's Court. Subsequently, the party against whom the order had been made died, and a suit was filed in the same Court against his legal repersentative, who appeared and objected that the matter was one for execution and that, under section 50 of the Code of Civil Procedure, he could only be brought in by the Court that passed the order. The District Munsif, under section 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure, decided to treat the suit as an execution petition and the legal representative as a party to it and proceeded to make an order against him. I agree with the District Judge that this was wrong, as the legal respresentative had not been brought in under section 50, Civil Procedure Code, and the fact that he appeared and objected to the suit and to the right of the Court to bring him in shows that he never waived his right.

The petitions are dismissed with costs.

Petitions dismissed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. IX, r. 5, O. XVII, r. 3—Summons returned unserved—Time given to appellant to take further steps—No steps taken within time—Power of Court to proceed to decide appeal.

A second appeal was filed in the High Court. Summonses to the respondents were returned unserved. Time was granted to the appellants to take further steps in the matter. No steps were taken within time. The Court ordered the appeal to be put up in ordinary course for hearing:

Held, (1) that under Order XVII, rule 3, the Court could proceed to decide the appeal, and that Order IX, rule 5, did not apply to the case;

(2) that Order IX, rule 5, did not give appellants the right to apply for a fresh summons at any time within a period of one year from the date of the return made to the Court by the serving officer.

Second appeal from the decision of the Subordinate Judge of Azamgarh, dated the 9th of June 1911.

Mr. Haribans Sahai, for the Appellants.

JUDGMENT.—Before we proceed to consider the points raised in this appeal, it is necessary to set out step by step the various stages through which the appeal has passed up to the present date. The petition of appeal was admitted on the 11th of November 1911 and an order was given to fix a date under Order XLI, rule 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The petition came up on the 25th of November 1911 in pursuance of the last order and the order then passed was: "Let the record be sent for at the appellants' expense." The necessary fee for carrying out this order was not deposited till the 6th of December. The case was put up again on the 20th of January 1912 and the order passed on that date was: "Let notice go." The notice was to the effect that the 7th of March was the date fixed for the hearing of the appeal. It is a custom in this Court to issue notices upon respondents only. So far as the appellants are concerned, information of the date is given to the learned Vakils, who represent them, by notices fixed upon a Notice Board in the centre of the Court building. The notices for the respondents left this Court on the 6th of February. They went in due course by post to the District of Azamgarh and from there by means of a process-server to the respondents. The return made by the process-server to the Court at Azamgarh in the case of certain respondents, who happened also to be appellants, was to the effect that these men were imprisoned in the Azamgarh Jail. The Azamgarh Court returned the notices to this Court as insufficiently served. They reached this Court upon the 1st of March and on the 7th of March, the papers were put up with a report which runs as follows:—

"To-day is the date fixed for the hearing of this appeal. Notices issued to the respondents have been received duly served except those intended for respondents Nos. 1 and others (Jaisri Singh and others), which have been returned unserved with a report to the effect that they are imprisoned in the Azamgarh Jail." This report was presumably noted by those who appeared for the appellants and on that report, they asked this Court for further time. The fact that Jaisri Singh was in Jail was thus prominently brought to the notice of the learned Vakil for the appellants on the 7th of March 1912. A period of one month was granted and it was pointed out that no further grace will be given unless the Court is satisfied that immediate action is taken and good cause is shown by affidavi

JAISARI SINGH v. JAISARI SINGH.

So far as we can see, there would have been no difficulty in the learned Vakil for the appellants having notice conveyed to the Azamgarh Jail that the Court demanded prompt action and getting from the clients the necessary information for having notices served. On the 10th of April, the file was again put up and attention called to the fact that up to that date no steps had been taken. The learned Judge of this Court, before whom the papers came, directed that the appeal should be put up in the ordinary course for hearing and it was so put up on the 1st of May. The case then stood out for a week, but nothing was done by the appellants until the 10th of May when they asked this Court to issue fresh notices and they supported their petition by an affidavit. The affidavit is noted as solemnly affirmed by Jaisri Singh. He sets out that he is a member of a joint Hindu family and the karta of the family, that he and the next senior member of the family were imprisoned on the 17th of February 1912 and were released on the 16th of March, that there was no other member acquainted with the facts of the case, and, in consequence, no information or necessary costs were supplied to the learned Vakil, that neither he nor his next senior member had any information of the orders of this Court till a letter was received from the office of the learned Vakil, dated the 11th of April 1912 and that this letter reached about the 3rd week of April 1912. A learned Judge of this Court, before whom this appeal came in the ordinary course, passed an order on the 7th of June 1912, referring the appeal for disposal to a Bench of two Judges and it is thus that the appeal has reached this Bench.

In his referring order, he points out that on the 27th of May 1912, the appellants presented an application, the gist of which was that by reason of the provisions of Order IX, rule 5, Civil Procedure Code, the appellants were entitled as of right to apply for issue of fresh notices within any period up to one year from the 7th of March 1912, the date on which the notices originally issued were returned unserved. The learned Judge adds that he has little doubt personally that the provisions of Order IX, rule 5, cannot be applied to appeals in the manner contended for. We agree with him. We would go further and add that Order IX, rule 5 does not, as the appellants contend, give them a right of applying for a fresh summons at any time within a period of one year from the date of the return made to the Court by the serving officer. If we were to hold this, it would follow that every appeal could be held up at the pleasure of the appellant for a whole year. Order IX, rule 5 is an order enabling Courts to pass an order of dismissal at the time and upon the conditions set out in the rule. There is not a word in the rule which gives a right to the appellants to do or to abstain from doing any thing. In reality, it has no application whatever to the circumstances of the present case.

The facts then briefly summed up are as follows:—

The appellants instituted an appeal Notice was duly conveyed to the learned Vakil who appears for them pointing out that the appeal will be heard on the 7th of March. It also came to the knowledge of the learned Vakil for the appellants in ample time that his clients were confined in the Azamgarh Jail and it was presumably on this knowledge that he asked for further grace within which to issue notices upon the respondents. The period of one month was granted to him and, so far as the record goes, there is nothing to show that either he or his clients took any steps of any kind within the period allotted. The case then falls within the four corners of Order XVII, rule 3. It was necessary for the further progress of the appeal that notices should be served on the respondents. Time was granted for this very purpose and as no action was taken within the time allotted, this Court determined to proceed with the appeal. As we have already said, there is absolutely nothing on the record which points to any action taken in pursuance of our order of the 7th of March 1912. The learned Vakil for the appellants tells us, and we have not the slightest reason for doubting his word, that he did send letters to his clients. We understand him to say that he sent letters to the village in which they ordinarily reside. Knowing that they were at the time imprisoned in the Azamgarh Jail, these letters ran considerable danger of being neglected. Anyhow, the letters appear to have been treated with neglect and we do not see any reason why we should not, as the law permits, proceed to decide the appeal.

As regards the appeal itself, the findings of fact are entirely against the appellants. The appeal fails and is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

FIRST CIVIL APPEAL NO. 31 OF 1912.

Musammat GAYA KUNWAR—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT

versus

DAL SINGH—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Hindu Law—Presumption as to jointness—Separation, burden of proof as to—Pleadings, effect of failure to prove facts alleged in.

Where a Hindu family, and more particularly a family consisting of two brothers, is once proved or admitted to be joint, there is a clear presumption in favour of the continuance of such jointness until the contrary is proved.

The failure of a party to prove the particular allegations of fact set up in pleadings does not necessarily involve the failure of that party's case.

Appeal against an order of the Additional Judge, Hardoi, dated 1st December 1911.

Babu Ishwari Prasad, for the Appellant.

Babu Bisheshar Nath, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT —In this case, the plaintiff Dal Singh had a brother Bhola Singh, who died in September 1908.

The brothers were possessed of zemindari property in the village of Mawaiya which appears to have been recorded in the Revenue papers as belonging to the two of them in equal shares. Mutation of names in respect of Bhola Singh's share was effected in the name of his widow Musammat Gaya Kunwar, without any opposition on the part of Dal Singh. About the beginning of the year 1911, Musammat Gaya Kunwar instituted a suit for profits against Dal Singh in the Rent Courts which ended in a decree in her favour. The plaintiff brings the present suit to recover possession of the share standing in the name of his widowed sister-in-law, though he admits that the decree in his favour may be made subject to an order allowing the defendant for her maintenance such sum as the Court may deem proper. The plaintiff's case is that he and his brother Bhola Singh were members of a joint undivided Hindu family up to the death of the latter when he himself became by survivorship the owner of the entire property which had previously belonged to the two of them. According to the plaintiff, Musammat Gaya Kunwar was entitled to nothing more than maintenance, and was never given anything more, although out of courtesy and consideration for her feelings, the plaintiff acquiesced in her being recorded in the village papers as having succeeded to the ownership of Bhola Singh's share. His case is, that for a couple of years or so after Bhola Singh's death, she lived on amicable terms with him, during which time he was himself in possession of the property in dispute, only maintaining the defendant in a manner suitable to her position ; but that disputes arose owing to Musammat Gaya Kunwar's mind being poisoned against him by a co-sharer in the village, named Dulam Singh, who was an enemy of the plaintiff and who has persuaded Musammat Gaya Kunwar to make him her general attorney. Hence the latter was induced to bring the suit for profits, and the result of this suit is treated by the plaintiff as virtually effecting his dispossession from the property in dispute in favour of Musammat Gaya Kunwar, so that he dates the origin of the cause of action from the 9th of May 1911, when the decree for profits was passed by the Rent Court. The defence, of course, was that Bhola Singh was separate from Dal Singh at the time of the former's death, and that Musammat Gaya Kunwar has been since September 1908 in lawful possession as a Hindu widow of her late husband's share. The learned Subordinate Judge, who first took cognizance of the suit, fixed two issues, one as to the question of jointness or separation between the plaintiff and Bhola Singh, and the other as to the sum which could be awarded to Musammat Gaya Kunwar by way of maintenance in the event of the plaintiff's having succeeded in establishing his title. The suit came up for hearing in the presence of the successor of the Subordinate Judge who had originally fixed the issues, and the latter thought it necessary, before commencing to record the evidence, to re-cast the first issue in the case so as to make it clear at the outset where the burden of proof lay. He stated the main issue in the case in the following form :—" Whether

GAYA KUNWAR v. DAL SINGH.

Bhola Singh, husband of the defendant, separated from the plaintiff 4 ½ years ago ?" The period mentioned in this issue is with reference to an express plea taken in the defendant's written statement that there was a separation between the brothers somewhere about the beginning of the year 1907; that is to say, between 1½ and 2 years prior to the death of Bhola Singh. The learned Subordinate Judge has found against the defendant and in favour of the plaintiff on the issue thus framed ; he has accordingly decreed the plaintiff's suit subject to an obligation laid upon the latter to pay a sum of Rs. 12 per mensem to the defendant by way of maintenance. In the memorandum of appeal to this Court, there is a plea that the amount of maintenance fixed is in any case insufficient ; as to this, I can only say that it appears to me a very suitable sum, regard being had to the value of the property in suit and the position of the parties. The main question, however, raised by the appeal is as to the finding of the Court below on the issue of jointness or separation. The appellant makes it matter of complaint that the issue was re-cast in such a form as to lay the burden of proof on the wrong party, and also that the defendant was required to produce her evidence immediately after the re-casting of the issue.

I notice that in the Court below, after the defendant had examined all the witnesses she had originally arranged to produce at the first hearing, she obtained from the Court an adjournment to enable her to produce further evidence and actually examined five fresh witnesses on a subsequent date to which the hearing was adjourned. The defendant, therefore, was in no way prejudiced by the procedure adopted by the learned Subordinate Judge.

On the pleadings, it was, in my opinion, rightly held that the defendant must produce her evidence first. It is quite true that in a suit for ejectment the burden lies in the first instance on the plaintiff of proving both title and possession within limitation : but in all suits the frame of the issues and the allocation of the burden of proof does not depend on the plaint alone but on the pleadings of both parties. In this case, the defendant admitted that the property in suit had within limitation belonged to the plaintiff and to his brother Bhola Singh jointly, as members of a joint undivided Hindu family : the death of Bhola Singh had occurred within less than three years of the institution of the suit, and from no possible point of view, could any bar of limitation be pleaded against the plaintiff's suit. In order to establish his title, the plaintiff had only to prove that he and Bhola Singh remained joint up to the time of the death of the latter ; the defendant in her written statement admitted that they were joint less than two years before the time of Bhola Singh's death, and from this admission a presumption arose that this jointness continued unless and until the contrary was proved. The law on this point was very clearly laid down by a Bench of this Court in Suraj Baksh v. Raghuraj Kunwar (1). This ruling is, perhaps, open to criticism in some matters of detail, particularly with regard to certain remarks on page 389 of the report where the judgment in Badamoo Koer v. Wazeer Singh (2) is quoted, apparently with approval. This ruling goes too far and can no longer be regarded as good law since the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Appovier's case (3), as was remarked by the learned Judges of the Calcutta High Court in Joy Narain Giri v. Goluck Chundar Mytee (4). I have thought it worth while to notice this point, as it has more than once been made matter of argument before me ; but I have no desire to dissent from the general principles laid down by this Court in the ruling in question. I have no doubt that where a Hindu family, and more particularly a family consisting of two brothers, is once proved or admitted to be joint, there is a clear presumption in favour of the continuance of such jointness until the contrary can be proved. The only criticism to which the procedure of the learned Subordinate Judge in the present case seems to be fairly open is as to the precise form in which the main issue was re-cast. I do not see myself why the learned Judge of the Court below should not have been content with leaving the issue as framed by his predecessor, and merely pointing out that, on the pleadings, the burden of proof was laid upon the defendant, inasmuch as the presumption of law already referred to would have entitled the plaintiff to succeed if no evidence had been tendered by either side. The form of issue actually laid down is open to this objection, that it suggests that the defendant's case must fail unless she was in a position to prove that a separation between Bhola Singh and Dal Singh took place at the precise time alleged in the defendant's written statement. This would not, in my opinion, be a perfectly correct statement of the law applicable to the case. The fact of separation between two brothers, who were at one time admittedly living as members of a joint undivided family, is one which, like all other facts, is susceptible of proof either by direct or by circumstantial evidence. It could be proved by direct evidence, if the party alleging such separation were in a position to satisfy the Court that upon some definite occasion the two brothers met together and made by common consent a certain disposition of the joint family property which was intended by both of them to effect from that moment a separation in law. It is, however, quite conceivable that a party alleging separation to have taken place might not be in a position to satisfy the Court as to the precise manner in which, or the precise occasion on which, such separation was effected: but it might, nevertheless, be possible to adduce evidence of conduct on the part of either or both of the brothers, or of admissions made by them, so inconsistent with the idea of jointness as to satisfy the Court that, on or before some definite date, separation must have taken place. This is what I mean by proving the fact of separation by circumsatntial evidence. The circumstances of the present case were, no doubt, peculiar, in that separation was pleaded by a defendant who was in a position to have full and detailed knowledge as to the circumstances of the family and the proceedings of the two brothers, and was, moreover, expressly alleged in the pleadings to have taken place at or about a certain definite time and to have been effected by a single definite transaction. Nevertheless, I should be quite prepared in the present case to give the defendant the benefit of the general principle of law that failure to prove particular allegations of fact set up in the pleadings does not necessarily involve the failure of a party's case. The plaintiff's position in this very suit furnishes an illustration of the principle to which I refer. The plaintiff, undoubtedly, came into Court with the allegation that Musammat Gaya Kunwar did not obtain separate possession of Bhola Singh's share immediately upon the death of the latter, that the mutation of names effected in the defendant's favour was a mere paper transaction and not in accordance with the actual facts, and that the plaintiff's possession over the whole of the joint family property continued until he was virtually dispossessed as regards Bhola Singh's share by the decree of May the 9th, 1911. As I shall have occasion to point out more in detail presently, the plaintiff's suit does not necessarily fail if it be found that he has not established these precise allegations to the satisfaction of the Court. The long and the short of the matter is, that the one substantial issue in the case is whether Bhola Singh did or did not continue up to the time of his death in a state of jointness with his brother Dal Singh. This issue was fully tried out in the Court below and both parties were allowed every reasonable opportunity of producing evidence. I have simply to consider that evidence in the light of correct principles of law and to record my finding thereon. The defendant undertook, first of all, to prove that a definite separation took place between Bhola Singh and Dal Singh somewhere about the beginning of the year 1907 A. D. She went into the witness-box herself and called a number of witnesses. This evidence has been adversely criticised by the learned Subordinate Judge and entirely discredited by him. I have been taken through it in detail and I feel no hesitation in concurring with the opinion of the lower Court on this point. The two principal witnesses were Pitam (D. W. No. 6) and Umrai (D. W. No. 7) who alleged that they themselves, along with two other persons, acted as Panches, or arbitrators, in effecting a definite separation and partition of goods between the two brothers at the request of both of them. The learned Subordinate Judge has laid stress upon a number of discrepancies in the statements of these two witnesses, both as between themselves and as between either of them and the defendant Musamma

(2) 5 W. R. 78; 1 Ind. Jur. (N. S.) 144.

GAYA KUNWAR v. DAL SINGH.

Gaya Kunwar. I concur in the opinion that these discrepancies are numerous and important and in themselves sufficient seriously to discredit the evidence. It is impossible to regard contradictions upon a question of such importance as whether the alleged partition was or was not accompanied by any memorandum in writing, and as to the nature of the written memorandum, if any, so prepared, as matters of merely subsidiary importance or explicable upon such suggestions as failure of memory on the part of the witnesses. I am, moreover, most unfavourably impressed by the statements of these two witnesses as a whole. Pitam in particular showed himself shifty and unreliable to a degree: he repeatedly varied his statement on a number of points, and on the question as to whether any matters in connection with the partition were or were not reduced to writing, it seems to have been exceedingly difficult to pin him down to any definite assertion. He finished by admitting that he had been sued for arrears of rent by the plaintiff Dal Singh, and that he had set up a defence in that suit utterly inconsistent with all the allegations of fact made by him in his evidence before the Court. He cannot escape from this dilemma, that he either gave false evidence in Court, or set up a defence in the rent suit which was false to his knowledge. Umrai began his evidence in a singularly unconvincing manner by assuring the Court that he had nothing to say except what Pitam had already stated. He was obviously anxious to avoid being cross-examined as to details, and, considering the contradictions in which he involved himself when he was so cross-examined, this seems to me by no means surprising. I regard these two witnesses as having completely broken down. The rest of the oral evidence for the defendant is, on the very face of it, all but worthless. As regards a number of her witnesses, the learned Pleader who very ably argued her case before this Court was compelled to state that he did not rely upon them; and it would in fact be doing more than justice to the defendant's case to exclude the evidence of these witnesses from the record altogether for some of them [for instance Zalim Singh (D.W. No. 2), Hardeo Bakhsh (D.W.No. 3), Durga Prasad (D.W. No. 11) and Dal Singh (D.W. No. 13)] either made statements favourable to the plaintiff's case, or broke down in a manner calculated to throw discredit upon other evidence produced by the party whose witnesses they were. The remaining witnesses seem to me to call for very little notice. Rohan Singh (D. W. No. 4) endeavoured to prove separation between the brothers in mess, residence and business, that is to say, in the cultivation of their fields. He broke down completely over the question of separate cultivation. As regards residence, he either proves nothing or proves separation ten years prior to the institution of the suit, which is not the defendant's case. Separation in mess he has only noticed as between the plaintiff and the defendant since the death of Bhola Singh. D. W. No. 5, Balwant and D. W. No. 14, Narpat, endeavoured to prove separate transactions by the two brothers supposed to be inconsistent with the idea of jointness. The cross-examination of these witnesses makes it apparent that there is very little in this evidence. Balwant Singh speaks of receiving payments on account of the interest on a certain debt separately from the brothers, but he says the separate payments began about "7 or 8 years ago," that is to say, at a time when the two brothers were admittedly joint. The witness Shankar (D.W. No. 10) endeavoured to prove separate cultivation, but showed in cross-examination that he had exceedingly little knowledge as to the facts. In short, the oral evidence produced by the defendant broke down and cannot be said to have done her case anything but harm. In so far as the defendant has any case at all, it must be based upon the transactions which followed on the death of Bhola Singh, upon the attitude taken up by the plaintiff Dal Singh when he was sued for arrears of profits, and upon particular admissions made by Dal Singh in the written statement filed by him as a defendant in the profits suit. Some of the arguments addressed to me on these points are by no means without real force. I quite admit that the mere fact that mutation of names in respect of Bhola Singh's recorded share was effected in favour of Musammat Gaya Kunwar after her husband's death does raise a certain presumption, in fact and in law, that she was permitted to take actual possession in respect of that portion of the family property which represented the share which her husband would have obtained on partition. I also admit that the correct defence which Dal Singh might and ought to have set up against the suit for profits would have been a denial of Musammat Gaya Kunwar's title, and that this defence was not raised. I admit further that certain allegations of fact in the written statement filed by Dal Singh before the Rent Court as to debts contracted by Bhola Singh, as to the separate cultivation of sir lands by himself and by Musammat Gaya Kunwar, and, more particularly, a vague allegation at the end of his written statement to the effect that he was meditating the institution of a suit against Musammat Gaya Kunwar on account of her extravagant expenditure, are more or less inconsistent with the position taken up by the plaintiff on the present suit. On every one of these points, however, there is something to be said on the other side. There is, of course, no suggestion that the decree in the suit for profits, operates as res judicata in the present case; nor is there anything in Dal Singh's conduct in connection with that suit upon which a plea of estoppel can fairly be raised in the present case. It is merely a question of rightly estimating the effect of certain admissions which the defendant is in a position to prove against the plaintiff. I note that when Musammat Gaya Kunwar sued Dal Singh for arrears of profits she, at or about the same time, applied to the Revenue Courts for partition of her share; now, although Dal Singh omitted to base his defence in the suit for profits upon a denial of the plaintiff's title, he did meet with such denial the claim for partition. There is force in the suggestion that Dal Singh's pleadings in the suit for profits were based upon bad advice upon a question of law, and an erroneous belief that a plea in denial of the plaintiff's title would not be accepted by the Rent Court in face of the record of Musammat Gaya Kunwar's possession in the village papers. I take it to be clearly established law that in the Province of Oudh, the presumption raised by the entry of a person's name in the Revenue Records as proprietor of a certain share is a rebuttable presumption, even in a suit for profits; but the circumstances of this case were peculiar, and it is conceivable that an erroneous impression as to the possibility of raising such a plea may have been founded upon a misunderstanding of such principles of law as were laid down by this Court in Sitla Bakhsh v. Musammat Umed Koer (5). What chiefly impresses me, however, regarding this part of the case is that the defendant's evidence goes but a small way towards establishing the vital fact of a separation between Dal Singh and Bhola Singh in the life-time of the latter. I find from the evidence that Bhola Singh was some 14 years older than the plaintiff. It seems clear also that he had incurred, in his capacity as manager of the family property, considerable debts, so that the income of the property was hypothecated and a portion of it was in the enjoyment of usufructuary mortgagees. I notice that in the suit for profits, Dal Singh expressly pleaded that the actual income receivable from the khalsa lands, after putting aside the sir and the plots in the possession of mortgagees, was barely sufficient to cover the Government demand on account of land revenue and on account of certain takavi advances which Bhola Singh had taken. I do not say that these pleas are fully established by the evidence before me, but there seems at least some foundation for them. It may well have been that, under the circumstances, Dal Singh was easily induced to consent to such arrangements being made on the death of his elder brother which did virtually amount to an assumption by that elder brother's widow of some sort of possession in respect of the family property going beyond what she was strictly entitled to in law. The entry of the name of a widow in the Revenue Records "for purposes of consolation," as the phrase goes, is not a very uncommon thing in this Province, even in cases where the family was really joint. Dal Singh was bound, in any case, to maintain his elder brother's widow in a suitable manner; he may well have felt reluctance about coming to an open rupture with her immediately after his brother's death, and such considerations as these would sufficiently account for most, if not all, of the circumstances which are now relied upon on behalf of Musammat Gaya Kunwar as proving that there must have been a separation between the brothers in Bhola Singh's life-time. It must be remembered that I only put forward these considerations after having fully considered the direct evidence produced by the defendant to prove the fact of separation and having rejected that evidence as unreliable. What remains in the defendant's case is an attempt to establish the fact of separation by what I may call circumstantial evidence. The defendant, in effect, endeavours to show that certain things were said and done by Dal Singh after Bhola Singh's death, in respect of which it is argued that it is inconceivable that Dal Singh should have so acted if Bhola Singh had in fact died in a state of union. When it comes to estimating the effect of circumstantial evidence, it is always necessary for the Court to consider how far the facts put forward justify the inferences sought to be drawn from them, and this necessarily involves considering also whether the alleged facts are not fairly open to other inferences. If it had been necessary for the plaintiff to prove affirmatively that the mutation of names in favour of Musammat Gaya Kunwar on the death of Bhola Singh was a mere paper transaction, and that no sort of possession in respect of the joint family property had been allowed to the defendant after her husband's death, I might have felt considerable doubt about recording a finding in the plaintiff's favour. This, however, is not the position of the parties on the pleadings. Even if it were proved up to the hilt (which it is not) that Musammat Gaya Kunwar had assumed, immediately upon Bhola Singh's death, complete possession of a share in the family property representing the half share which would have been Bhola Singh's upon partition, the present suit would still be within limitation, and the plaintiff would still have established his title if the Court were satisfied that Bhola Singh and Dal Singh were in a state of jointness when the former died. A man in the position of the present plaintiff might well be prepared to allow considerable latitude to his elder brother's widow, and to submit, up to a certain point, to encroachments on her part, so long as the two continued on good terms and the general management of the family property remained in the plaintiff's hands, yet he would be perfectly entitled to stand upon his full real rights when circumstances arose which appeared to him to render such a course necessary, and any previous acquiescence on his part would not debar him from proving his title so long as the defendant was not in a position to plead limitation. There is one more circumstance about this case which I think worth noticing. After the defendant had closed her case, Dal Singh himself went into the witness-box. He also called one witness, an important one, namely, the Patwari of the village, in rebuttal of the defendant's case. I feel bound to attach a certain importance to the fact that no cross-examination of Dal Singh on behalf of the defendant was attempted. What the precise reason for this may have been is not altogether apparent from the record, but the fact itself is clear. The case is one in which the defendant relies largely upon admissions, and upon evidence of conduct amounting to admissions, on the part of the plaintiff to prove her case; under such circumstances, it was peculiarly incumbent on the defendant to press the plaintiffs upon these points in cross-examination. When the defendant made no attempt to do this, she seems to me, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, to have virtually thrown up the sponge so far as the Court below was concerned. It almost amounts to an admission that, upon the issue as framed by the learned Subordinate Judge, and on the view of the law which that Court was evidently prepared to take, the defendant felt it useless to contest the matter further. This appears to be a reason why the pleas in the memorandum of appeal to this Court are mainly directed towards the contention that the main issue in the case was wrongly framed in the Court below and that the decision of that Court proceeded upon an erroneous view of the law. I have already admitted that the precise form in which the issue was laid down by the Court below is open to question, but I am quite unable to hold that the defendant was in any way prejudiced thereby, inasmuch as she was allowed every opportunity of producing her entire evidence on the essential points in dispute. I have re-considered the evidence on the record carefully in the light of what I hold to be the correct law applicable to the facts and pleadings, and I still find myself in substantial agreement with the decision of the Court below. I am unable to hold that there was any separation in law between Bhola Singh and Dal Singh prior to the death of the former; it is admitted that they were living jointly within two years of Bhola Singh's death and the only finding I can come to is that this state of jointness continued so long as Bhola Singh was alive. This appeal therefore, fails and I dismiss it with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Agra Tenancy Act (II of 1901), s. 202—Defendant to Civil suit establishing his tenancy in Revenue Court, during the pendency of Civil suit—Civil Court bound by decision of Revenue Court—Sir, whether it loses its character as such by planting groves thereon.

A defendant to a Civil suit pleaded tenancy and, while the Civil suit was still pending, got his tenancy determined by the Revenue Court by means of a separate suit:

Held, that the decision of the Revenue Court was binding on the Civil Court.

The planting of trees on a sir holding does not necessarily mean that the land loses its character as such.

Second appeal from the decision of the Subordinate Judge of Agra, dated the 31st of May 1911.

Mr. Mohan Lal Sandal, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal and Appeal No. 164 of 1912 can be conveniently disposed of by one judgment. It appears that the plaintiff in the present appeal brought a suit to recover possession of certain immoveable property. He alleged his title to be that of an auction-purchaser, who had purchased the property at a sale made by the Court in execution of the mortgage-decree. It was pleaded by the defendants that the particular property, the subject-matter of the suit, was, not included in the mortgage and that it was not purchased by the plaintiff at the auction-sale. A number of issues were struck which were all decided in favour of the plaintiff. On first appeal, a new point was raised, namely, that the defendants were ex-proprietary tenants of the land in question. The Appellate Court, while agreeing with the finding of the Court of first instance generally, remanded the suit so as to enable the defendants to go in to the Revenue Court and have the question whether or not they were tenants there decided. An appeal against this order of remand was taken to this High Court and this Court set aside the order of the remand and directed the Subordinate Judge to proceed to determine the case upon the issues originally struck. These issues, as already mentioned, have already been decided for the most part in favour of the plaintiff and the only issue which remained was the question of mesne profits. In the meantime, however, and before the Subordinate Judge could make a decree in the plaintiff's favour, the defendants had brought a suit in the Revenue Court in which they had succeeded in getting a declaration that they were ex-proprietary tenants of the land in question. This decision of the Revenue Court was taken in first appeal to the District Judge who confirmed the decision of the Court of first instance. The Second Appeal No. 164 of 1912 arises out of this last mentioned suit. The decision of the Revenue Court, subsequently affirmed by the District Judge, was given effect to by the Subordinate Judge and on the strength of that decree, he dismissed the plaintiff's claim for possession.

It is argued, in the first place, that the Subordinate Judge ought to have paid no regard whatever to the decree of the Revenue Court on the ground that when the case was remanded by the High Court, the only matter left for disposal was the question of mesne profits. In our opinion, this contention is not sound. It is quite true that this High Court, by setting aside the order of remand of the Subordinate Judge, refused to allow the defendants any time to bring their suit in the Revenue Court. The defendants, however, were able to get this decree in their favour from the Revenue Court before the Civil suit was disposed of, and we, therefore, think that the Civil Court was bound to take cognizance of the decree of the Revenue Court in a matter which it was competent and had full jurisdiction to decide. Had it not done so, the result would have been that a new suit would be brought and the parties involved in further litigation.

The next point which was urged is, that the Revenue Court and the learned District Judge were both wrong in coming to the conclusion that the property in question was the sir of the defendants in the present suit. So far as this question is a question of fact, we are bound by the finding of the District Judge in second appeal. It is contended, however, that he was wrong in point of law and it was strongly urged by the learned Vakil for the appellants that the land in question, although originally sir, having been planted with trees lost its character of sir land and became a grove, and that, consequently, the defendants could not be ex-proprietary tenants thereof. We agree with the Assistant Collector and also the District Judge that the planting of trees does not necessarily mean that the land, which admittedly was Sir, loses its character as such. "Sir" has the same meaning in the Tenancy Act as it has in the Land Revenue Act, and in the Land Revenue Act, sir is defined as meaning not only land which has been continuously cultivated but also land which was recorded as sir before the commencement of the Act and has continued to be so recorded. There is a further definition which would include land which, according to the custom of the village, is treated as the special holding of a co-sharer. There can be very little doubt that the land in question was and is held as the sir of the defendants, and furthermore there can be no doubt that it has always been treated as their special holding. We, therefore, agree with the finding of the Revenue Court and the District Judge that the land in question was the sir of the defendants. This being so, it is absolutely clear that under the provisions of the Tenancy Act, on the sale of the proprietary title of the defendants on foot of the mortgage, they became ex-proprietary tenants of the land in question. The dismissal of the plaintiff's suit for possession was, therefore, quite correct.

As the objection was not taken as early as it might have been, we think that both parties ought to pay their own costs of the appeal. We accordingly dismiss the appeal but without costs.

Appeal dismissed.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of the case out of which these appeals have arisen are sufficiently stated in our order of the 1st December 1911, by which an issue was remitted for trial to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Fyzabad. Briefly put, the case was one in which the plaintiff-appellant, Syed Abdul Ghafur, brought a suit for recovery of possession of nine kothris, a graveyard with two Maqbaras and some keora trees. All this property is situated within an enclosure in the town of Ajudhia and is in close proximity to a mosque which is said to have been built many years ago by one Hyder Ali Beg. The most important issue in the case was the right of Syed Abdul Ghafur to maintain the suit. When the case was last up before a Bench of this Court, it was decided that the right of Abdul Ghafur to maintain this suit for recovery of possession depended upon the question whether the property in suit was waqf or not. As no finding on this specific issue had been come to by either of the Courts below, we decided to have the matter settled and for that purpose we remanded the case to the Subordinate Judge for determination of this issue and with directions to take all such evidence as the parties might choose to produce. The finding of the Subordinate Judge has now been received with all the evidence which was recorded. That evidence is to the effect that the income of the kothris in suit and the money derived from the sale of the keora flowers have been appropriated for the expenses of the mosque and that the graveyard in suit has been used as a public graveyard. In the opinion of the Subordinate Judge, these facts were sufficient to constitute the property waqf property. This finding of the Subordinate Judge is attacked here and we have allowed the matter to be discussed, for it appears to us that the question whether the specified property is or is not waqf property is a question of law or, at any rate, a mixed question of law and fact. We have listened to a lengthy argument on both sides and to a detailed criticism of all the evidence which has been given in the case and have come to the conclusion that the finding of the Subordinate Judge is not correct. Our conclusion, after consideration of the evidence, is that the plaintiff has failed to establish that the property in suit is waqf property. Before proceeding to consider in detail the evidence produced by the plaintiff, we may usefully refer to a decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council reported as Konwar Doorganath Roy v. Ram Chunder (1). In that case, their Lordships made certain observations as to the quantum of proof which is required in order to establish that any particular property put in suit was endowed property. It was laid down that a plaintiff who seeks to set aside an alienation of lands upon the ground that they are debutter, that is, dedicated in perpetuity to support the worship of an idol, must give strong and clear evidence of the endowment. It was also laid down that the mere fact that the rents of a particular mahal had been applied for a considerable period to the worship of an idol was not sufficient proof that the mahal was debutter. These observations would apply with equal force to a case in which it was claimed that the property in suit had been appropriated by way of endowment for the up-keep of a mosque and it seems to us that a plaintiff, who sues in ejectment for recovery of such property, has got to make out just as strong a case as a plaintiff who seeks to set aside an alienation of endowed lands. In the course of the judgment, their Lordships of the Privy Council, dealing with the evidence in the case before them, remarked of it that it was extremely vague and extremely loose. They stated their opinion that very strong and clear evidence must be produced in order to justify a finding that any property in dispute is endowed property. The learned Subordinate Judge has referred to this case and appears to have distinguished it from the present case on the ground that the evidence in the suit now before us was not open to the imputation of being "extremely vague and extremely loose." We are, however, unable to agree with the lower Court that any distinction between the two cases can be drawn on this ground. It appears to us that the evidence brought forward by the plaintiff may, with perfect justice, be described in the language which their Lordships of the Privy Council used with respect to the evidence which was led in the case above referred to. We would begin by remarking that it is admitted that there is no deed of endowment in existence. The plaintiff in support of his case, therefore, has been obliged to rely principally on oral evidence which has been mainly directed to show that the income of the property which is now in suit was applied for the up-keep of the mosque. Even if we accept that evidence as entirely reliable, it is clear from what has just been said that it would be insufficient to establish the fact of endowment for, as their Lordships observe in the case cited above, the mere appropriation of the rents of a particular property to the up-keep of a religious foundation is not sufficient proof that such property is endowed property. But we are not disposed to consider the evidence which the plaintiff produced as being reliable evidence even to show that the income of the disputed property was applied in the manner which the plaintiff alleges. There is a vast amount of contradiction in the statements of the witnesses and it is quite apparent that a great many of them made reckless statements which are not based upon any particular knowledge of their own. The most important witness on behalf of the plaintiff was Ahmad Ali Khan, a descendant of the founder of the mosque, and the person who sold certain property to the predecessor of the defendant on the 30th August 1878. The property sold was adjacent to the mosque and, as has already been explained in a previous part of our proceedings, certain items were exempted form transfer. It is these items which form the subject-matter of the present suit and which are said to constitute the endowed property which Syed Abdul Ghafur seeks to recover. Ahmad Ali Khan, as a descendant of the founder of the mosque, might naturally be expected to know more about the property in dispute than any one else. It cannot, however, be said that he has given any very satisfactory evidence upon the issue. He seems to be a man who lives principally in Lucknow and who only visits Ajudhia at rare intervals. However, his account of the property in dispute, that is to say, the Kothris and the graveyard, is that he looked after the mosque himself for some time and that in his absence, he committed the management of the mosque and its property to a person named Sheikh Inayat Husain. Pausing here, it may be remarked that this statement of Ahmad Ali would go to indicate that no scheme of management for the mosque had ever been formulated nor apparently had any regular mutawalli been appointed to look after any property dedicated to the support of the mosque. Ahmad Ali Khan goes on to say that the income from the Kothris and from the sale of the keora flowers was spent in the up-keep of the mosque. He does not give any very clear account as to what the income of the property was or as to the particular manner in which it was applied but he speaks in one portion of his evidence of accounts of the collections of the rent and of the expenditure having been explained at various times to him. This, again, is an important piece of evidence for it seems doubtful whether, if the property in suit was really endowed property, any accounts of the application of the income would have been rendered to Ahmad Ali Khan. As a matter of fact, there is a good deal of contradiction in the evidence as to whether such accounts were rendered or not. Some of the witnesses say they were, others say the contrary. Ahmad Ali further stated in his evidence that he had never been to the mosque since the year 1878 when he sold a portion of the property to Mahant Ram Sewak Das. Again, it is difficult to reconcile the various statements made by these witnesses as to the management of this property which he describes as waqf property. He first of all says that he entrusted the management of it to Sheikh Inayat Husain. At a later stage, his statement was to the effect that he had given over the management of the property to the plaintiff Abdul Ghafur some 18 years before the suit. This witness was examined again after the remand and in his evidence on that occasion he mentioned that the rents of the property used to be collected by one called Mahabbat who acted as Muazzan. He says it was after the death of Mahabbat that he entrusted the management of the property to Inayat Husain who was a Rais of Ajudhia. Subsequently, the witness says he handed over the management to Abdul Karim and the (Anjuman) Association of which Abdul Ghafur is the President. With respect to what is called the graveyard, the evidence of Ahmad Ali Khan is very clear and seems to us to dispose of the question as to whether or not this place of burial was dedicated to the public. Ahmad Ali Khan definitely states in his evidence that the only persons who have been buried there are the members of his family, his friends and his servants and any other person for whose interment permission was given by the mutawalli. We do not think that this statemant of Ahmad Ali Khan, if accepted, (and we do not see any reason why it should not be accepted as he is the person best qualified to testify in this respect), can be treated as proof of the facts alleged by the plaintiff that the graveyard is a public one. On the contrary, Ahmad Ali

Khan's story seems to us to show quite clearly that the cemetery is a private cemetery.

The second important witness of the plaintiff was the plaintiff himself, namely, Abdul Ghafur. He was one of the witnesses examined at the original trial and in his statement there he claimed that the property was waqf property merely because it was contiguous to the mosque. Another reason he gave for saying that the property was waqf was that Ahmad Ali had told him that it had been exempted from the sale which was made in favour of Ram Sewak Das in 1878. With regard to the graveyard, his evidence was to the effect that he claimed it as waqf property because it was a public graveyard. As to burials in this particular graveyard, the only instance he could cite of an outsider being buried there was that of the daughter of one Munna. Abdul Ghafur stated that he realised the income of these Kothris and the proceeds of the sale of the keora flowers from one Makhdum Ahmad. He produced a register in Court which purported to set forth particulars of the income of these various properties. This register, it is said, is now kept up under the authority of the Association of which Abdul Ghafur is the President, but it is admitted that the entries in the register relate back to a date anterior to the formation of the Association. The learned Additional Judge, who tried the appeals in the Court below, was of opinion that this register was a highly suspicious document and after examination of it we agree entirely with that opinion. We do not go so far as to say that the register has been prepared for the purposes of this case, but it seems perfectly clear that a great many of the entries which go to show that accounts were checked by various persons are fictitious entries not made at the time they purport to have been made but made simultaneously at a recent date. We place no reliance whatever upon any entry in this register. With respect to Abdul Ghafur's evidence, we may also note that the learned Additional Judge held that there was no proof that Ahmad Ali Khan had ever entrusted the property in dispute to the Anjuman of which Abdul Ghafur is the principal officer.

We come now to the evidence of the witness, Makhdum Ahmad, the man who is referred to in Abdul Ghafur's statement. He claims to have been appointed the mutawalli of all the mosques and graveyards in Fyzabad and Ajudhia 21 or 22 years ago. When he was asked to explain how his appointment had been made, his answer was that he had been appointed at a large meeting of the Muhammadan community held at the Idgah. The time which Makhdum Ahmad refers to was clearly before the formation of the Anjuman Islamia and we must take it, therefore, that Makhdum Ahmad's claim to the position of mutawalli rests upon his statement that he was so appointed by members of the Muhammadan community. It is not clear how in this capacity Makhdum Ahmad was in any way entitled to interfere with the property now in dispute. The argument; perhaps, is that the Muhammadan community appointed Makhdum Ahmad to look after this property because they understood it to be waqf property. But there is no evidence whatever that the property had been made waqf at the time he refers to and it is to be noted too that Ahmad Ali Khan, who presumably ought to know more about this property than any one else, never refers to Makhdum Ahmad having been appointed as mutawalli by him. On the contrary, as already stated, he speaks of having entrusted the management to Sheikh Inayat Husain and after Inayat Husain's death, his story is that he entrusted the property to the management of the Anjuman. This is altogether inconsistent with the story of Makhdum Ahmad. Indeed, Makhdum Ahmad in his evidence frankly admits that the owner of the mosque and the Kothris did not entrust the management to him but entrusted it to the Anjuman. This witness also stated in his evidence that he knew nothing about the management carried on by Sheikh Inayat Husain. He stated that the income of the property in suit was some Rs. 17 or 18 a year and with respect to the graveyard, his story was that he had never seen any burials being made there. We may also note here that Abdul Ghafur was re-called after this witness, Makhdum Ahmad, contradicted his statement as to the management of the property. Abdul Ghafur definitely stated that after Inayat Husain ceased to manage the property, it was handed over for management to the Anjuman. Various other witnesses who were examined at the original trial deposed principally to the fact that the rents of the Kothris in dispute were paid to Inayat Husain, who appropriated them for the maintenance of the mosque. A Mali, one Bandhu, also stated that he had been in the habit of buying the keora flowers from Inayat Husain in order to produce an income for the mosque. We do not think that any reliance can be placed on the statements of these persons. It does not appear that they could have any means of knowing how the income of the property was applied. Some notice may now be taken of the evidence of other witnesses who were examined after the remand. One of these was Hakim-ud-din, a nephew of Inayat Husain. His story is that Inayat Husain began to manage the property 40 years ago and the money used to be spent on the up-keep of the mosque. According to this witness's statement, his uncle himself never made the collections. Hakim-ud-din said he made the collections on behalf of his uncle and used to send accounts of the income to Ahmad Ali at Lucknow. Sometimes, he says, he used to show Ahmad Ali the accounts at Fyzabad when he came there. With regard to the graveyard, the witness mentions the name of one person who was buried there some 30 or 35 years ago. Otherwise, in this respect there is nothing in his evidence which would go to show that the graveyard is a public cemetery. Sarfaraz Ali is another witness who refers to Inayat Husain having collected rents of the property in dispute. With regard to the graveyard, the witness describes it as being known as Hyder Ali Khan's graveyard. He stated that he saw a new grave there some 24 years ago but that no one had actually been buried there in his presence. Muzaffar Husain is another witness who speaks about the graveyard. He says his brother was interred there 40 years ago with the permission of the Takiadar. Akbar Ali gives evidence which does not appear to fit in with the other evidence in the case. He describes the property in dispute as having been leased out along with other property adjacent to one Mahngu. He stated that Mahngu used to pay his rent to one Muhammad Jafar who was the uncle of the witness and that what Muhammad Jafar used to receive was the balance of the theka money after Mahngu had applied the rest in providing for the up-keep of the mosque. This seems to be a new story entirely. This arrangement, according to the witness, was the one which was in existence before Inayat Husain was appointed manager of the property by Ahmad Ali. In cross-examination, the witness stated that he had never seen Mahngu spending any money on the mosque nor could he, indeed, very well have seen any such expenditure for he was deposing to events which happened more than 40 years ago, while his present age on his own showing is only 56. As for the graveyard, the witness asserted that the general public had been buried in it; but he admitted that no one had been buried there in his presence. All he could say was that he had seen graves both new and old on occasions when he passed that way.

Then, we have the evidence of Idu, a man who now follows the calling of a pedlar. His age is 35 and his story was intended to show that the graveyard in dispute was a public one. He describes himself as having been a Takiadar of the cemetery in succession to certain of his ancestors and he speaks of various people having been buried in the cemetery. He says that he was appointed Takiadar by Abdul Ghafur and Makhdum Ahmad. Ahmed Ali Khan in his evidence never says anything about the appointment of this person and it is difficult to understand how this witness came to be appointed custodian of the cemetery by Abdul Ghafur and Makhdum Ahmad. For, as already said, Ahmad Ali has described this burying ground as being a private one. Two other witnesses, Kale Khan and Farzand Ali, also depose to certain people having been buried in this graveyard. Their evidence, too, was intended to prove that the cemetery was public.

This is a brief statement of the evidence which was tendered by the plaintiff to show that the property in dispute was waqf. It is sufficient to demonstrate that the evidence is contradictory and altogether unreliable. We do not propose to discuss the oral evidence led on behalf of the defendants for we do not think that it could command any more confidence than that which was produced by the plaintiff. In cases like this where the dispute is between Hindus and Muhammadans, there is no difficulty in procuring any amount of oral evidence on either side; but one important piece of documentary evidence has been filed on behalf of the defendant which we think is strong proof against the case set up by the plaintiff. A copy of the Khasra prepared at the first Regular Settlement was put in for the defence. This is Exhibit A 20. This Khsara must have been prepared somewhere in the early seventies. The mosque is entered in the Khasra as being waqf property, that is, dedicated to God, but there is no entry whatever in this document which goes to show that any of the items of property in dispute was recorded there as endowed property. There is no reason why such an entry should not have been made if in fact these Kothris and the graveyard were property appertaining to the mosque and dedicated to the use of the public. With regard to the cemetery all that appears is that it is described as being the cemetery of the ancestors of Khairat Ali, that is to say, it is clearly put down as being a private and not a public cemetery. Two of the plots which are now in dispute admittedly contain the tombs of members of the family in the Khasra just referred to. But, as already said, it is a remarkable fact that if any property was really dedicated to the mosque, no mention of this was made at the time when the Abadi Khasra of Ajudhia was being prepared with great detail at the time of the first Regular Settlement. There is one entry in this Khasra which at first sight appears to support the story told on behalf of the plaintiff as to the property being entrusted to the management of Inayat Husain. The entry regarding plot No. 1132 in suit shows that it was the property of Khairat Ali Khan, the son of Hyder Beg, that it was in the possession of one Ram Din who paid Rs. 5 a year rent to Sheikh Inayat Husain "ba hakuk zemindari," that is to say, as zemindari dues. We were at first inclined to suppose that this entry meant that Ram Din was paying some annual sum as rent to Sheikh Inayat Husain in his capacity of manager of the property. But the entry is made clear by the statement of Inayat Husain's nephew, the witness Hakim-ud-din. He says that Inayat Husain was the zemindar of the entire mohalla and used to get zemindari dues from the persons who resided there. It seems more probable, therefore, that the entry in the Khasra refers to a payment made to Inayat Husain in his capacity of zemindar of the mohalla.

To sum up, therefore, we have it that there is no deed of endowment which can be relied on in proof of the claim made by the plaintiff that this property is waqf property. We have also the Settlement Record which appears to be against the case set up by the plaintiff. We have the statements of a large number of the witnesses—statements which cannot be reconciled and which are loose and unsatisfactory. At the very most, all they could prove if they were accepted is that the income of the property was applied to the up-keep of the mosque But, as has been pointed by their Lordships of the Privy Council, this fact, even if established, would not be adequate proof that the property was endowed property. We hold, therefore, that the plaintiff has failed to prove that the property in suit is waqf property and on this finding, the result must be that the plaintiff's suit with regard to it must be dismissed. He has no locus standi to sue for recovery of possession of any property unless it is proved to be waqf property. We dismiss Appeals Nos. 36 and 37, the appeals of Syed Abdul Ghafur, and allow the cross objections filed by the respondents in Appeal No. 37. Syed Abdul Ghafur's suit is dismissed with costs and he will pay the costs of the respondents both in the lower Appellate Court and in this Court.

GOPALAKRISHNAMARAJU, BY HIS MOTHER BANGARAYA—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

versus

VENKATANARASA RAJU AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Hindu Law—Joint family—Debts—Marriage expenses of twice-born Hindu male.

Marriage is obligatory on Hindus who do not desire to adopt the life of a perpetual Brahmchari or of a sanyasi. Therefore, debts reasonably incurred for the marriage of a twice-born Hindu male are binding on the joint family properties.

GHAZAFFAR HUSSAIN v. MAHABIR PRASAD.

Devulapalli Kameswara Sastry v. Palavasapu Veeracharlu, 34 M. 422; 8 Ind. Cas. 195; 20 M. L. J. 855; 9 M. L. T. 26, followed.

Govindarajulu Narasimham v. Venkatanarasayya, 27 M. 206, overruled.

Second appeal from the decree of the Sub-Court at Ellore, in A. S. No. 145 of 1908, presented against that of the District Munsif of Narasapur, in O. S. No. 581 of 1906.

The case came on for hearing, in the first instance, on 22nd May 1911, before Abdur Rahim and Ayling, JJ., who made the following ORDER OF REFERENCE TO A FULL BENCH.

By this appeal the question has been raised whether the 3rd defendant in the suit and his property are liable for a debt incurred to meet the expenses of the 2nd defendant's marriage. The defendants belong to a Kshatriya family.

In Govindarajulu Narasimham v. Venkatanarasayya (1), it was held that a sale of a land belonging to a joint family of Brahmins to defray the expenses of the marriage of one of its male members cannot be said to have been made for family necessity and is, therefore, not binding on the other members of the family. This decision has been dissented from in Sundara Bai v. Shiv Narayin (2) and its correctness has been doubted in the judgment of this Court in Devulapalli Kameswara Sastry v. Palavasapu Veeracharlu (3). In both of these cases the matter is fully discussed. There is, however, a suggestion in the last mentioned ruling and in a later judgment in Appeal No. 95 of 1903 that a distinction might, perhaps, be drawn between the case of Sudras and that of the three twice born castes. But, though the judgment of Chandravarkar, J., in Sundara Bai v. Shiv Narayin (2) and of Krishnaswami Aiyar, J., in Devulapalli Kameswara Sastry v. Palavasapu Veeracharlu (3), show that, regarding the question from the point of view of religious ceremonial, it may be said that there is a greater necessity for marriage among the Sudras than among the higher castes, the Bombay ruling clearly holds that there is no difference in the law in the two cases and that is also the inclination of opinion as expressed in Devulapalli Kameswara Sastry v. Palavasapu Veeracharlu (3).

(2) 32 B. 81; 9 Bom. L. R. 1366; 3 M. L. T. 46.

(3) 34 M. 422; 8 Ind. Cas. 195; 20 M. L. J. 855; 9 M. L. T. 26.

The question whether the marriage of a male member of a joint Hindu family belonging to one of the twice born castes is a family necessity and whether a debt incurred for the purpose of such marriage is binding on the other members of the family is one of importance and ought to be settled. We, therefore, refer the above question for the opinion of a Full Bench. Pending the receipt of the opinion of the Full Bench, the second appeal will stand over.

Mr. T. Prakasam, for the Appellant.

Mr. P. Narayanamurti, for the Respondent.

OPINION.—It is sufficient to say that we agree with the judgment of Krishnaswami Aiyar, J., in Devulapalli Kameswara Sastri v. Palavarapu Veeracharlu (3) that marriage is obligatory on Hindus who do not desire to adopt the life of a perpetual Brahmachari or of a Sanyasi and, this being so, that debts reasonably incurred for the marriage of a twice born Hindu male are binding on the joint family properties.

FIRST CIVIL APPEAL NO. 32 OF 1912.

Promissory-note, suit on—Execution admitted—Undue influence of plaintiff and immorality of defendant pleaded—Burden of proof—Consideration—Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 16—Interest up to date fixed for payment—Negotiable Instruments Act (XXVI of 1881), s. 79.

In a suit on a promissory-note, the defendant—a young man of 25 or 26—admitted the execution of the pro-note but contended that (1) the plaintiff had obtained the note by the exercise of undue influence, (2) a major portion of the consideration had not been paid by plaintiff, and (3) whatever consideration was paid by plaintiff was paid for an immoral purpose:

Held, that as there was nothing on the face of the pro-note or in the evidence to indicate that the bargain was an unconscionable one or to show that the plaintiff was in a position to dominate the will of the defendant, the onus lay upon the defendant to prove the pleas of undue influence and immorality.

Under section 79 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, a plaintiff is entitled to interest at the stipulated rate from the date of the institution of the suit till the date fixed for payment.

Appeal against an order of the Subordinate Judge, Fyzabad, dated 6th December 1911.

Pandit Brij Narain Chakbast, for the Appellant.

Babu Basudeo Lal, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This was a suit for the recovery of money due on two promissory-notes, one of which was executed by the defendant in lieu of Rs. 1,415 on the 26th January 1910, and the other in lieu of Rs. 4,825 on the 12th February 1910, in favour of the plaintiff. The former promissory-note provided for the payment of compound interest at the rate of Rs. 1-12 per cent. per mensem and the latter at the rate of Rs. 1-10 per cent per mensem.

The defence was that the defendant had got Rs 100 on account of the first promissory-note and Rs. 225 on account of the second, that the defendant was a young man of immoral habits, of which the plaintiff took advantage, and that the terms extorted were hard and unconscionable.

The Court below decreed the claim. In appeal, it is contended on behalf of the defendant that the promissory-notes in question were obtained by the exercise of undue influence on the part of the plaintiff-respondent; that a major portion of the consideration was not paid to the defendant-appellant; that, whatever consideration was paid by the plaintiff-respondent, was paid for an immoral purpose, and that the plaintiff-respondent was not entitled to a decree for any thing more than what he had actually paid to the defendant-appellant.

The plaintiff-respondent has filed cross-objections, claiming future interest from the date of the institution of the suit till the date of realization.

I have gone through the evidence adduced by the plaintiff. The execution of the promissory-notes in question was admitted by the defendant. It is probable from the evidence that he is an extravagant man of dissipated habits but the consideration, in the present case, was paid, in case of each promissory-note, through the Fyzabad branch of the People's Industrial Bank, by means of cheques, which were summoned from the Bank and proved.

The defendant alleged that, after the cheques were cashed, the plaintiff took the defendant to his house and took back the money with the exception of the amounts admitted by the defendant. But the defendant did not come into the witness-box to swear to those facts and the evidence adduced by him in support of his statement is not reliable. On the other hand, Shambhu Dayal, the Manager of the Bank, stated that, when the defendant came to cash the cheques, the plaintiff was not present.

The plaintiff has not proved the purposes for which the loans were taken. The circumstance that the said loans were taken within a period of 16 days is, undoubtedly, suspicious. But the onus lay upon the defendant to prove that the plaintiff deliberately advanced loans for an immoral purpose or that the promissory-notes were obtained from the defendant by the exercise of undue influence on the part of the plaintiff. There is nothing on the face of the promissory-notes or in the evidence, to indicate that the bargains were unconscionable or to show that the plaintiff was in a position to dominate the will of the defendant. The defendant is a young man about 25 or 26 years old. He was in a position to judge for himself what suited best his interests. His own witnesses admit that he built a house at a cost of Rs. 8,000, or Rs 10,000 about three years ago. He may have had other necessities for borrowing the money. He entered into the bargain with open eyes and his story that, after coming back from the Bank, he returned the greater portion of the money received from the plaintiff, cannot be trusted.

The plaintiff was entitled to future interest at the stipulated rate from the date of the institution of the suit under section 79 of the Negotiable Instruments Act till the date fixed for payment.

I, therefore, dismiss the defendant's appeal with costs and allow the plaintiff's cross-objections in so far as to direct that the plaintiff shall be entitled to recover future interest on the amount claimed at the stipulated rate compoundable half-yearly from the date of the institution of the suit till three months from this date; after that further interest shall cease, as the plaintiff will have the option of taking steps for recovering his money and the rate of interest secured by the promissory-notes in suit is already high. The defendant is allowed three months' time for payment. The costs of the cross-objections will be charged against the defendant-appellant, who shall bear his own costs.

Appeal dismissed.

PUNJAB CHIEF COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No 1154 OF 1910.

November 2, 1912.

Present:—Sir Arthur Reid, KT., Chief Judge, and Mr. Justice Rattigan.

Rai Seth CHAND MAL—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT

Rai Bahadur SANSAR CHAND—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Arts. 62, 120—Limitation—Suit to recover interest from holder of Government Promissory-Notes—Pendency of previous litigation—Money had and received to plaintiff's use.

On 1st December 1898, A., the proprietor of a firm, assigned all his rights in certain Government Promissory-Notes to B. Shortly after, certain creditors of the firm attached these Notes; B. objected to the attachment, but his objection was disallowed, whereupon in May 1900, he sued the decree-holders to establish his right to the Notes and impleaded C., in whose name the Notes stood, as a defendant. The suit was decreed by the Divisional Court on 10th November 1904 and this decree was affirmed by the Chief Court on 18th May 1908. Neither A. nor C. contested B.'s right in this suit. In execution of the decree of the Divisional Court, B. recovered the Notes in October 1905.

During the pendency of this litigation, C. realised the interest due on these Notes for the period, 1st November 1898 to 30th June 1905; the interest was first realized on 13th August 1903. On the 22nd January 1909, B. sued C. for recovery of the interest so realised:

Held, (1) that Article 62 of the Limitation Act, 1908, provided the limitation for the suit;

(2) that the suit was barred by time having been brought three years after the date of realization of interest;

(3) that the fact that the right of B. to the Notes was finally settled on 18th May 1908 in the previous litigation did not give B any extension of time, as

(a) the litigation was not really between B. and A. or C., and

(b) B. had recovered the Notes in execution of the Divisional Court decree in 1905 and the payment of interest was endorsed on the Notes at the time,

Article 62 applies whenever a person actually or constructively receives money for another person's use; in other words, when the receipt by the defendant is in law a receipt to the use of such other person to whom the money at the time of the receipt lawfully belongs.

Second appeal from the order of the Divisional Judge, Hoshiarpur Division, dated the 9th August 1910, affirming that of the District Judge, Hoshiarpur, dated the 2nd February 1910, decreeing plaintiff's claim.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case are as follows:—

In the autumn of 1898, the firm of Raghnath Das-Hamir Mal, of which one Dhanrup Mal was (as found by subsequent litigation) the proprietor, became bankrupt, and on the 1st December 1898, the said Dhanrup Mal assigned all his rights in certain Government Promissory Notes to the value of Rs. 10,000 to the present plaintiff, Rai Bahadur Sansar Chand, and two other persons. The latter persons in turn transferred all their rights in the said Notes to the plaintiff. Shortly afterwards, certain creditors of the firm of Raghnath Das-Hamir Mal attached these Notes in execution of decrees which they had obtained against the said firm, whereupon plaintiff objected to the attachment on the ground that the Notes had been duly assigned to him. This objection was disallowed, whereupon plaintiff instituted a regular suit in May 1900 to establish his right to the Notes, and impleaded the aforesaid decree-holders and also (inter alia) the present defendant, Seth Chand Mal, in whose name the Notes then stood. The latter pleaded that though the Notes stood in his name, their real owner was Dhanrup Mal; that he had no interest whatever in the suit; that he had nothing to say either against or in favour of the alleged assignment of the Notes by Dhanrup Mal to plaintiff, and that he had been unnecessarily impleaded as a defendant. The decree-holder defendants, however, contested the validity of the assignment, but it was eventually found by the Divisional Judge, in his judgment, dated 10th November 1904, that the assignment was valid. The decree of the Divisional Judge was confirmed on appeal by this Court on the 18th May 1908, and on the 13th October 1903, the plaintiff, in execution of his decree, obtained possession of the Notes.

He now sues Rai Bahadur Seth Chand Mal, defendant, for Rs. 2,016 interest on the said Notes from the 1st November 1898 (the date of the assignment to him) to the 30th June 1905, and for an additional sum of Rs. 584 as interest on the said sum at the rate of annas 8 per cent. per mensem, and in his plaint he alleges that the defendant, in spite of his knowledge of the assignment of the Notes by Dhanrup Mal, realised interest on the Notes and fraudulently concealed the fact of such realizations from him.

Defendant, Rai Bahadur Seth Chand Mal, admitted that he had realised the sum of Rs. 2,189-15-2 as interest on the Notes from the 1st December 1898 to the 30th April 1905; that he had paid all these amounts from time to time to Dhanrup Mal; that he had not been guilty of any fraudulent conduct and that the present suit, which was instituted on the 22nd January 1909, was barred by reason of the provisions of Article 62 of the Indian Limitation Act. The defendant further stated that it was not until August 1903 that he received interest on these Notes, after the date of the alleged assignment to plaintiff. The only question that has been really in issue between the parties is whether the claim is or is not barred under the provisions of the Limitation Act. The District Judge held that Article 62 of the Act was inapplicable and that as no other Article could possibly apply, recourse must be had to Article 120, and that the suit which had been instituted within six years of the date on which plaintiff obtained possession of the Notes and also within six years of the date (13th August 1903) on which defendant first realised interest on the Notes, the claim was within time. He accordingly granted plaintiff a decree for the full amount claimed.

Defendant appealed to the Divisional Judge and again contended that Article 62 of the Act barred the claim. The learned Judge dismissed the appeal, holding that the said Article was not applicable inasmuch as at the time when the defendant received the greater part of the money now claimed, the question of the ownership of the Notes was still in dispute in the Courts, and that, consequently, defendant could not be regarded as having received these sums for the use of any determinate person. To give the learned Judge's own words:—"It seems to me that the utmost that can be said is that Chand Mal received the interest for the use of the owner of the Notes, but as the question of ownership was still in dispute, he cannot be said to have received it for the use of any determinate person. When the greater part of the money was received, it was the decree-holders who had the better title and not the plaintiff who had failed in his objection and had not yet succeeded in his suit. The balance of title altered with the pronouncement of this Court, but while this title was still being fought, defendant could not be said to be receiving interest for the use of either party individually, though he was receiving it for the use of whichever of them might ultimately be declared the owner. I, therefore, hold that Article 62 does not apply, and that Article 120 does, and the suit is, therefore, within time."

From the decree of the Divisional Judge, the defendant has preferred a further appeal to this Court, and we have heard lengthy arguments on behalf, respectively, of the appellant and the respondent. We have taken time to consider the large number of authorities cited before us and the important question of law involved. Before we proceed to deal with these authorities, we may clear the ground by stating that we see no proof whatever on the record of any fraudulent conduct on the part of the defendant. He may have been right or wrong in paying the interest realised by him on the Notes to Dhanrup Mal, but we are certainly not prepared to say, upon the materials before us, that in so doing, he acted mala fide or that he concealed the fact of such payments from plaintiff. On the other hand, it may, perhaps, be conceded that plaintiff's present suit was not so inexcusably belated as at first sight it would seem. When he instituted his suit in 1900, he claimed to be the owner of the Notes, and he also prayed that he might be awarded such sums by way of interest therein as had been realised by the present defendant. The latter, in answer to interrogatories put to him, swore that up to that date (November 1900), he had realised no interest on the Notes since the date of the assignment of the Notes to the plaintiff, a statement which was absolutely true. The Divisional Judge, when delivering judgment in November 1904, found, in reliance upon the evidence of the Treasury Clerk, one Hafiz, given in April 1904, that no interest had been realised by defendant on the Notes up to the date of decree and accordingly dismissed plaintiff's claim so far as it related to recovery of such interest. This finding was, in point of fact, incorrect, as it is now admitted that defendant had actually realised interest in 1903, but for this mistake, we cannot see that defendant was in any wise to blame.

It is urged on behalf of plaintiff that he was justified in assuming, upon the facts above stated, that no interest had been realised by defendant, and we think there is force in this argument so far as it relates to events prior to October 1905, when the Notes, with endorsements thereon of payment of various sums due as interest, were handed over to plaintiff. But it is difficult to account for his inaction after that date. Once he had received the Notes, he must have seen that interest thereon had been paid from time to time, from 1903 onwards, and it is surely no answer to urge (as his learned Advocate did) that the endorsements did not show to whom such interest was paid. The Notes were admittedly in the name of the defendant, and the only person to whom Government would have been likely to pay interest upon them was the person who, on the face of the documents, appeared to be their owner, or, at all events, Dhanrup Mal, on whose behalf the Notes had been deposited as security. But all that plaintiff seems to have done was to inquire in 1908, (three years after the Notes had come into his possession) from the Treasury Officer as to the person to whom the interest was paid. In reply he was told, in August 1908 that this information could not be given to him. Very shortly after this, plaintiff had no difficulty in ascertaining from defendant that the interest had been paid to the latter and had been handed over to Dhanrup Mal, (see Exhibit P 6, dated 16th December 1908).

It is urged on plaintiff's behalf that until his right to the Notes was finally established by the decree of this Court dated the 18th May 1903, he could not well claim interest on the Notes. But the futility of this argument is apparent when we remember that plaintiff did not await the decision of this Court to execute the decree of the Divisional Judge and recovered the Notes themselves in October 1905, some two-and-a half years before the decree of this Court. Once the plaintiff had the Notes in his possession, he must have become aware (as the Courts below find) that interest had in fact been paid thereon since 1903 and it is absurd to say that he could not discover for over three years to whom that interest had been paid. As we have remarked, it could only have been paid to defendant or to Dhanrup Mal, and it is clear that as soon as plaintiff made inquiries of defendant upon the subject, the latter forthwith admitted that he had received the money.

Obviously, therefore, there are no special equities in this case in plaintiff's favour, and the only question before us is whether his claim for interest is within time. Defendant admits that he received interest amounting in all to a sum of Rs. 2,189-15-2 from the 13th August 1903 up to the 30th April 1905, and he pleads that he received this interest merely as the agent of Dhanrup Mal or whoever was at the time the legal owner of the Notes, and certainly not on his own behalf. He contends, therefore, that as the plaintiff was the legal owner of the Notes from the date of their assignment to him, he must be taken to have received interest, constructively and in law, to the use of the plaintiff within the meaning of Article 62 of the Limitation Act, and that, consequently, the present suit which was instituted more than three years after the date of the last receipt of any such interest is barred by limitation.

The question before us is whether Article 62 or Article 120 of the said Act applies to a suit of the present kind.

It has been authoritatively laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council, in the the case of Mahomed Riasat Ali v. Hasin Banu (1), that Article 120 of the Limitation Act must be applied, unless it is clear that the particular suit is within some other Article. In the present case, the only other

(1) 21 C. 157 at p. 163; 21 I. A. 155.

CHAND MAL v. SANSAR CHAND.

Article suggested is Article 62. This Article runs as follows :—" For money payable by the defendant to the plaintiff for money received by the defendant for the plaintiff's use," and the period of limitation specified is three years from the date when " the money is received. " It has been held in various cases that this Article applies whenever one person actually or constructively, receives money for another person's use, see, inter alia, Rama Sawamy v. Neli Hari Krishna (2) or, in other words, whenever the receipt by the defendant is in law a receipt to the use of such other person to whom the money at the time of receipt lawfully belongs, [see Kundun Lal v. Bansi Dhar (3), and Thakur Prasad v. Partab (4) and also the decision of the Judicial Committee in Syad Lutf Ali Khan v. Afzul-un-Nisa Begum (5)].

In the case before us, there can be no doubt that as between Dhanrup Mal, the assignor, and plaintiff, the assignee, there had been a complete and valid transfer of the Notes in December 1898. It is also not denied that defendant, Rai Seth Chand Mal, was holding the Notes merely as agent for the owner of the Notes whom he believed (for some time at all events) to be Dhanrup Mal. Thus, so far as these three persons were concerned, the lawful owner of the Notes was the plaintiff and no question of his right to the Notes could have arisen, nor did it in fact arise, between any of the said persons. At the time, therefore, when the defendant began to realise interest on the Notes, he admittedly realised it for the owner at the time being, and at such time the owner was, as we have stated, the plaintiff. It is contended, however, and this is the basis of the Divisional Judge's judgment, that shortly after the transfer of the Notes to plaintiff, a dispute arose between the latter and certain creditors of Dhanrup Mal. These creditors succeeded in attaching the Notes and plaintiff's objection to the attachment was unsuccessful. Upon these facts, the Divisional Judge states that at the time when Chand Mal, defendant, received the interest, the question of the ownership of the Notes was in dispute and he cannot, therefore, be said to have received it for the use of the plaintiff, though he was receiving it for the use of such of the contending parties as might ultimately be declared the owner. This argument would have carried weight and would have had authority in support of it [see Kondi Rama Sawamy v. Neli Hari Krishna (2) above cited and Narayana v. Narayana, (6)], had the dispute as to, ownership been either between Dhanrup Mal and plaintiff or between Rai Seth Chand Mal, defendant, and plaintiff. In point of fact, however, in the litigation referred to, neither Dhanrup Mal nor defendant in any wise contested the right of plaintiff to the Notes, and, consequently, the defendant, when he received the interest, must be taken to have received it for the use of his principal, Dhanrup Mal, or of any assignee from him. It would seem clear, therefore, other questions apart, that Article 62 must be held applicable to the facts of this case.

Reliance, however, is placed by Mr. Shiv Narain on the well known case of Gurudas Pyne v. Ram Narain Sahu (7) and also upon the ruling of the Allahabad High Court in Chand Mal v. Angan Lal (8).

In the former case, the husband of one Musammat Moti Dasi had misappropriated certain timber belonging to the plaintiff. After the death of her husband, Musammat Moti Dasi instructed the defendant, her agent, to sell the timber and to hold the proceeds on her behalf. Thereafter, plaintiffs sued the defendant and claimed to recover the money obtained by the sale of the timber. Their Lordships held that, under these circumstances, Article 118 of the old Limitation Act (which corresponds with the present Article 120) applied and not Article 60 (corresponding to present Article 62), the ratio decidendi being that when the defendant sold the timber, he was selling it as the agent of Moti Dasi and received the money for her, and the nature of suit was explained as being one to enforce an equitable claim on the part of the plaintiffs to follow the proceeds of their timber, and finding them in the hands of the defendant, to make him responsible for the amount.

MUHAHMAD SARFARAZ BEGAM v. MUNNA.

In Chand Mal v. Angan Lal (8), one Angan Lal received certain monies as agent for and on behalf of one Ajudhia Prasad. Thereafter, a creditor of Ajudhia Prasad attached the monies in execution of a decree against Ajudhia Prasad and subsequently transferred his right to the attached monies to the plaintiff who sued to recover them from Angan Lal. Edge, C. J., and Tyrrell, J., were of opinion that Article 62 applied to the case but, in deference to the authority of Gurudas Pyne v. Ram Narain Sahu (7), held that the suit was governed by Article 20.

In our opinion, the decision of the Judicial Committee in the case cited has been rightly explained both by Subrahmania Ayyar, J., in Shanmuga Pillai v. Govindasami (9) and by Harrington and Mookerjee, JJ., in Mahomed Wahib v. Mahomed Ameer (10). This explanation is that in the case before their Lordships, the plaintiff's claim was for recovery of money, not on the ground that it had been received by the defendant for the use of plaintiff but on the ground that the plaintiff, as the person rightfully entitled thereto, was pursuing it in the hands of the defendant as the actual person in possession thereof at the time. Obviously, the facts of that case are entirely different from the facts of the case before us, for Musammat Moti Dasi was under no contractual relationship with the plaintiff. Her husband had misappropriated plaintiff's property and plaintiff was unquestionably entitled to recover the value of the property either from Musammat Moti Dasi herself or from her agent, if the money happened to be in the possession of the latter. Here, however, the person who received the money (Rai Seth Chand Mal) was admittedly the agent of Dhanrup Mal and received it as such for Dhanrup Mal's use. Dhanrup Mal, however, had, prior to the date of the receipt, transferred his rights to the plaintiff who thereupon stood in his shoes and was in law the person on whose behalf the defendant received the money.

After full consideration of all the authorities cited before us, we are of opinion that Article 62 and not Article 120 is applicable to the present case and we must, consequently, hold that the suit by plaintiff is barred by limitation. We accept the appeal and dismiss plaintiff's suit with costs throughout.

Declaratory relief granted different from that asked for in plaint—Court of second appeal, power of, to interfere with discretion of lower Courts.

Where the two Courts below exercised their discretion in granting the plaintiff a declaration somewhat different from that asked for in the plaint, without any formal amendment of the plaint, the Court of second appeal refused to interfere in the absence of good reasons justifying interference.

Appeal against an order of the District Judge, Sitapur, dated 25th May 1911, modifying that of the Munsif of Kheri, dated 3rd March 1911.

Mr. Wuseem, for the Appellant.

Pandit Gokaran Nath Misra, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—It seems to me that the only points really essential to the determination of this appeal admit of being briefly stated.

The plaintiffs sued for a certain declaration; the Court of first instance held that the claim as regards the particular form of declaration sought was barred by limitation, but that, on the merits, the plaintiffs were entitled to a somewhat different declaration, which was calculated to give the plaintiffs substantial relief they sought. The lower Appellate Court took practically the same view; it only modified the decree of the Court of first instance by correcting what appears to have been a palpable oversight. In argument before me, the entire question of the limitation law applicable to declaratory suits was raised and discussed but it seems to me sufficient to observe that, if the plaintiffs had confined themselves in the plaint as drafted to asking for the declaration which they have actually obtained, on no possible view of the law of limitation could their suit have been held to be time-barred. The appellant's case is that the suit should be regarded as one governed by Article 120 of the first Schedule to the Indian Limitation Act, and that the provisions of section 23 of the said Act have no application. These are matters which I might have to consider if I had before me a cross objection by the plaintiffs-respondents; but so far as concerns the decree actually passed, these contentions might be allowed without in any way affecting the result of the defendant's appeal. The declaration granted in favour of the plaintiffs is one in respect of which a cause of action, undoubtedly, did arise within six years of the date of the suit. As regards the discretion of the Courts below to give the plaintiffs a declaration somewhat different from that asked for in the plaint, and to do this without any formal amendment of the plaint itself, I think the matter was one clearly within the discretion of the Courts below, and I see no good reason for interfering with their exercise of that discretion. There is nothing else in the memorandum of appeal except a plea which amounts in substance to this:—that the findings of the lower Appellate Court are inconsistent with one another and that, upon the view taken by him of the evidence, the learned District Judge ought not to have held that the plaintiffs were entitled to any declaration whatsoever. It was also contended that the declaration as granted is vague in its terms and should not have been passed without a further specific finding as to the precise sums of money in respect of which the declaration is made. I have considered both these points; but it seems to me that the decree as passed is definite enough for practical purposes, that on the evidence before it, the lower Appellate Court was entitled to come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs had established the right allowed them by this declaration and that there is nothing in the other findings recorded by that Court to make its decision on this point open to question in second appeal.

I, accordingly, dismiss this appeal with costs.

First appeal from a decree of the Subordinate Judge of Agra, dated the 8th December 1910.

The Hon'ble Dr. Sundar Lal (with him Mr. Durga Charan Banerji), for the Appellant.

Mr. Hamilton (with him Mr. Gokul Prashad), for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit in which the plaintiff claimed damages for malicious prosecution. It appears that some time in November 1908, the defendant, who deals in sugar at a place called Lakhiserai, sent a consignment of sugar to one Madho Ram at Agra. Madho Ram did not pay him for the sugar, and the defendant came to Agra, and finding the sugar in the shop belonging to the plaintiff's firm, he lodged a complaint against the plaintiff and Madho Ram alleging that he had been cheated by them. Madho Ram and the plaintiff were subsequently arrested on the charge made by the defendant and tried. After a somewhat protracted trial, they were both acquitted, the Court holding that, so far as the plaintiff was concerned, there was no case against him at all and that he had acted perfectly bona fide, and that, so far as Madho Ram was concerned, the matter was of a civil nature.

The account given by the plaintiff of the transaction, stated as shortly as possible, is as follows. He says that he had nothing whatever to do with the purchase of the sugar but that the sugar having been purchased by

KESHO PARSHAD v. RAM KISHEN DAS.

Madho Ram, the plaintiff, in the ordinary course of his business, took over consignment note, advanced money on the sugar and sold it in the ordinary course of his business in the shop. He admits that the defendant came to Agra to inquire about the sugar and the payment of its price; that he gave the defendant all the information that he could and that he showed him his books, told him the amount he had advanced to Madho Ram, and offered, if the defendant would give him a written order, not to pay any more money in respect of the sugar to Madho Ram.

The story told by the defendant differs very substantially. He alleges that the sugar was purchased verbally not by Madho Ram alone but by the plaintiff also who came to Lakhiserai with Madho Ram and ordered the sugar; that he understood that he was selling the sugar to these two persons; that when he came to Agra and searched in vain for the shop of Madho Ram, he discovered from the Railway authorities that delivery had been made to the firm of which the plaintiff Kesho Parshad is proprietor; that he went to the shop, saw Kesho Parshad and Madho Ram, who at once made themselves scarce; that one Murlidhar, father of the plaintiff, pretended to know nothing about the sugar and ordered him out of the shop; that thereupon he returned to Lakhiserai and, after about a week's interval, lodged a complaint. He contends that, under these circumstances, he had reasonable and probable cause to institute the criminal complaint against Kesho Parshad and Madho Ram.

The learned Subordinate Judge seems to have been of opinion that the defendant had a reasonable and probable cause for lodging the complaint or, at any rate, that the plaintiff has not proved the absence of such reasonable and probable cause. He has apparently accepted the statement made by the defendant and believed that Kesho Parshad really did accompany Madho Ram to Lakhiserai and that he, in fact, ordered the sugar.

We are quite unable to agree with the learned Subordinate Judge. Certain letters were produced both in the criminal case and also in the present suit which, to our mind, demonstrate that the order for the sugar was not a verbal order at all but an order given in writing by Madho Ram. The defendant admitted a letter which was obviously written before the sugar was ordered. This was a letter in which the defendant points out that he has ascertained that Madho Ram was in the habit of purchasing sugar at Lakhiserai and he asks that if more sugar is wanted, it may be purchased from him. Another letter, which the plaintiff does not admit to be in his hand-writing but which he has not the hardihood to suggest did not issue from his firm, admits the receipt of a letter ordering the very consignment out of which the criminal charge which he made arose. This letter clearly shows that the order for the sugar was a written order contained in the letter which he admits having received. It, therefore, appears that the defendant made a deliberate mis-statement when he stated that Kesho Parshad came and gave a verbal order for the sugar. This is a matter of very great importance. In the first place, if Kesho Parshad never ordered the sugar from the defendant, it takes away in a very great measure the reasonable and probable cause that the defendant alleges he had for making the complaint. The matter is also important when we come to consider whom we ought to believe in the conflict in the evidence between the plaintiff and the defendant. If we find that the defendant has told a deliberate falsehood in one matter, it is a just ground for doubting his evidence in other respects where it conflicts with the evidence of the plaintiff. We have already mentioned the account that Kesho Prashad gave of the visit of the defendant to Agra when he was inquiring about his sugar. He admits that the defendant came to his shop and he has told us what he said to the defendant and what the defendant said to him. The defendant never contradicted this part of his evidence. It is alleged that there was an implied contradiction in the allegation of the defendant that Kesho Parshad made himself scarce as soon as he arrived in Agra. We cannot look upon this as by any means a satisfactory answer to the detailed statement of the plaintiff. The inferences to be drawn from certain admitted facts are also strongly in favour of the truth of the plaintiff's story. For example, the demand for the price of the sugar was made to Madho Ram and not to Kesho Parshad. Furthermore, we think that had the defendant come to Agra and been convinced, as he alleges, that he had been swindled by Kesho Pershad and Madho Ram, he would in all probability have gone to the Police in Agra and not waited a whole week before making a complaint in the Court at Monghyr. He admits in his deposition that he made no complaint to the Police at Agra. In our opinion, the plaintiff's evidence is entitled to far more credit than the evidence of the defendant. In addition to this, as already stated, the facts themselves render the story of the plaintiff much more probable.

The result is that we accept the plaintiff's story, namely, that the charge was made by the defendant without any ground whatever except the mere fact that the property when discovered by the defendent was in his (plaintiff's) charge. In our opinion, this fact would, in no way, constitute reasonable and probable cause so as to justify the defendant in making the serious charge that he did against an apparently respectable merchant. We think, therefore, that the plaintiff ought to have had a decree; and it only remains to consider what damage should be awarded to him. Here, again, his statements go almost uncontradicted. He swears that he paid Rs. 1,135 to Pleaders to defend the suit. He gives his Railway fare to the place of trial (Monghyr) and back for self and witnesses as amounting to Rs. 475. It appears that he had to go to Monghyr on many occasions. He gives his expenses at Monghyr and on the way at Rs. 500. He further claims Rs. 2,000 for bodily and mental pain and Rs. 1,000 for loss of business. These last two items are somewhat vague but it is clear that there must have been some loss in respect of business and the plaintiff must also have suffered a considerable amount of worry and trouble. Taking all circumstances into consideration, we have decided to award him a lump sum of Rs. 3,500 (three thousand and five hundred rupees) to cover all claims in respect of the present suit. We accordingly set aside the decree of the Court below and make a decree in plaintiff's favour for the sum of Rs. 3,500 with full costs in both Courts including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal allowed.

Property subject to mortgages—Covenant by vendor to discharge previous mortgages—Pre-emption suit—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 11—Res judicata.

The first defendant owned a share of 1 biswa, 8 biswansis in a certain village and out of it he sold an unspecified 12 biswansis share to the plaintiffs. The sale-deed contained a recital that as the aforesaid share of 12 biswansis was being sold to the plaintiffs free of any charge, the vendor will pay off the debts due under the mortgages existing on the said share and if the plaintiffs were compelled to pay anything, they would be entitled to recover that sum from him. The other defendants pre-empted the share in suit and obtained the possession of it in payment of the purchase-money. Meanwhile, the plaintiffs purchased the previous mortgages existing on the property in dispute and put them into suit. It was contested by the defendants, who had pre-empted the property, that because the plaintiffs had not put forward the aforesaid mortgages in the pre-emption case, their present suit was barred:

Held, that the suit on the aforesaid mortgages was maintainable, inasmuch as a plea regarding the aforesaid mortgages could not be the subject of an issue in the pre-emption suit nor could it affect the result of that suit.

Pandit Gokaran Nath Misra, for the Appellants.

Babu Lachman Das, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This was a suit on a mortgage-deed of September the 9th, 1895, brought by the plaintiffs as transferees of the said deed. It was decreed in full by the Court of first instance and has also been decreed by the District Judge on appeal subject to a modification to be noticed presently.

The plaintiffs appeal against the modification which the District Judge has made in the decree of the Court of first instance. Certain respondents have filed a petition of objection raising a question of costs. As I am satisfied that the plaintiffs' appeal must prevail, this petition of objection naturally fails and is hereby dismissed.

In order to understand the point on which the two Courts below have differed, it is better to take the facts somewhat out of their chronological order. The first defendant, Sardar Singh, owned a share of 1 biswa, 8 biswansis in village Kakwa and on the 16th of August 1902, he sold an unspecified 12 biswansis share out of the above to Sheo Sahai and Ganga Sahai, who are the plaintiffs in this suit. That sale-deed contained a recital by the vendor to the effect that his share in village Kakwa was subject to two mortgages, one in favour of Juggi Lal and another in favour of Mohan Lal.

As he wished to convey these 12 biswansis to the plaintiffs free from any charge, he covenanted with them that he would himself pay off these two mortgages, that if the plaintiffs were compelled to pay anything towards them, they might hold him liable and recover any sum which they might thus be compelled to pay from his person or his remaining property. Subsequently to this transaction, that is to say, on September the 23rd, 1902, the plaintiffs acquired from the heirs of Juggi Lal, one of the mortgagees above mentioned, their mortgagee rights which are those under the deed of September 9th, 1895, now in suit. After this, certain co-sharers, who are now, represented by defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4, hereafter called the contesting defendants in this case, brought against the present plaintiffs, a suit for pre-emption in respect of the sale-deed of August the 16th, 1902. They won that suit, paid to the plaintiffs the consideration which the plaintiffs had already paid to the vendor Sardar Singh and so became owners of this unspecified 12 biswansis share out of 1 biswa, 8 biswansis. Now the mortgage-deed of September the 9th, 1895, is for an unspecified share of one biswa out of 1 biswa 8 biswansis and the plaintiffs are simply suing for sale of an unspecified share. They have impleaded the contesting defendants because the share purchased by the latter, added to the share which is the subject of the mortgage in suit, would give a total exceeding the 1 biswa, 8 biswansis, which represented Sardar Singh's interest in village Kakwa. These contesting defendants resisted the suit on various grounds, but I am concerned now only with the pleas embodied in the 8th and 9th paragraphs of their written statement, which were made the subject of issue No. 4 in the Court of first instance. The contention is that the plaintiffs are in some way bound by the terms of the sale-deed of August the 16th, 1902, so that they cannot hold the share of 12 biswansis purchased by the contesting defendants liable for any portion of the mortgage-debt. The first Court seems to have found it difficult, as I am bound to say I do myself even, to understand precisely what the defendants meant by this contention but it overruled it and gave the plaintiffs a decree for the sale of an unspecified share of 1 biswa out of 1 biswa, 8 biswansis as claimed. The learned District Judge on appeal seems to have accepted a plea, which I find in a somewhat vague and confused form in the third paragraph of the memorandum of appeal to his Court, that the plaintiffs are bound to exempt this share of 12 biswas not by reason of any stipulations contained in the sale-deed of August the 16th, 1902, but by reason of the conduct of the present plaintiffs in the pre-emption suit. I am quite unable to accept the reasoning of the learned District Judge. When the plaintiffs were purchasing this 12 biswansis share in August 1902, they entered into an agreement with Sardar Singh that he would idemnify them against the existing mortgage charges affecting unspecified portions of his share of 1 biswa, 8 biswansis. They quite understood that no covenant entered into between Sardar Singh and themselves could in any way affect the rights of the holders of existing mortgages. They knew, therefore, that if these mortgagees enforced their rights, they would be able to bring to sale such unspecified shares out of Sardar Singh's entire proprietary rights as might be mentioned in their mortgage-deeds.

Amongst other things they knew that Juggi Lal or his heirs would have a right to enforce this mortgage of September 1895 against an unspecified share of 1 biswa out of 1 biswa, 8 biswansis. They obviously realized that, in the event of Sardar Singh failing to keep his promise to pay off existing mortgages out of his own funds, they might be obliged to pay the whole or some portion of this mortgage-debt in order to safeguard their newly purchased share of 12 biswansis. They, therefore, covenanted with Sardar Singh that he would idemnify them against any payment which they might be compelled to make in respect of these previously existing mortgage charges. It was a covenant between Sardar Singh and his vendees and in itself was not binding on the mortgagees. Now, the contesting respondents have used their right of pre-emption in order to thrust themselves into the place of the plaintiffs as vendees under the sale-deed of August the 16th, 1902.

I find it difficult to understand what was in the mind of the learned District Judge when he wrote of the plaintiffs "receiving full price for the property." What the plaintiffs received from the pre-emptors was what they had paid to Sardar Singh; the person who received the full price was Sardar Singh and as he sold this share of 12 biswansis under a covenant of indemnity to keep it free from liability in respect of previously existing mortgages, he is bound by that covenant and will have to idemnify his vendees if they are put to any loss in respect of these mortgage charges. By their success in the pre-emption suit, the contesting defendants have simply stepped into the shoes of the plaintiffs as the vendees under the sale-deed of August the 16th, 1902. The plaintiffs have now neither rights nor liabilities left under this document. How the plaintiffs could have pleaded in the pre-emption suit the fact that they had, in the meantime, acquired the mortgagee rights of the heirs of Juggi Lal or how such a plea could have been made the subject of an issue in the pre-emption suit or could have affected the result of that suit, it passes me to conceive.

I am uuable, therefore, to maintian the decision of the lower Appellate Court. It was suggested to me in the course of argument that inasmuch as a number of pleas were taken by the contesting defendants in their memorandum of appeal to the District Judge and as most of these are not referred to in the judgment of that Court, I should, before disposing of this appeal remit issues calling for findings in respect of some of the other pleas thus raised. It seems to me that these pleas cannot have been pressed in the lower Appellate Court. They are practically overruled by the District Judge when he affirms the decree of the Court of first instance, subject only to the modification introduced by him regarding the 12 biswansis share of the contesting defendants. Moreover, I have myself examined them in connection with the judgment of the Court of first instance and they seem to me of no force whatever. I can see no reason for disallowing post diem interest and the suit certainly could not be dismissed on the ground that one Likha Sah had not been joined as a defendant. The plaintiffs have taken their chance of any difficulties to which they may be exposed in the execution department in consequence of their not having impleaded this man. As for the pleas taken on the merits regarding the execution of the mortgage deed of September the 9th, 1895, and as to the validity of the transfer of the mortgagee rights in favour of the plaintiffs, while I do not say that these contesting defendants were not entitled to put the plaintiffs to proof on these points, it is obvoius, in the face of the admissions contained in Sardar Singh's written statement and of the evidence set forth in the judgment of the first Court, that there was no real force in these pleas. I, therefore, accept this appeal, set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court and restore that of the Court of first instance with the direction that the contesting defendants, Hitam Singh, Sib Singh and Chedda Singh, will pay the plaintiffs' costs in this and in the lower Appellate Court. I extend the period fixed for payment to six months from the date of this present decree.

Appeal accepted.

OUDH JUDICIAL COMMISSIONER'S COURT.

CIVIL APPLICATION No. 88 OF 1912.

July 26, 1912.

Present:—Mr. Kanhaya Lal, A. J. C.

LALA—PLAINTIFF—APPLICANT

Chaudhari ABDUS SAMED—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Arbitration—Award made within time fixed but reaching Court late—Arbitration superseded before receipt of award—On receipt of award supersession order set aside—Sarpanch, meaning of—Award invalid if not made by all arbitrators—Illegal and void award—Judicial notice by Court of illegal award—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Sch. II, cl. 8—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 158.

An order of supersession, under paragraph 8 of Schedule II to the Civil Procedure Code, cannot be passed where an award has already been made and completed or, in other words, signed and delivered by arbitrators within the time fixed by the Court, though it may reach the Court afterwards, inasmuch as it is not necessary to the validity of such award that it should actually reach the hands of the Court within such period.

LALA v. ABDUS SAMED.

Therefore, where an order of supersession was passed on the date fixed but the award reached the Court the same day after the passing of the order:

Held, that the Court would be justified in setting aside suo motu its order of supersession as erroneous.

On a reference to several arbitrators together, where there is no clause providing for an award made by less than all being valid, each of them must act personally in performance of the duties of his office, as if he were the sole arbitrator; for as the office is joint, if one refuse or omit to act, the others can make no valid award.

The word 'Surpanch' might indicate either an umpire or referee in case of difference of opinion among the arbitrators, or might imply a chief or head arbitrator like the senior Judge of any other tribunal.

Where a matter was referred to the arbitration of three persons, two of whom were described as panches and the third as Surpanch:

Held, that this did not mean that the two panches alone were to decide the matter and that the third person was to be approached only in case of difference of opinion.

Where an award is illegal and void ab initio and the illegality is apparent on the very face of it, the Court should take judicial notice of it; it is not necessary that parties should file objections to the award within the time prescribed under Article 158 of the 2nd Schedule of the Limitation Act.

Raja Har Narain Singh v. Chaudhrain Bhagwant Kuar 13 A. 300; 18 I. A. 355; Ram Narain Roy v. Baij Nath Malal, 29 C. 36, referred to.

Application against an order of the Additional Munsif, Lucknow, dated 14th June 1912.

Pandit Gokaran Nath Misra, for the Applicant.

Pandit Manmohan Nath Chak, for the Opposite Party.

ORDER.—This was a suit for the recovery of the price of sheep alleged to have been sold to the defendant. The suit was referred to arbitration and the 29th April 1912 was fixed for the filing of the award. The time was afterwards extended on an application of one of the arbitrators to the 14th May 1912. On the last mentioned date, the case was taken up for hearing but, as the award was not received, the Court passed an order superseding the reference and granted an adjournment for two days to enable the parties to produce their evidence. On the same date, subsequent to the passing of the above order, the Court, however, received the award by post in a registered cover. Notices for filing objections to the award were, thereupon, issued to the parties. The plaintiff was served with that notice on the 20th May 1912, and filed his objections to the award on the 7th June 1912, more than ten days after the service of the notice. The Court below disallowed those objections and passed a decree in accordance with the award.

In revision, it is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the learned Munsif acted illegally and without jurisdiction in accepting the award after he had superseded the arbitration by his previous order; that the award was void ab initio because it was not signed by all the arbitrators including the umpire, and that the objections to the award were filed by him within time.

The order, superseding the arbitration, was apparently passed under paragraph 8 of the second Schedule to the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides, that where the arbitrators or the umpire cannot complete the award within the period specified in the order, the Court may, if it thinks fit, either allow further time or may make an order superseding the award, and in such case shall proceed with the suit. The order of supersession cannot, however, be passed where an award has already been made and completed or, in other words, delivered within the time fixed, though it may reach the Court afterwards, for, as observed in Sita Ram v. Bhawani Din Ram (1) and Asadullah v. Muhammad Nur (2), it is sufficient if the award be made, that is, completed and signed, by the arbitrators within the period fixed by the Court and it is not necessary to the validity of such award that it should actually reach the hands of the Court within such period. The fact of registration and the intervention of a Sunday probably delayed its delivery to the Court before the time fixed. But neither the arbitrators nor the parties were responsible for that delay and the learned Munsif was, therefore, justified in accepting the award and setting aside his previous order superseding the reference.

The award is, however, on the face of it, invalid because it is signed by only two of the arbitrators. The agreement of reference to arbitration gave the names of three persons, two of whom were described as panches and the third as a surpanch, and provided that, whatever decision was arrived at by the panches and surpanch, named therein would be binding on the parties. It did not specify that the surpanch was only to act in case the other arbitrators differed. The word surpanch might indicate either an umpire or referee in case of a difference of opinion among the arbitrators or might imply a chief or head arbitrator, one of whose functions would be to organize and convene the sittings, inform the parties, send reports to the Court and do other administrative business connected with the arbitration in like manner as is done by a senior Judge of any other tribunal.

Fallon defines the word surpanch as meaning either a chief umpire or referee or a president, chairman, or foreman of a Jury. Wilson describes it as meaning the president of a panchayat.

The mere use of the word surpanch in an agreement to refer to arbitration, therefore, does not necessarily imply that the surpanch is only to act in case of a difference of opinion among the other arbitrators and in the face of the clear reference in the agreement, filed by the parties, that they shall be bound by the award made by the panches and the surpanch, there can be no justification for thinking that the award made by two arbitrators alone, without the co-operation of the surpanch or chief arbitrator, was valid and binding.

The plaintiff objected in the Court below that the parties never intended to refer the case to the decision of only two arbitrators. On a reference to several arbitrators together, when there is no clause providing for an award made by less than all being valid, each of them must act personally in performance of the duties of his office, as if he were the sole arbitrator: for as the office is joint, if one refuse or omit to act, the others can make no valid award. Where the reference is to three arbitrators, all three must, therefore, concur in the award and an award made by only two of them would not be enforceable. "Sometimes," says Russell, "the framing of the submission is so ambiguous that it is difficult for the Court to decide on the respective duties of each arbitrator. Thus, where a cause was referred to two arbitrators and such third person as they should nominate as their umpire, and the parties agreed to perform the award to be made by the two and their umpire, the Court refused to enforce by attachment performance of an award made by the two arbitrators alone, considering it a doubtful point whether the award was not intended to be the joint act of the three." (Russell on Arbitration and Award, ninth Edition, page 168).

Article 158 of the Limitation Act does not apply where the award is, on the face of it, void for, as held in Raja Har Narain Singh v. Chaudhrain Bhagwant Kuar (3), the Court ought to take judicial notice of its patent invalidity, notwithstanding the fact that neither party has taken any objection thereto. In Ram Narain Roy v. Baij Nath Malal (4), an application to set aside an award on the ground that three out of five arbitrators, were not present at the time the award was made and did not sign the award, although it purported to have been signed by all of them, was held to be governed by Article 158 of the Limitation Act. But, in the present case, the award is no award as it does not purport to have been signed by all the arbitrators, including the surpanch or chief arbitrator, appointed by the parties. The notice issued to the plaintiff informing him of the filing of the award, did not specify that the order of supersession previously passed was or would be set aside, a fact which might have delayed the plaintiff's objection. If the award was no award, the order of the Court below, passing a decree in accordance with it, was ultra vires and illegal.

The application is, therefore, allowed and the case remanded to the Court below for a trial on the merits. The costs of the application will abide the event.

Application allowed.

APPEAL AGAINST ORDER No. 20 OF 1911.

September 24, 1912.

ARMUGHA MUDELIAR—APPELLANT

YAGAMBA BAI AMMANI AND OTHERS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 42, O. XXI, rr. 16, 53—Attachment of decree for mesne profits—Assignment of decree after attachment—Part consideration intended to benefit assignor and defeat creditors—Fraudulent assignment—Right of assignee to execute decree—Determination of equities between assignee and attachers in execution—Assignee entitled to charge for consideration paid by him—Rights of attachers where attachment not made by Court passing decree — Attachment of decree by judgment-debtor—Right to execute.

An assignee of a decree, which has been attached, has, under Order XXI, rule 53, clause 2, the right to execute the decree notwithstanding the attachment.

Thiruvengadam Pillai v. Doredla Subbiah, 13 Ind. Cas. 659; (1912) 1 M. W. N. 176; 11 M. L. T. 144, dissented from.

Yakoob Ali Chowdhry v. Ram Doolal, 13 C. L. R. 272, Thuchakovil Unni Koya v. Arapayil Pathuthi Umma, (1911) 1 M. W. N. 187; 9 M. L. T. 312; 9 Ind. Cas. 786; 21 M. L. J. 577; Adhar Chandra Das v. Lal Mohan Das, 24 C. 778; 1 C. W. N. 676, referred to.

But the right of the assignee to execute the decree is subject to the rights of the attachers just as the assignor's right itself would be. The assignment will not prevent the assignor's creditors from proceeding against the decree as if it still remained the property of the assignor. The assignment, though valid as between the parties to it, is subject to the rights of the creditors, including both those who may have already attached the decree and other creditors who might proceed against the decree notwithstanding the assignment.

Where the difference between the real value of the decree and the consideration for its assignment is, by a secret agreement between the assignor and the assignee, intended to benefit the assignor and to defeat his creditors, the assignment is fraudulent and invalid against the creditors and will not affect their rights to proceed against the decree as being still the property of the assignor. Neither the assignor, nor the judgment-debtor, can object to it on that ground.

Chidambaram Chettiar v. Samy Iyer, 30 M. 6; 16 M. L. J. 427; 1 M. L. T. 351 and Ishan Chunder Das Sarkar v. Bishu Sardar, 24 C. 825; 1 C. W. N. 665, referred to.

The assignee in such a case is entitled to execute the decree notwithstanding the partial fraud and is entitled to a charge for the consideration actually paid by him, and if the prior attachments are valid, his charge would be subject to the rights of the attachers.

An application for execution by the assignee decree-holder may be resisted by the attaching creditors and all questions of rights of priority, etc., should be determined in the execution proceedings.

Per Sundara Aiyar, J.—An order of attachment of a decree by the Court actually executing the decree after its transfer to it from the Court which passed it is not altogether void. The defect in the attachment, if any, consequent on its being made by a Court other than that which passed the decree is not such a jurisdictional defect as to make the order void. The defect may be waived by the judgment-debtor, as where the latter does not take objection to the attachment.

Thamboo Pillay v. Sriramulu Naidu, 17 M. L. J. 300, referred to.

Per Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—Orders of attachment in execution of a decree, though these orders are effected by sending notice to other Courts, are made in exercise of the powers in executing a decree and, therefore, under section 42 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, the Court to which the decree is sent for execution can also itself exercise the power mentioned in Order XXI, rule 53, clause 1 (b) as exercisable by the Court which passed the decree.

Per Sundara Aiyar, J.—Order XXI, rule 16 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, does not make an assignment of a decree in favour of one of several judgment-debtors invalid in law. The provision for disabling such transferee judgment-debtor from executing the money-decree does not in terms apply to transferees of decrees other than those for money. But, whether the judgment-debtor taking an assignment of a decree against himself for immoveable property can execute it or not, the attachment of the said decree by him is not invalid.

Per Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—A judgment-debtor who obtains the decree by assignment cannot execute it, but he has the right to apply for a set-off of the amount due to him as decree-holder in a suit against his assignor as against what is due by him and his co-judgment-debtors in the suit wherein he got the decree assigned to himself. His rights and priorities should be determined as if the decree for the larger amount was attached at his instance as soon as either of the decree-holders applies for execution.

Appeal against the order of the Subordinate Judge of Tanjore, in E. P. No. 101 of 1909, in O. S. No. 13 of 1903.

Mr. S. Subramanya Aiyar, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Aiyar, Messrs. R. Ruppusawmy Aiyar and A. Vaidyanatha Aiyar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

SUNDARA AIYAR, J.—This appeal arises out of an application for execution of the Subordinate Judge's Court of Tanjore in Original Suit No. 13 of 1903. The application was dismissed by the Subordinate Judge. The appellant is the assignee of the decree under a document dated 5th July 1909. The decree was for possession of certain lands, mesne profits and costs. The appellant obtained an assignment only so far as the award of mesne profits and costs was concerned. Prior to the assignment, the decree had been attached by several persons who had obtained decrees against the assignor, Yogamba Boyi Ammani. Of these, the 16th respondent made the attachment in execution of his decree in Small Cause Suit No. 905 of 1903, on the file of the Subordinate Judge's Court of Tanjore; his attachment was in October 1904. The 17th respondent was the decree-holder in Original Suit No. 56 of 1905, on the file of the District Munsif's Court of Tiruvadi; his decree was transferred for execution to the Tanjore District Munsif's Court, and the attachment was made by the latter Court on the 5th August 1905. The 18th respondent was the decree-holder in Original Suit No. 313 of 1905, in the Tiruvadi District Munsif's Court, who got his decree transferred to the District Munsif's Court of Tiruvalur which attached this decree on 13th March 1909. The assignor of the decree is the 1st respondent. She did not appear to contest the appellant's application. The judgment-debtors resisted the petition on the ground that the assignment was fraudulent and unsupported by consideration. The attaching decree-holders also contested the appellant's right to execute the decree and supported the contentions of the judgment-debtors. The amount due to the assignor under the decree at the time of the assignment was about Rs. 3,500. The consideration for the assignment was Rs. 2,500 of which Rs. 2,000 was due to the assignee from the assignor on account of the decree obtained by the appellant against her in Original Suit No. 60 of 1905 on the file of the Tiruvadi District Munsif's Court and a sum of Rs. 230 was paid by the assignee to one Ismalsa Rowther on the assignor's account. The remaining amount of Rs. 270 has been found by the Subordinate Judge not to have been paid to the appellant. He apparently was not willing to pay it until his assignment was recognised by the Court executing the decree. The Subordinate Judge held that Yogamba Boyi Ammani, the assignor, was heavily indebted to various persons at the time of the assignment and that, besides the decree in question, her property consisted of only 10 velis of land, her life-interest in which was of precarious value. He was of opinion that there must have been some secret arrangement between Yogamba Boyi Ammani, and the appellant and that the consideration set forth in the assignment deed was not, to use his own words, "the real consideration or the whole consideration for it," and that the assignment was made with a view to defeat the rights of all those who had already attached the decree under the impression that the attachments already made were legally defective and might be successfully impeached. He held that the assignment deed did not evidence a bona fide transaction, and that it was not supported by real or proper consideration.

I am unable to understand what the Subordinate Judge means by the observation that the consideration was not real, in the face of his finding that the assignee had a decree for Rs. 2,000 against the assignor and that he paid a further sum of Rs. 230 for the assignment. The non-payment of the remaining sum of Rs. 270 would not invalidate the assignment as between the appellant and Yogamba Boyi Ammani and the latter's right would only be to recover it from the appellant. If there was any secret understanding that she should be entitled to receive from the appellant any further amount subsequently, it may possibly be that she would be entitled to recover that also. But all this would not entitle her to dispute the validity of the assignment. What the Subordinate Judge apparently means is, that the difference between the real value of the decree and the consideration for the assignment was intended to go to Yogamba Boyi Ammani, and that she and the appellant combined to defeat the rights of her creditors. It is clear that the consideration was inadequate and that the object was to benefit Yogamba Boyi Ammani to the extent of Rs. 1,000 or thereabouts, at the expense of her creditors by converting the decree which would be easily available to the creditors for execution into cash which she could easily conceal from them. Such a transaction must be held to be fraudulent and invalid as against the creditors and would not affect their rights to proceed against the decree as being still the property of Yogamba Boyi Ammani. See Chidambaram Chettiar v. Samy Iyer (1) and Ishan Chunder Das Sarkar v. Bishu Sardar (2). But the appellant is entitled against the creditors to a charge for the amount actually paid by him. If the attachments in question, which were all prior in date to the assignment, are valid, his charge would be subject to the rights of the attachers. Mr. Seshagiri Aiyar, who appears for some of the attaching creditors, contends that the assignee is not entitled to take out execution and relies on the judgment of this Court in Thiruvengadam Pillai v. Doredla Subbiah (3). That case, no doubt, seems to support his contention. There, the assignment was prior to the date of the attachment of the decree. Benson and Abdur Rahim, JJ., held that, according to Order XXI, rule 53, clause (2) of the Civil Procedure Code, only an attaching creditor or his judgment-debtor, i.e., the original holder of the decree attached, was entitled to execute the attached decree. With all deference, I am unable to agree with this ruling. Rule 16 of the Order entitles an assignee in writing of a decree to apply for execution and proceeds to state: "The decree may be executed in the same manner and subject to the same conditions as if the application were made by such decree-holder." That recognises the indubitable principle that the assignee has the same rights as the assignor. There is no reason to suppose that the attachment of a decree in any way curtails the rights of the assignee of it. In the case before the learned Judges, the assignment was prior to the attachment so that the attacher had nothing which he could validly attach in law. Assuming that an assignee of a decree has not, in all cases, an absolute right to enforce his right by execution and that there may be complicated equities arising out of the assignment which could not properly be made the subject matter of execution proceedings, [see Yakoob Ali Chowdry v. Ramdoolal (4)], that does not in any way affect the rights as between the assignee and the attaching creditor. When the assignment is after an attachment, it will, of course, be subject to the rights of the attacher just as the assignor's right itself would be; but it is difficult to see why this should interfere with the assignee's right to stand in the shoes of the assignor and as, according to rule 53, clause 2 of Order XXI of the Code of Civil Procedure, a person, whose decree has been attachad, may apply for execution notwithstanding the attachment, his assignee must be held entitled to have the same right. According to section 273 of the repealed Code, the attacher alone apparently could apply for execution of the attached decree. See Thuchakovil Unni Koya v. Arapayil Pathuthi Umma (5), although Maclean, C. J., even there held that the holder of an attached decree could apply for execution. See Adhar Chandra Das v. Lal Mohan Dass (6). But, Order XXI, rule 53, of the present Code, clearly recognises the right of the attacher's judgment-debtor also to execute his decree. Whichever of the two may take out execution, he must, of course, hold the proceeds realised in execution in trust for the satisfaction of the rights of the attacher in the first instance and the balance for the benefit of the holder of the attached decree. I must, therefore, overrule the contention that, in consequence of the attachment, the assignor became incompetent to execute the decree. I have already found that the assignment in this case was in fraud of the assignor's creditors. Does this disentitle him to take out execution? As already observed, his assignment is perfectly good against the assignor. It must also be valid against the judgment-debtors of the assignor; they have no right to say that only the assignor and not the assignee should have execution against them. The assignment, no doubt, will not prevent the creditors from proceeding against the decree as if it still remained the property of the assignor. What is the legal result of such a state of affairs? I think, it must be taken to be that the assignment, though valid as between the parties to it, is subject to the rights of creditors, including both those who may have already attached the decree and other creditors who might proceed against the decree notwithstanding the assignment. But the assignee may, like the assignor, himself take out execution against the judgment-debtors; the proceeds of execution will, however, be subject in his hands to a trust for the creditors whose rights were sought to be defeated by the assignment. The assignor himself having parted with all his rights is no longer entitled to the benefit of the decree. There is no principle on which he can be held to be the legal owner and a trustee for his assignee whose rights are perfect as against himself. There is, therefore, no reason for holding that the assignee is altogether disentitled to execute.

The appellant contends that he is entitled to an order for execution without any determination of the rights of the attaching creditors-respondents and that they have no right to intervene at all in these proceedings. I do not think that this contention should prevail. It does not appear that any of the attaching creditors has yet applied for execution of the attached decree. But if their attachments are valid, they have obtained substantial rights in the decree and they are interested in resisting the appellant's right to execution and in getting their own rights to payment out of the proceeds of execution recognised in priority to appellant's rights. If the property in question were not a decree but, say, immoveable property, they would, according to the recognised procedure, be entitled to attach it notwithstanding a fraudulent alienation by their judgment-debtor and the alienee would have to assert his right to the property by a claim petition and any order passed on such a petition would be subject to the right of the unsuccessful party, whether the assignee or the attaching creditor, to establish his right by a regular suit. As the property in question is a decree, both the assignee and the attaching creditor are, according to the Civil Procedure Code, persons entitled to apply for the execution of the decree. They must, therefore, both be entitled to get an adjudication as to whether either has a right to execute and what their rights of priority are. An assignor, as well as an attaching creditor, is a representative of the original decree-holder; and when the attaching creditor impeaches the right of the assignee to execute, he is entitled to urge his objection in execution proceedings to the assignee's right to take out execution. I cannot, therefore, hold that the attachers had no right to intervene in these proceedings.

The appellant next contends that all the attachments in question made by the several respondents are invalid. I shall deal with them separately. The objection taken to the attachment of the 17th and 18th respondents, the holders of decrees in Original Suit No. 56 of 1905 and Original Suit No. 313 of 1905 on the file of the Court of the District Munsif of Tiruvady, respectively, is, that they were not made by the Courts which passed those decrees but by the Courts to which they were transferred. It is, no doubt, true that, according to rule 53 of Order XXI, the issue of a notice to the Court which passed the decrees sought to be attached to stay the execution of the decree until the cancellation of the notice or an application for execution of the decree to be attached by the attacher or his judgment-debtor, should be made by the Court, which passed the decree in execution of which the attachment is sought. But, is an order of attachment by the Court actually executing the decree after its transfer to it from the Court which passed it, altogether void? According to section 42 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, the Court executing a decree has the same powers of executing it as if it had been passed by itself. There are, no doubt, special provisions which direct that applications of particular kinds relating to execution should be made to the Court which passed the decree. But, assuming that section 42 does not show that the executing Court may also attach a decree of another Court, the defect in the attachment in consequence of the order being passed by the executing Court instead of by the Court which passed the decree is not such a jurisdictional defect as to make the order void. In Thamboo Pillay v. Sriramulu Naidu (7), Benson and Miller, JJ., held that the objection to the jurisdiction of a Court, to which a decree was transferred for execution, to issue notice to the legal representatives of a deceased judgment-debtor with a view to execution issuing against them, was one which could be waived. I am of opinion that an objection to the issue of the notices required under Order XXI, rule 53, clause (2) is similarly one that the parties could waive. The attachment of the 17th respondent in execution of his decree was made in August 1905. Although, according to section 273 of the repealed Procedure Code which was then in force, it was not incumbent on the attaching Court to issue notice of the order to the holder of the attached decree, it is impossible to hold that Yogamba Boyi Ammani was unaware of the attachment for a period of nearly four years after it was made. The assignment was in reality made, as already stated, to defeat the rights of the attachers by taking advantage, if possible, of supposed defects in the attachment.

The 18th respondent's attachment in execution of his decree in Original Suit No. 313 of 1905 was on the 13th March 1909, nearly four months before the assignment. Yogamba Boyi Ammani must have received notice of the order of the attaching Court as rule 53 of Order XXI of the present Code makes provision for the issue of such notice. She raised no objection to the attachment but tried to defeat it by means of an alienation to the appellant. I must hold that she waived any objection to the attachments of the 17th and 18th respondents by her acquiescence and the appellant, her assignee, cannot be permitted to raise any objections that she herself did not.

The objection to the 16th respondent's attachment is different. He was himself one of the judgment-debtors in Original Suit No. 13 of 1903, on the file of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Tanjore, the decree attached by him. It is contended that he could not, as an attaching creditor, obtain a right to execute the decree passed against himself and other judgment-debtors. It is really unnecessary to decide at the present stage whether there could be any valid objections to his taking out execution. It does not appear that he has applied for execution of the decree in Original Suit No. 13 of 1903. It does not appear further that the other judgment-debtors in Original Suit No. 13 of 1903 would raise any objection to his claim to execute the decree. The appellant's objection is rested on the proviso to rule 16 of Order XXI that "Where a decree for the payment of money against two or more persons has been transferred to one of them, it shall not be executed against the others." This rule does not make the assignment of a decree in favour of one of several judgment-debtors invalid in law. It only provides that the transferee is not entitled to enforce his rights by execution of the decree. It will be noticed that the rule refers only to the rights of the transferee of a money-decree. An attaching creditor is not a transferee for the purposes of execution: he is declared to be the representative-in-interest of the decree-holder whose right he attaches. It is doubtful whether rule 16 which lays down merely a rule of procedure can be applied to cases to which its language does not in terms extend. The attacher in seeking to execute the decree stands in the shoes of the holder of the decree and holds the proceeds of the execution in trust for himself and the original decree-holder. No doubt, if he is permitted to take out execution, he may be enabled to realize the amount of the decree from his co-judgment-debtors alone leaving them to assert their right to contribution. It is, at any rate, clear that no one except the judgment-debtor in the decree attached can object to the attacher's right to execute. The attachment itself cannot be held to be invalid even if there would be any valid defence by his co-judgment-debtors to an application by him to execute the decree. I cannot, at the present stage, decide the question of his right to take out execution. The Civil Procedure Code does not expressly lay down the rules as to the course to be pursued by the Court if several persons who have rights in a decree all seek to execute it. Rule 15 of Order XXI provides for cases where a decree has been passed jointly in favour of more persons than one. But there is no rule laid down where there are several attaching creditors all entitled to execute according to rule 53 or where an attaching creditor and his judgment-debtor both seek to execute the decree. If execution is allowed in favour of any one of them and if more than one person having interest in a decree are entitled to execute it, provision must, of course, be made for the protection of the interests of other persons having rights in the decree. There does not appear to be any objection to execution being granted jointly in favour of more persons than one. The rights of all parties interested in the proceeds of execution should, of course, not be affected by any one of them being allowed to execute. The Court would also have power to appoint a Receiver to execute the decree and to pay over the proceeds to the various parties interested. If the attaching creditors in this case or any of them apply for execution, regard must be had to these observations in deciding the proper course to be adopted.

The order of the lower Court dismissing the appellant's application is set aside and the petition for execution is remanded to the lower Court for fresh disposal according to law. It will be the duty of the lower Court, before passing final orders, to take steps to protect the rights of all parties to the petition. If the attaching decree-holders also apply for execution, it will decide, on a consideration of all the circumstances of the case, which one or more of the parties should be allowed to take out execution. The costs of this appeal will abide the result so far as the appellant and the judgment-debtors are concerned. The appellant must pay the 18th respondent's costs of this appeal.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—I have had the advantage of perusing the judgment of my learned brother in this case. So far as the 1st respondent, viz., the assignor of the petitioner is concerned and so far also as the respondents Nos. 2 to 15, who are the judgment-debtors, are concerned, I entirely agree with my learned brother, for the reasons stated by him, that their objections to the petitioner being allowed to execute the decree as the assignee of the decree-holder cannot be legally sustained. The 16th respondent is the 15th judgment-debtor and is also the decree-holder in Small Cause Suit No. 905 of 1903 of the same Subordinate Judge's Court in which the petitioner wants to execute his decree. He has attached the decree passed against him and others in favour of his own decree-holder. I have grave doubts, having regard to clause (4) of Order XXI, rule 18 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, and illustration (d) to that rule and to the wording of the rule itself, whether the 16th respondent could be allowed to take any other steps in connection with the execution of his Small Cause decree except applying to the Court to set-off the amount due to him as decree-holder in Small Cause Suit No. 905 of 1903 against what is due by him and others as judgment-debtors in Original Suit No. 13 of 1903. In Sinnu Pandaram v. Santhoji Row (8), Boddam and Bashyam Iyengar, JJ., held that the decree for the smaller amount becomes incapable of execution and the decree for the larger amount less the decree for the smaller amount is alone capable of execution where there are such cross-decrees. There was a doubt under section 246 of the old Code whether the holder of a decree passed against several persons jointly and severally may treat it as a cross-decree in relation to a decree passed against him singly in favour of one or more of such persons, but that doubt has been set at rest in favour of an affirmative answer by the new clause (4) and the new illustration (d) introduced in Order XXI, rule 18. Though, in my opinion, the holder of the decree for the smaller amount cannot apply for execution, his rights and priorities should be decided as if the decree for the larger amount was attached at his instance as soon as either of the decree-holders applies for execution.

As regards the 17th and 18th respondents, who hold decrees against the 1st respondent passed by the Tiruvadi District Munsif's Court, they had the present decree of the Tanjore Subordinate Judge's Court attached through other District Munsif's Court than the Tiruvadi District Munsif's Court. Under Order XXI, rule 53, the attachment is to be made by the issue to the Subordinate Judge's Court of a notice by the Court which passed the decree requesting the Subordinate Judge's Court to stay the execution of its decree till the 17th and 18th respondents or the 1st respondent applies for the execution of the Subordinate Judge's Court's decree. This power of attachment then by Order XXI, rule 53, was vested in the Tiruvadi District Munsif's Court so far as the execution of the decrees of that Court passed in favour of the 17th and 18th respondents is concerned. This power is, by section 42 (section 228 of the old Code), also vested in the Courts to which those decrees of the Tiruvadi District Munsif were sent for execution. The Full Bench case of Swaminatha Ayyar v. Vaidyanatha Sastri (9) was decided on the ground that the bringing of the legal representative of the judgment-debtor on the record under section 234 (present section 50, rule 1) is not a proceeding connected with the exercise of the powers in executing a decree, but is a preliminary step towards those powers being exercised by the Court to which the decree has been transferred, and hence the latter Court had no power to pass orders under section 234. But orders of attachment in execution of a decree, though those orders are effected by sending notice to other Courts, are made in exercise of the powers in executing a decree and, hence, it seems to me that, under section 42, the Court to which the decree is sent for execution can also itself exercise the powers mentioned in Order XXI, rule 53, clause 1 (b), as exercisable by the Court which passed the decree. I am, therefore, of opinion that, without bringing into service the doctrine of waiver relied upon in Thamboo Pillay v. Sriramulu Naidu (7), it is possible to hold that the attachment made by the 17th and 18th respondents through the Tanjore and Tiruvalur District Munsif's Courts are perfectly valid. I may remark, in passing, that I feel serious doubts whether the doctrine of waiver can validate the attachment made by a Court which had no jurisdiction to do so and whether substantive rights given by the attachment could be placed on the same footing as the issue of a notice to the legal representatives of a deceased judgment-debtor and though the waiver of an objection to the jurisdiction of a Court to issue notice to the legal representative might be valid, I am, as at present advised, not at all clear that an objection to the jurisdiction of a Court to attach properties can be waived by mere omission to take objection to such attachment. However, on the view I take of the powers of the Court executing a decree sent to it for execution, it is not necessary to give a final opinion on this point.

In the result, I agree that the order of the lower Court dismissing the appellant's application should be set aside and the petition for execution should be remanded to the lower Court for fresh disposal according to law and that the costs of the appeal should be awarded to the 18th respondent alone, the other's costs abiding the result.

Appeal allowed.

versus

DEBI BAKHSH SINGH AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Usufructuary mortgage, meaning of—Mortgage in which possession is postponed to be delivered on a date subsequent to the mortgage, interpretation of.

The word "deliver" in section 58 does not necessarily mean "deliver immediately" and where the mortgagor is not in a position to give immediate delivery of possession it is sufficient if he gives the right to possession though he cannot give delivery of possession.

Therefore, where under the terms of a mortgage-deed, the possession is to be delivered to the mortgagee subsequent to the date of the mortgage, the transaction is an usufructuary mortgage as defined in section 58 of the Transfer of Property Act.

Pratab Bahadur Singh v. Gajadhar Bakhsh Singh, 21 A. 521; 28 I. A. 148, followed.

If there is a condition in the mortgage-deed by which the mortgaged property cannot be redeemed until a certain period elapses after the date of execution of the deed, the deed is nevertheless a usufructuary mortgage.

JUDGMENT.—On the 22nd August 1872, Jang Bahadur Singh, father of the plaintiffs, mortgaged with possession to Niaz Beg six villages for a consideration of Rs. 14,000 and he subsequently included two more villages in the mortgage. The terms were, that the mortgagee should remain in possession of the villages for 25 years, from the commencement of the kharif of 1280 Fasli to the end of the rabi of 1304 Fasli; that the profits of the eight villages for the first five years should be enjoyed absolutely by the mortgagee, and that during the remaining twenty years, Rs. 600 a year were to be devoted towards the payment of the principal amount, the remainder of the income being enjoyed in lieu of interest. Under the provisions of this deed, it would thus appear that at the end of the term, the mortgagor could redeem the mortgage, and re-gain possession of the villages on payment of Rs. 2,000. On the 24th December 1890, Jang Bahadur Singh mortgaged his existing rights in the village Jiganiauwas, one of the eight villages in question, (with other villages), to Hukam Singh and Sahipat Singh by a deed of simple mortgage without possession. Jang Bahadur Singh sold his rights in another of these villages called Anantpur to Har Prasad. On the 12th October 1895, the plaintiffs, who are the successors-in-interest of Jang Bahadur Singh, mortgaged with possession their interests in the village Jiganiau (with the exception of an area of 1 bigha 6 biswas) to Manna Ratan Singh who is now represented by defendants Nos. 1 to 4. The deed was for a consideration of Rs. 14,000, of which Rs. 7,036-4-0 were paid in cash, and Rs. 6,963-12-0 were left with the mortgagee for the satisfaction of the simple mortgage of the 24th December 1890 in favour of Hukam Singh and Sahipat Singh. According to the terms of the deed of the 12th October 1895, the mortgagors were not to be at liberty to redeem until the end of the Fasli year 1314. On the same date, the 12th October 1895, the plaintiffs executed a deed of further charge, by which it was agreed that Rs. 1,706-4-0 were to be paid in addition to the sum of Rs. 14,000 already mentioned before the property could be redeemed. This deed was not for cash, but the consideration was stated to represent the profits that would be due from the 12th October 1895 to the beginning of 1305 Fasli, that is to say, to September 1897. The reason for the execution of this deed of further charge was that, under the terms of the deed of 22nd August 1872, it was not possible for the mortgagors to place Manna Ratan Singh in possession of Jigniau until the beginning of 1305 Fasli. It is to be noted that in the sale to Har Prasad a sufficient amount had been left with the vendee to redeem the deed of mortgage of 22nd August 1872. On the 20th May 1897, Rs. 2,000 were deposited in Court for the redemption of the deed of 22nd August 1872. This sum was refused by the successors-in-interest of Niaz Beg, and a suit for redemption of the deed of 22nd August 1872 was brought on the 27th August 1897. To this suit, Manna Ratan Singh, as mortgagee under the deeds of 12th October 1895, Har Prasad and Jwala Prasad, as vendees of the village Anantpur, and Pirthi Raj, brother of Jang Bahadur Singh, who had obtained rights in a portion of the property mortgaged by the deed of 22nd August 1872 under a family partition, were joined as plaintiffs, and the parties represented every one interested in the eight villages which had passed into the possession of Niaz Beg under the deed of 22nd August 1872. A decree for possession by redemption was passed in favour of the plaintiffs on the 3rd March 1898, and joint possession was obtained through the Court over all the eight villages on the 29th March 1898. The mortgagees appealed to the District Judge, and on the 5th November 1898, the District Judge set aside the decision of the lower Court, and remanded the case for re-trial. In consequence of the order of the District Judge, the descendants of Niaz Beg received possession of these eight villages through the Court on the 7th December 1898. The lower Court re-tried the case, and dismissed the suit on the 4th August 1899. An appeal was again filed, and, it being then discovered that the appeal lay to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner and had previously been improperly filed in the Court of the District Judge, the appeal was taken to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner, which decided on the 5th June 1900 in favour of the plaintiffs and directed redemption for the sum of Rs. 2,000. On the 15th July 1900, possession of the eight villages was restored to all the plaintiffs jointly under the order of the Judicial Commissioner. On the 5th June 1911, the plaintiffs deposited under the provisions of section 83 of Act IV of 1882 Rs. 15,706-4-0 to redeem the property affected by the two deeds of the 12th October 1895. The defendants-respondents Nos. 1 to 4 who are successors-in-interest of Manna Ratan Singh, refused to accept the tender, and on the 4th November 1911, the suit was instituted against the decree, in which the present appeal has been preferred. Defendant No. 5 was impleaded as a sub-mortgagee, who had obtained a decree on the 12th of May 1911 against the defendants Nos. 1 to 4. The case taken by the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 was, that they did not obtain possession of the property mortgaged till July 1900, and they, therefore, demanded that, before redemption should take place, they should receive the profits for 1305, 1306 and 1307 Faslis. They estimated those profits at Rs. 892 a year, that is to say, Rs. 2,676, and further claimed interest to the extent of Rs. 4,488 making a total of Rs. 7,164. Their case was thus that the village could be redeemed upon payment of Rs.[22,870-4. The learned Subordinate Judge decreed redemption on the payment of Rs. 18,376-14-5. The plaintiffs appeal.

The learned Subordinate Judge decided that this was an anomalous mortgage and the first point that I shall decide is whether it was an anomalous or an usufructuary mortgage. The two deeds of 12th October 1895 really represent one transaction. The mortgagors agreed in these two deeds that, in consideration of the mortgagee paying Rs. 6,963-12 in satisfaction of the deed of 24th December 1890, and paying Rs. 7,036-4 in cash to the mortgagors, and agreeing to abstain from taking possession until the beginning of 1305 Fasli over the property mortgaged (the compensation for such abstention being valued at Rs. 1,706-4), that is to say, in consideration of Rs. 15,706-4, the mortgagee was to be placed in possession of the whole of the village Jiganiau with the exception of an area of 1 bigha, 6 biswas and that he was to hold this village for ten years at least from the beginning of 1305 Fasli and that after that period, the mortgagors should be at liberty to redeem the property. The deeds provided that the interest on the said Rs. 15,706-4 should be considered as satisfied from the usufruct of the property, and the amount payable on redemption was fixed at Rs. 15,706-4. The definition of an usufructuary mortgage in section 58 of Act IV of 1882 is:—"Where the mortgagor delivers possession of the mortgaged property to the mortgagee and authorises him to retain such possession until payment of the mortgage-money, and to receive the rents and profits accruing from the property, and to appropriate them in lieu of interest, or in payment of the mortgage-money, or partly in lieu of interest and partly in payment of the mortgage-money, the transaction is called an usufructuary mortgage and the mortgagee an usufructuary mortgagee." Here the possession was to be delivered, but it was to be delivered on a subsequent date. The mortgage-money was Rs. 15,706-4 and possession was to be retained until the payment of the mortgage-money. The rent and profits accruing from the property were to be appropriated in lieu of interest, but redemption was postponed for a period, and was not to be allowed until the end of the year 1314 Fasli. If there is nothing inconsistent with the nature of an usufructuary mortgage, as defined in the Act, in the facts that the delivery of possession was to be postponed, and that redemption was not to take place until a certain period had elapsed from the date of the execution, this transaction is clearly an usufructuary mortgage as defined in section 58. For the appellants it is argued that the word "delivers" in section 58 does not necessarily mean "delivers immediately" and where, as was the case here, the mortgagor is not in a position to give immediate delivery of possession, it is sufficient if he gives the right to possession though he cannot give delivery of possession. Against this, it is argued for the respondents that the immediate delivery of possession is a component part of this species of mortgage; and that, therefore, until there is possession, an usufructuary mortgage does not come into existence. Dr. Gour states, in his well known Treatise on the Transfer of Property Act, that the immediate delivery of possession to the mortgagee is a sine qua non in this form of security, which cannot be displaced by the registration of the mortgage-deed, or by delivery of possession on a subsequent date. It is not, however, possible to suggest that the existence of a clause permitting postponement of delivery of possession shows that a deed containing it is, therefore, not an usufructuary mortgage, in view of the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Partab Bahadur Singh v. Gajadhar Bakhsh Singh (1). In that case, the mortgagor covenanted to put the mortgagee in possession of certain villages at a subsequent date and to pay interest at 24 per cent. until possession was delivered:—Their Lordships said at pages 530 to 531: "It appears to thier Lordships that this decision is right. The only provision in the mortgage-bond as to interest is in these words: 'Until delivery of possession of the aforesaid villages to the Raja Saheb ..... I shall pay interest at the rate of 2 per cent. on the above mentioned mortgage-money', and the subsequent words

1) 24 A. 521; 29 I. A. 148.

'Until I pay up the sum of Rs. 5,600 on account of principal with interest to the very last pie' must be read to refer to interest as previously stipulated, namely, until possession was given of the mortgaged property. The mortgage was of the class known as usufructuary mortgages, which are not uncommon in India, and in which possession of the mortgaged property is delivered to the mortgagee who takes the rents and profits in lieu of interest or in payment of the mortgage-money or partly in lieu of interest and partly in payment of the mortgage-money (Act IV of 1882 section 58) (d)." This is a very clear pronouncement that a mortgage in which possession was to be delivered but in which the delivery of possession was deferred was an usufructuary mortgage, and on the authority of this decision, I find that the existence of the clause in the deed in question, by which delivery of possession was postponed until the beginning of 1305 Fasli, does not preclude the determination of this mortgage as an usufructuary mortgage.

I now come to the second point, whether the existence of a condition in the deed by which the property could not be redeemed until a certain period had elapsed after the date of the execution, is sufficient to show that the deed in question cannot be considered as an usufructuary mortgage. The following decisions are quoted to support the proposition that such amortgage is anomalous:—Hikmatulla Khan v. Imam Ali (2); Visvalinga Pillai v. Palaniappa Chetti (3) and Tukaram v. Ram Chand Malukchand (4). The Allahabad decision referred to a case where a person had mortgaged certain land with possession in favour of a mortgagee who was to receive the profits, credit Rs. 36 from the same to himself as interest, and credit the remainder towards the payment of the principal, was to remain in possession for four years and at the end of the time, the mortgage was to stand redeemed if principal and interest had been paid out of profits, but otherwise the mortgagor was to be responsible for any deficiency. A Bench of two Judges decided that this instrument was an anomalous mortgage, but also decided that for the first four years, it was an usufructuary mortgage, and it was to be regarded as an usufructuary mortgage not only during the four years but after their expiration. In the Madras case, it was decided (with hesitation) that an Arakattu otti deed was an anomalous mortgage. I do not find that the circumstances in the Madras case are parallel with the circumstances in the present appeal. The Bombay case referred to a deed headed "Mortgage-deed with possession regarding land" by which the beneficiary was to take possession of certain land for ten years, and appropriate the income thereof in liquidation of a debt, with condition that after the expiry of the said period, the right to the land was to cease. On the one side, it was argued that this documnt was a lease and on the other side it was argued that it was a mortgage. A Full Bench decided that the deed was a mortgage and came to the following conclusion:—"It was contended by Mr. Setlur" (This Counsel had argued that the document was a lease) "that in the definition of an usufructuary mortgage, as set forth in section 58 clause (d) of the Transfer of Property Act, there is no mention of any fixed term. That, no doubt, is so, but the law contemplates the property remaining in the possession of the mortgagee, who is authorised to retain it until payment of the mortgage-money, and to appropriate the rents and profits in lieu of interest, or in payment of principal or both, and the nature of the contract is not altered by the fact that the calculation is made beforehand of the period for which the rents and profits will be sufficient to pay off both principal and interest." From this, it would appear that the Full Bench decided that the deed in question was an usufructuary mortgage. It is true they subsequently added that there was no apparent reason why it should not come within the category of an anomalous mortgage, but the effect of the decision is rather that the deed was an usufructuary mortgage. The Full Bench had only to decide, whether it was a mortgage or a lease, and not whether it was or was not an usufructuary or an anomalous mortgage. I consider that this decision is rather in favour of the appellants than of the respondents. There is a later ruling of a Bench of the Allahabad High Court in which the Bench decided that a mortgage which could not be redeemed until five years after the date of execution was a deed of usufructuary mortgage. This is the decision in Khuda Bakhsh v. Alim-un-nissa (5). At page 315, Sir John Stanley, C. J., says:—"The mortgage in fact is a simple usufructuary mortgage." I am unable to find any reason, why the existence of a condition postponing redemption should be considered to convert what would otherwise be an usufructuary mortgage into an anomalous mortgage, and I am supported in this view by the decision of the Allahabad High Court in the case which I have just mentioned. Taking all the facts and circumstances together, I interpret the two deeds of 12th October 1895, which I consider to embody the same transaction, as one deed of usufructuary mortgage.

Having disposed of this point, it is now necessary to consider the main question of loss of profits by the respondents. As has already been shown, Manna Ratan Singh was in possession of the property in question from the 29th of March 1898 to the 6th December 1898. It is true that the possession of this village Jiganiau was held by him jointly with many other persons, the whole of the possession affecting eight villages of which Jigniau was one, but in virtue of the decree there could have been no possible difficulty in the way of his obtaining separate possession over Jiganiau for that period, and between the dates of the 29th March 1898 and the 6th December 1898, he was in a position to make full collections for the agricultural year. As the year 1305 commenced in Setpember 1897 and the prior mortgagee was entitled to remain in possession up to that date, he was thus deprived only of an opportunity to make collections for the kharif of 1306. He was in a position to make the rabi collections of 1305 and the kharif collections of 1306. He was dispossessed on the 7th December 1898 and did not re-gain possession till the 14th July 1900. He was thus deprived of an opportunity to make the rabi collections of 1306, the kharif collections of 1307, and the rabi collections of 1307. It is, however, to be noted that the mortgagors had done all that they possibly could do to put the mortgagee in possession. Rupees 2,000 had been deposited in Court on the 20th May 1897 but the sons of Niaz Beg had refused to accept it. The mortgagors had without delay filed a suit for redemption. The fact that Manna Ratan Singh was out of possession from the 7th December 1898 to the 14th July 1900 was owing to an erroneous decision of the two Courts, which was subsequently corrected by the Court of the Judicial Commissioner. But, further, the record shows that in 1903 Pirthi Raj Singh applied in execution of the decree directing redemption, for the profits of the period during which he had been out of possession of the property which had fallen in his share in Application No. 97. Manna Ratan Singh applied for the profits of Jiganiau for a similar period by an application No. 134. The Subordinate Judge dismissed both applications. Manna Ratan Singh did not appeal against his decision. Pirthi Raj Singh appealed against the decision and obtained from the Judicial Commissioner's Court on the 28th June 1904 an order to the effect that the profits for that period were payable to him in execution. It is true that the Judicial Commissioner's Court qualified this decision by an addition that it was to be decided, as a matter of fact, whether he had or had not made surplus collections, since he had come into possession sufficient to satisfy the profits in question, and that on the decision of fact, it was found that he had made surplus collections which were sufficient to cover these profits, but the point was decided in his favour that such profits could be recovered in execution; and had Manna Ratan Singh carried the matter further, the decision would, no doubt, also have been in his favour. The decisions in Bhawani Prasad v. Saheb Din (6) and Mahadaji v. Joti (7) are not exactly in point, though the principle laid down in those decisions has a distinct bearing on the decision in this appeal. I prefer to decide the point upon a general principle. Here I find that the appellants have been asked to re-coup the respondents for damages which they have incurred owing to the action of the prior mortgagees and of Courts which came to an erroneous decision. The persons responsible are the prior mortgagees in the first instance. The damage caused by their action must be suffered either by the appellants or by respondents Nos. 1 to 4. On general principles, there would not appear to be strong reason for saddling the appellants who had kept their portion of the bargain and did their best to put the predecessor of respondents Nos. 1 to 4 in possession with responsibility for damage incurred by the action of a third party and when, as in this case, it appears that the predecessor of respondents Nos. 1 to 4 had a legal remedy to recover these damages from the offending party and that he lost this remedy by omitting to pursue it, they have, in my opinion, no case against the appellants for the recovery of these damages. The learned Subordinate Judge has laid stress upon a clause in the deed of 12th October 1895, which I interpret to mean that if the mortgagee's interests are threatened, the mortgagor will defend those interests. I do not consider that this clause can be construed as a contract to indemnify, and, in any circumstances, I do not find that the existence of this clause would justify respondents Nos. 1 to 4 obtaining possession for mesne profits which they had been unable to realise through no fault of the appellants. For the above reasons, I consider that the deeds of the 12th October 1895 did not provide for redemption of the property in question for a sum in excess of Rs. 15,706 4, the amount tendered by the plaintiffs under the provisions of section 83 of Act IV of 1882 on the 5th June 1911. I, therefore, modify the decree of the learned Subordinate Judge by directing redemption for Rs. 15,706-4 and as that sum was tendered under the provisions of the law on the 5th July 1911 and respondents Nos. 1 to 4 refused to accept it, without proper justification, I direct that the respondents Nos. 1 to 4 should pay the costs of the appellants in the original suit and in this appeal. It was owing to the action of the respondents Nos. 1 to 4 that the appellants were forced to sue. The latter had taken the remedy which the law allowed them of tendering the correct amount in Court, and in the circumstances, they are, in my opinion, entitled to costs of both Courts. The appellants have further pressed for mesne profits from the 5th June 1911 to date; but I do not find that they sued for this relief in the original suit; and even in the present appeal, they have not claimd this relief explicitly. I decide that they are not entitled to this latter relief. The learned Counsel for respondent No. 5 has asked that whatever may be realised, that is, the sum of Rs. 15,706-4 should be payable to his client in satisfaction of his decree of the 12th May 1911. This must, of course, be done. I do not modify the decree of the learned Subordinate Judge in any other respect except by substitution of a sum of Rs. 15,706-4 in place of the sum of Rs. 18,376-14-5, and on the point of costs. Respondent No. 5 was awarded no costs in the lower Court and I see no reason to award him costs in this Court.

Decree modified.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 11—Res judicata—"Ought"—Under-proprietary rights in Oudh, meaning of—Oudh Rent Act (XXII of 1886), s. 3, cl. 6—Proprietary rights, claim as to, does not affect under-proprietary rights—Pleas in defence which ought to be raised—Inconsistent pleas when barred.

A sued B. for the recovery of the estate of a deceased Talukdar C. and obtained a decree for possession of the estate. In execution of his decree, A. obtained possession of the said property. B. objected that the under-proprietary rights in the property were held by A. and B. under previous Settlement Court decrees and that these rights were not affected by the decree for the proprietary rights obtained by A. On this ground, B. claimed restitution of the property. In the decree obtained by A. against B., no reservation was made in respect of the under-proprietary rights in favour of B.; no question was in issue as to under-proprietary rights in the suit:

Held, (1) that the decree related to the proprietary rights of C.'s estate and did not affect the under-proprietary rights held by A. and B. jointly and independently of C.;

(2) that the under-proprietary rights were no part of the property of C.;

(3) that as A. and B. litigated as rival claimants to the estate of C., under a title different from the one claimed as under-proprietors, section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code could have no application.

A party may join two or more alternative claims for relief based on inconsistent allegations but is not bound to join them in a claim unless such joinder is possible without confusion or embarassment and without impleading others as additional parties. The word "ought" in explanation IV, section 11, Civil Procedure Code, should be interpreted with reference to the array of parties to the previous litigation and the nature of the estate or claim then claimed or set up.

Daya Shankar v. Ganga Sahai, 12 O. C. 347; 4 Ind. Cas. 763, followed.

Under-proprietary rights are independent and distinct from proprietary rights. They do not form a part and parcel of talukdari rights. An under-proprietor has as complete an ownership over his land as that possessed by a superior proprietor, subject only to the payment, in certain cases, of rent or malikana to the superior proprietor. An under-proprietor can deal with his property as freely as a superior proprietor can deal with his, and an under-proprietor's interests are heritable and transferable. The main distinction between a proprietor and an under-proprietor, is that the former is not only the owner or part-owner of the mahal, but is also entitled to engage directly with Government for land revenue, while the latter, though owner of the land within the mahal is not entitled to engage directly with Government but pays his assessment to the proprietor of the mahal.

Appeal against an order of the Sub-Judge, Tahsil Biswan, dated 29th April 1911.

Mr. Mohammad Waseem, for the Appellant.

Babu Rampat Ram, for the Respondent.

ORDER.—This appeal arises out of an application for execution of a decree obtained by Babu Chandrabhan Singh against Babu Debi Bakhsh Signh, the father of the judgment-debtor-appellant, for the recovery of possession over certain villages, forming the estate of the late Rana Raghuraj Singh, known and described as the Rajpur estate, and some other property, on the 5th July 1907. The decree was confirmed by their Lordships of the Privy Council on the 15th July 1910.*

The decree-holder obtained possession over the said property in execution of his decree. The judgment-debtor then filed an objection, stating that the decree-holder had taken actual possession of Mauzas Ladlapur and Chak Randa, on the allegation that they formed part of the Rajpur estate, whereas the decree aforesaid awarded possession to the decree-holder of the proprietary rights of the late Rana Raghuraj Singh in the said villages but did not affect the under-proprietary rights, and that the under-proprietary rights in the said mauzas were held by the decree-holder and the judgment-debtor under decrees of the Settlement Courts, dated the 16th December 1870 and the 28th February 1871. He claimed restitution and mesne profits from the date of his dispossession to the date on which restitution may be effected.

The learned Subordinate Judge disallowed the objection on the ground that no reservation in respect of under-proprietary rights in favour of the judgment-debtor was given in the decree and that the claim to under-proprietary rights was, therefore, barred by Explanation IV of section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

In appeal, it is contended, on behalf of the judgment-debtor-appellant, that there was no question in issue as to under-proprietary rights in the previous litigation, and that the judgment-debtor was, therefore, entitled to remain in possession of his under-proprietary rights irrespective of the provisions of that decree.

In order to ascertain the nature of the estate which formed the subject-matter of the litigation, which resulted in the above decree, it is necessary to refer to the plaint in the original case. Paragraphs 4 and 10 of it stated that Rana Raghuraj Singh had originally obtained the Rajpur estate, comprising the villages entered therein, including Mauzas Ladlapur and Chak Panda, as a special grant from the British Government and that, after the death of his widow, the plaintiff, as the eldest descendant and reversionary heir of the late Rana Raghuraj Singh, became entitled to his estate. The plaint further stated that, under orders passed by the Revenue Courts on the 19th October 1904 and the 18th February 1905, the defendant had, without any legal justification, taken possession of the entire property in suit. No reference was made in the plaint to the decrees of the Settlement Courts, dated the 16th December 1870 and the 28th February 1871, and it is obvious from the plaint that the suit was confined to the estate of the late Rana Raghuraj Singh and the right, title and interest he held therein and did not cover subordinate rights claimed to have been held by the parties to that litigation independently of the late Rana Raghuraj Singh.

According to the law in force in Oudh, under-proprietary rights are independent of proprietary rights and an under-proprietor has as complete an ownership over his land as that possessed by a superior proprietor, subject only to the payment, in certain cases, of rent or malikana to the superior proprietor. An under-proprietor can deal with his property as freely as a superior proprietor can deal with his, and an under-proprietor's interests are heritable and transferable. The main distinction between a proprietor and an under-proprietor is that the former is not only the owner or part owner of the mahal, but is also entitled to engage directly with Government for the land revenue, while the latter is owner of the land within the mahal, and is not entitled to engage directly with Government but pays his assessment to the proprietor of the mahal. Section 3, clause (6), of the Oudh Rent Act, accordingly lays down that "proprietor" does not include an under-proprietor: and where there are two private rights of property, one superior and the other subordinate, in the same land, "proprietor" means the holder of the superior right only. Clauses 7 and 8 of the said section further lay down that "proprietary right" means a proprietor's right in land, and an "under-proprietor" means any person possessing a heritable and transferable right of property in land for which he is liable to pay rent.

At the time of the passing of the Oudh Estates Act (I of 1869), to which a reference was made in paragraph 4 of the plaint, it was distinctly declared that, while the sanads granted to the talukdars conferred on them and their heirs for ever the full proprietary rights in their respective estates, those sanads did not affect the rights of inferior proprietors, who held an interest in land intermediate between the talukdars and the ryots. Some of those under-proprietary rights related to the sir and nankar lands, granted in lieu of maintenance, while others were ascertained and declared at the time of the Sub-Settlement under Act XXVI of 1866. These under-proprietary rights, to all intent and purposes, were independent and distinct from the proprietary rights and if the decree related to the proprietary rights of the late Rana Raghuraj Singh in the Rajpur estate as is shown by the plaint, it would be unfair to hold that it affected the under-proprietary rights held by the parties to that case jointly and independently of the late Rana Raghuraj Singh.

The litigation which ended in the decree related to the property of the late Rana Raghuraj Singh, but the present dispute relates to under-proprietary rights, which form no part of the property of the late Rana Raghuraj Singh. A decree affecting the property of the late Rana Raghuraj Singh cannot, therefore, affect the under-proprietary rights, if any, held by the parties jointly and from before in a different capacity. As under-proprietary rights do not form a part and parcel of talukdari rights, but are independent of them and, as the parties then litigated as rival claimants to the late Rana Raghuraj Singh's estate under a title different from the one now claimed, section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure can have no application. The decree for possession obtained by Babu Chandrabhan Singh related, in our opinion, only to the proprietary rights of the late Rana Raghuraj Singh, whose estate the decree-holder was then claiming and, if the parties to the present decree held under-proprietary rights in the two villages in question, independently of the rights possessed by the late Rana Raghuraj Singh, those rights will not be affected by this decree.

The learned Subordinate Judge relies on a dictum of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Srimut Raja Moottoo Vijava Rajanadha Bodha Gooroo Sawmy Periya Odaya Taver v. Katama Natachiar(1), in support of his contention that, if the judgment-debtor wanted to save the under-proprietary rights common to him and the plaintiff from the operation of that decree, it was necessary for him to set up those rights in his defence. That was, however, a case in which the defendant could have resisted the suit brought against him on the ground that the property claimed was undivided as also on the ground that he was entitled to it under a Will and if he did not set up either of those alternative titles, it was evidently improper that he should have been allowed to set up one of those alternative title afterwards to disturb the decree.

In the present case, the parties are not litigating under the same title but claim a title independently of the late Rana Raghuraj Singh and, as observed in Daya Shankar v. Ganga Sahai (2), a party may join two or more alternative claims for relief based on inconsistent allegations but he is not bound to so join them in a claim unless such joinder is possible without confusion or embarassment and without impleading others as co-plaintiffs or adding as additional defendants. The word "ought" in Explanation IV of section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure should be interpreted with reference to the array of the parties to the previous litigation and the nature of the estate or title then claimed or set up.

The learned Counsel for the decree-holder-respondent has cited certain authorities in support of the proposition that a Court executing a decree cannot go behind its terms, but the under-proprietary rights, forming the subject-matter of the present objection, did not form a part and parcel of the estate of the late Rana Raghuraj Singh, in respect of which the decree was obtained; and an enjoyment by the parties of the under-proprietary rights, if any, in the villages in question would not, therefore, be inconsistent with the enforcement of the decree for possession in regard to the Rajpur estate.

We, therefore, allow the appeal and, setting aside the decree and order of the Court below, remand the case for a trial on the merits. The costs of the appeal will abide the result.

Appeal allowed.

Pre-emption—Right of othidar in possession to claim pre-emption—Limitation—Knowledge of sale to third party—Limitation Act (XV of 1877), Sch. II, Art. 120.

The right of an othidar in possession of property to claim pre-emption consists in a right to elect, when there has been an attempt on the part of the owner of the property to sell it to a third person, whether he will buy it for the same price as that offered by the third person or not.

Article 120 of the Limitation Act provides the period of limitation for a suit by an othidar for pre-emption, and time commences to run against the othidar from the date he has knowledge of the sale and of its terms and not from the date of the sale.

Second appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge of North Malabar, in A. S. No. 346 of 1901, preferred against that of the District Munsif of Tellicherry, in O. S. No. 545 of 1908.

The Hon'ble Mr. J. L. Rosario, (Advocate-General), for the Appellants.

The Hon'ble Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Aiyar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises in a suit instituted by an othidar to enforce his right of pre-emption, and the question argued before us is, whether the lower Courts are right in dismissing the suit on the ground that it is barred by limitation without finding that six years had elapsed since the date the plaintiff came to know of the sale by auction. There is no finding when the plaintiff had knowledge of the auction sale. We are asked to consider whether it is enough for an othidar, who seeks to enforce his right of pre-emption, to show that he has come to Court before the expiry of six years from the date he came to know of the sale to a third person.

It is contended on behalf of the respondents that Article 120 of the Limitation Act does not imply that time runs from the date when the othidar came to know of the sale; in other words, the right to sue arises from the date of the sale or the contract to sell, independently of when he had knowledge of such sale or contract. We may mention that there is no dispute before us that Article 120 applies to this case, for it is clear that Article 10 does not apply because the othidar himself is in possession and there has been no registered instrument of sale within the meaning of that Article. Article 120 is in general terms. The third column of that Article lays down that the six years run from the date "when the right to sue accrues." It is argued by Mr. Seshagiri Iyer on behalf of the respondent that we should be adding words which are not in the Article if we were to hold that the right to sue arises on the plaintiff coming to know of the sale of which he complains. No doubt, generally speaking, Article 120 does not make it a condition that the plaintiff should have knowledge of the facts which give rise to the cause of action before time begins to run. But there can be no doubt, and this Mr. Seshagiri Iyer very fairly concedes, that, if the nature of the right imports, as a necessary condition, knowledge of certain facts, then the right to sue cannot be said to arise in such a case unless the plaintiff has the necessary knowledge. The right of pre-emption which an othidar has, depends entirely on the custom which prevails in the West Coast. The materials from which the usage is to be gathered, and the nature and extent of the right of pre-emption are to be found in certain decisions of this Court. The cases to which we have been referred are Cheria Krishnan v. Vishnu Nambudri (1), Vasudevan v. Keshavan (2), Kanharankutti v. Uthotti (3), Ammotti Haji v. Kunhayen Kutti (4), Krishna Menon v. Kesavan (5), Ramasami Patter v. Chinnan Asari (6), Kurri Veerareddi v. Kurri Bapireddi (7) and Kadakamvalli Kammili Sankaran Moosad v. Mokkath Hussain Haji (8). None of these authorities directly decide the present question. The case in Ramasami Patter v. Chinnan Asari (6) is hardly to the point, because there the right to purchase the property in preference to third persons was conferred by an express contract, and the Full Bench decision in Kurri Veerareddi v. Kurri Bipareddi (7) is cited only to show that a mere contract in favour of the defendant to sell the property to him is no answer to a suit in ejectment. Here the suit is by the othidar himself to establish his right. The other cases deal with different questions relating to the right of pre-emption possessed by an othidar. Apart from any particular form of language that has been used in some of these cases, we think it can be fairly inferred from the course of decisions in this Court that the right of the othidar consists in a right to elect, when there has been an attempt on the part of the owner of the property to sell it to a third person, whether he will buy it for the same price as that offered by the third person or not. It is obvious that such a right can only be exercised when the othidar knows, first of all, that the property is sold or attempted to be sold to another person and what the terms are on which it is so proposed to be sold. If he has no knowledge of either fact, he is not in a position to make any election. As it is put in some of the cases, an othidar is entitled to have an opportunity given to him to make the election to which his right of pre-emption entitles him. If this be the corret apprehension of the othidar's right, we think it follows that the right to sue does not arise until the othidar knows of the sale of the property and the terms of the sale. Both the lower Courts have dismissed the suit finding the question of limitation against the appellant, reckoning the period of limitation from the date of sale, and, as we have stated, it is not found when the othidar came to know of the execution-sale. That is a point which must be decided for, in our opinion, time would only run from the date of the othidar's knowledge of the sale. We, therefore, resolve to set aside the decrees of both the Courts and remand the case to the District Munsif for disposal according to law, having regard to the above remarks.

We may mention that, in some of the cases, viz., Cheria Krishnan v. Vishnu Numbudri (1) Vasudevan v. Keshevan (2) and Ammotti Haji v. Kunhayen Kutti (4), language is used which might imply that the right of pre-emption consists in a right to have an offer made by the owner of the property to sell the property to the othidar for the same price for which he has contracted to sell to a third person. We might have some hesitation in saying that this is an accurate definition of the nature of the right, because such a definition, if strictly pursued to its logical conclusion, might lead to difficulties and complications. We, however, refrain from pronouncing any definite opinion on that point as the learned Advocate-General says that, if it be found that his client had knowledge of the sale more than six years before the institution of the suit, he would not be prepared to contend on the facts of this case that the suit would still be within time because no offer was made to him by the owner of the property before the auction sale.

The costs of this appeal will abide the result.

JUDGMENT.—The suit in this case was one in ejectment. The plaintiff obtained a decree in the District Munsif's Court. On appeal, that judgment was reversed. When the appeal came on for hearing on the 30th March 1911, the plaintiff offered to be bound by an oath to be taken by the defendant at a temple in a certain form. The defendant agreed to make the oath. The lower Appellate Court has found that the plaintiff attached further conditions as to the way in which the oath should be made when both the parties were at the temple for the purpose of the oath. The defendant refused to make the oath observing the further conditions imposed by the plaintiff. The oath was in consequence not made. The judgment of the Appellate Court dismissing the plaintiff's suit is not based on the ground that plaintiff resiled from his agreement to be bound by the defendant's oath or that he prevented him from making the oath, but is based on the merits of the suit. The plaintiff has appealed against that judgment.

The appellant and the Pleader who appeared for him before the Judge, have both put in affidavits stating that the appeal was never heard on the merits. This statement has not been denied on the defendant's side. We accept the statements contained in those affidavits and must, consequently, hold that the Judge was wrong in dismissing the suit on the ground on which he did without hearing arguments.

It is argued by Mr. Seshachari for the respondent that the plaintiff having varied the agreement with regard to the oath and thereby made it impossible for the defendant to take it, he must be taken to be bound by his offer in the same manner as if the defendant had made the oath in accordance with the original agreement. He is not able to cite any provision in the Oaths Act which would support such a contention. The Act provides (section 11) that "If an oath is taken . . . . the evidence so given shall, as against the person who offered to be bound as aforesaid, be conclusive proof of the matter stated" We find it difficult to see how an oath which is not given can furnish any evidence Section 12 provides that: "Where one of the parties offers to give evidence on oath but afterwards refuses to do so, he shall not be compelled to make it." But the Court is to make a record of the fact of his refusal. But there is no provision for a case where a party who offers to be bound by the oath made by another person afterwards refuses to be so bound. There is no reason why the contract which he entered into should not be held to be binding on him. In such a case, if the oath be taken by the other party in accordance with the agreement originally entered into, it must furnish conclusive proof of the facts to which the evidence given on oath relates. The respondent's Vakil goes further and argues that a party who agrees to be bound by an oath of the opposite party but afterwards resiles from the agreement should be bound by his agreement as if his opponent had performed his part, although his opponent has not, as a matter of fact, performed his part of the contract by taking the oath. We cannot agree with this contention. Mr. Seshachari relies on a case reported in Umayammai v. Muthiah Nadar (1). The facts of that case do not appear in the report. The learned Judges observed: "If the party who has agreed to be bound prevents the oath being taken, the other party is, in our opinion, entitled to a decree, at any rate, in a case like the present where it is the plaintiff who agrees to be bound and the result of his refusal to allow the oath to be taken in the form agreed upon is that there is no evidence in support of his case." Possibly, the judgment was founded on the special circumstances of the case. If that be so, there is nothing more to be said about it. It does not appear from the judgment whether the plaintiff failed to give any evidence after he had repudiated his agreement to be bound by his opponent's oath. If so, he would, of course, have only himself to blame. The learned Judges do not say that the plaintiff was prevented by the Court from adducing any other evidence he had in support of his claim. We do not think it could have been intended to lay down that the Court would have any right to pervent him from giving evidence on the mere ground that he refused to be bound by the opponent's oath. If the learned Judges intended to lay down any such rule, then we are, with all respect, unable to follow it. In Moyan v. Pathu Kutti (2), the learned Chief Justice, who was a party to the judgment in Umayammai v. Muthiah Nadar (1), explains that case. He observes (see page 3): "In that case, the plaintiff's guardian agreed to be bound by the defendant's oath to be made in a certain form which required something to be done by the plaintiff's guardian. The defendants attended for the purpose of making the oath in the form agreed to, but the plaintiff's guardian declined to perform his part of the ceremony and the oath as agreed upon was not made for this reason." In Moyan v. Pattu Kutti (2), the plaintiff who had agreed to take the oath refused to do so afterwards. It was held that that did not deprive him of the right to give other evidence in support of his claim. We are of opinion that the defendant is entitled to enforce the plaintiff's agreement that he would abide by his oath to be taken according to the agreement originally entered into. We are unable to accept the argument that the defendant rescinded the contract by his refusal to take the oath in accordance with the fresh conditions insisted on by the plaintiffs. We reverse the decree of the lower Appellate Court. As Mr. Seshachari, the Vakil for the defendant, says that his client is still willing to take the oath, he must be given an opportunity to give evidence on oath in the manner originally agreed upon between the parties. If he does so, the evidence so given will be conclusive evidence of the facts to which the evidence relates. If he refuses to do so, then the District Court must proceed to hear the appeal on the merits. The decree of the Appellate Court is set aside. The appeal is remanded to the District Court for fresh disposal according to law. The costs of this second appeal will abide the result.

LETTERS PATENT APPEAL No. 128 OF 1911.
June 21, 1912.

Present:—Sir Henry Richards, KT., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Banerji.

CHHATKU RAI AND ANOTHER—PLAINTIFFS—APPELLANTS

BALDEO SHUKUL AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Mortgage—Redemption—Mortgage for term of years—

CHHAKTU RAI v. BALDEO SHUKUL.

Failure of mortgagee to perform essential part of contract—Right of mortgagor to redeem before expiry of period.

Where property subject to prior encumbrances is mortgaged with possession for a term of years, and the mortgagee covenants to pay the prior encumbrancers out of the mortgage-money but does not do so, the mortgagor has, on equitable grounds, the right to redeem the mortgage before the expiration of the period for which the property has been mortgaged, as the essential part of the contract, so far as the mortgagors are concerned, has not been performed by the mortgagee.

Appeal under section 10 of the Letters Patent, against the following decision of Mr. Justice Piggott:—

"The point really in issue in this appeal admits of being stated without going into all the somewhat complicated, but not strictly relevant, details. The proprietor of a one anna share in certain zemindari property executed a mortgage by conditional sale, the terms of which were as follows:—

"The mortgagee paid Rs. 50-15-0 in cash to the mortgagor, and covenanted to pay Rs. 549 to certain other creditors of the latter. The mortgagor covenanted to give the mortgagee possession for ten years and to redeem at the end of that time; there was the usual stipulation that, failing redemption at the time specified, the instrument should operate as a deed of sale. The plaintiffs have acquired the equity of redemption in this one-anna share. They say the holder of the mortgage above referred to has not paid off the creditors in accordance with the stipulations in the deed; they accordingly deposit in Court Rs. 50-15-0 for payment to the mortgagee and sue for possession. The Courts below have held that the suit is premature, the period of ten years stipulated in the mortgage-deed not having expired. The plaintiffs do not contest the general principle that on a deed like the one in question, the mortgagee is entitled to claim the benefit of the stipulation ensuring him ten years' possession; they plead that it is inequitable that the mortgagee should enforce this stipulation when he has not performed his part of the bargain. The principles governing the question in issue are to be found in sections 39, 55 and 73 of the Indian Contract Act (IX of 1872); a consideration of these sections shows that the Courts below were right that the mortgagor (or the plaintiffs as representatives of the mortgagor) cannot claim relief against the contract allowing ten years' possession to the mortgagee, and that the mortgagor's remedy for the loss he is alleged to have suffered is by way of a suit for damages. The contract embodied in the instrument of mortgage cannot be set aside unless the plaintiffs can bring the case within the scope of section 39 or of section 55 of Act IX of 1872. The latter section cannot apply because no time was fixed within which the mortgagee was to pay off the creditors named in the deed. Nor can it be said that he has either "refused to perform or disabled himself from performing his promise in its entirety" within the meaning of section 39. The plaintiff's case is at most that he has neglected to perform it. So far from refusing to do so, his plea on the facts (a plea which the decision of the Courts below on the issue of law has prevented them from investigating) was that he had performed it. It cannot be said that the mortgagee has disabled himself from performing his part of the contract, or that it has become impossible of performance within the meaning of section 55 of Act IX of 1872. The case is simply one for a suit for damages. This appeal, therefore, fails and is hereby dismissed with costs."

The plaintiffs appealed under section 10 of the Letters Patent. On the appeal coming up for hearing before Richards, C. J., and Banerji, J., a finding on the issues as to whether the defendant, second party, had or had not paid the amount which he had undertaken to pay, was called for. The finding on this issue was in the negative. The appeal was then re-argued.

Mr. Peary Lal Banerji, for the Appellants.

Mr. Jogendra Nath Mukerji, for the Respondents

JUDGMENT.—The vendors of the plaintiffs in this appeal made a usufructuary mortgage in favour of the defendants of the second party. The consideration for the mortgage was Rs. 599-15-0. All save Rs. 50-15-0 were left with the mortgagees for payment of creditors of the mortgagors. It has been found, as the result of certain issues which we referred to the Court below, that the creditors were prior incumbrancers of the mortgaged property, and that the mortgagee never discharged the incumbrances. The usufructuary mortgage was by way of conditional sale and provided that the property should not be redeemed for ten years. The present suit is in form a suit to redeem the property upon payment of Rs. 50-15-0, which was the full amount of the consideration given by the mortgagees. The defendants, second party, contend that the plaintiffs cannot redeem the property or get possession of it until the expiration of the term of ten years, and this notwithstanding that the prior incumbrances, to meet which the greater part of the consideration was left with them, have never been discharged by them. Both the lower Courts dismissed the plaintiff's suit. On second appeal to this Court, the decision of the Courts below was affirmed.

The plaintiffs come here in appeal under the Letters Patent and contend that inasmuch as the defendants, second party, never kept their part of the bargain by discharging the incumbrances which they agreed to discharge, they ought not to be delayed in redeeming or getting back possession of the property until the end of ten years. It seems to us that if, under the circumstances of the present case, the defendants, second party, are allowed to remain in possession of the property over the full period of ten years, taking the profits and allowing the interest on the prior incumbrances to accumulate, the plaintiffs will be without any proper or effectual remedy. It is doubtful whether a suit for damages could possibly be brought at the present time, and at the expiration of the period of ten years, it will only be an effectual remedy if the defendants, second party, or their representatives are sufficiently good marks for damages. We think that on equitable grounds, the defendants having not performed what we deem to be a most essential part of the contract so far as they are concerned, the plaintiffs ought to be allowed to redeem the property before the expiration of the period of ten years.

We accordingly allow the appeal, set aside the decree of this Court, and also the decrees of the Courts below and decree the plaintiff's claim for redemption on payment of Rs. 50-15-0. The appellants will have their costs in all Courts. We allow one month for payment of the Rs. 50-15-0 mentioned above. The decree will be drawn up in the usual form.

CIVIL SUIT No. 101 OF 1910.

THE OFFICIAL ASSIGNEE OF MADRAS —PLAINTIFF

versus

T. C. RAMASAMY IYENGAR AND OTHERS —DEFENDANTS.

Letters Patent (Madras), cls. 11, 12—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 53—Suit to declare a mortgage of property outside Madras fraudulent—Suit for land—Suit to avoid incumbrance—Jurisdiction—High Court—Original jurisdiction—Extent considered.

A suit to avoid an incumbrance on land is a suit for land within the meaning of the Letters Patent.

Nalum Lakshmikantham v. Krishnaswamy Mudeliar, 27 M. 157 and Sundarabai Sahiba v. Tirumal Rao Sahib, 33 M. 131; 20 M. L. J. 103; 6 M. L. T. 263; 3 Ind. Cas. 930, relied upon.

Where the Official Assignee sues for a declaration that a mortgage of properties situate in the North Arcot District, executed by an insolvent in favour of another person, is fraudulent and not binding on him, the suit is not within the jurisdiction of the original side of the Madras High Court, as the landed property is situate outside its jurisdiction.

NulamLakshmikantham v. Krishnaswamy Mudaliar, 27 M. 157, followed.

The High Court, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, is merely a Local Court, and the general principle of construction applicable to an enactment conferring jurisdiction is that it must clearly appear that a particular case falls within the provisions of the enactment and that the jurisdiction should not be extended by implication.

Messrs. V. Masilamani Pillay and P. Durasawmy Iyengar, for the Plaintiff.

Messrs. V. V. Srinivasa Iyengar and C. P. Ramasawmy Iyer, for the 2nd Defendant.

JUDGMENT.—In November 1908, the 1st defendant presented his petition to the Insolvent Court, and in his schedule stated that certain immoveable properties situate in the North Arcot District had been mortgaged to the 2nd defendant by a deed of simple mortgage, dated 23rd August 1906. The Official Assignee, the plaintiff in this suit, alleges that this deed is fraudulent and that he is entitled to avoid it, and, in his plaint, prays that the deed may be declared fraudulent and invalid and not binding on him and that the 2nd defendant may be decreed to deliver up the same duly cancelled.

The suit appears to be based upon section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, which enables a creditor to avoid a transfer of immoveable property made with intent to defeat or delay the creditors of the transferor; such a transfer is not void but is voidable at the option of certain persons; that is to say, assuming that the plaintiff proves his case as regards all the world except the creditors of the 1st defendant and also as against them until they choose to exercise their option, the 2nd defendant possesses a mortgage interest in the land in question.

The plaintiff now seeks to exercise that option to avoid the 2nd defendant's mortgage and thus to clear the land which is now vested in the plaintiff of an existing incumbrance. The 6th issue raises the question of the jurisdiction of this Court to entertain this suit and by consent has been tried as a preliminary issue. Clause 11 of the Letters Patent of this Court declares that "it shall have and exercise ordinary original civil jurisdiction within such local limits as may.....be declared and prescribed" and clause 12 declares that "in the case of suits for land or other immoveable property, such land or property shall be situate within the local limits."

The question for determination is, therefore, whether a suit to avoid an incumbrance upon land is a suit for land within the meaning of the Letters Patent.

It appears from the clauses of the Letters Patent, which I have cited, that the High Court, in the exercise of its original civil jurisdiction, is merely a local Court and the general principle of construction applicable to an enactment, conferring such a jurisdiction, is that it must clearly appear that a particular case falls within the provisions of the enactment, and that the jurisdiction should not be extended by implication. [See Read v. Brown (1); Simpson v. Blues (2); Payne v. Hogg (3)]. The object of the Legislature is in fact to distribute the work of administering the law among certain tribunals which should not encroach the one upon the other. For this reason, it appears to me that the well known cases in the English Court which deal with the question to what extent a Court of Equity will, as against a person subject to its process, enforce rights relating to property situate outside the Kingdom, have little application to the present question.

The general intention of the Legislature, as declared in clause 12 of the Letters Patent and section 16 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, is that suits to establish or enforce any right to or interest in land should be brought in the Court within whose local jurisdiction, the land is situate [see Nulam Lakshmikantham v. Krishnaswamy Mudaliar(4)] and I think the burden is upon the plaintiff to show that the present suit is not a suit for land within the meaning of the Letters Patent.

A suit to get rid of an incumbrance on land appears to me a suit for land equally with a suit to enforce or obtain a charge upon land; [see Nulam Lakshmikantham v. Krishnaswamy Mudaliar (4) and Sundara Bai Sahiba v. Tirumal Rao Sahib (5)]; since, in each case, the plaintiff claims an interest in the land and asks the Court to enforce his right; in the first case, he asks for the entire interest in the land and in other cases for a partial interest only, and the former is, therefore, more clearly a suit for the land.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the 6th issue should be answered in the negative, and I dismiss the suit with costs of the 2nd defendant.

Suit dismissed.

CIVIL REFERENCE No. 5 OF 1912.

Diwan BALMUKUND SAHAI—PLAINTIFF

versus

TARINI SINGH AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS.

Limitation—Rent suit—Institution of suit after interest of landlord had ceased—Relation when right to sue accrued—Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), Sch. III, Art. 2 (b)—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 110.

The question whether a suit for the recovery of arrears of rent is a suit brought by a landlord within the meaning of Article 2 (b), Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act, ought to be determined with reference to the relation in which the parties stood when the right to sue accrued, that is, when the arrears of rent claimed fell due.

Chhatarapat Singh v. Gopichand Bothra, 26 C. 750; 4 C. W. N. 446; Srimanta Roy v. Mahadeo Mahata, 8 C. W. N. 531; 31 C. 550 and Maharaj Bahadur Singh v. Forbes, 35 C. 737; 7 C. L. J. 652, referred to.

Therefore, the provisions of that Article apply to a suit for the recovery of rent of a holding by one whose interest as landlord has ceased to exist before the institution of the suit, provided that the arrears claimed accrued due to him when he was the landlord of the defendant.

Reference by the Munsif, Jamui, dated 26th March 1912 in Rent Suits Nos. 508 and 1083 of 1911.

ORDER OF REFERENCE.

Plaintiff, in these two analogous suits, was the the thikadar of 8-anna share of Mauzah Katowna up to the year 1316, when the period of his lease expired and the Mauzah came to the sir possession of the proprietor. Within this mauzah, defendant in Suit No. 503 holds a jote at Rs. 36-14-10 dam besides cesses, and defendant in Suit No. 1083 holds a jote at Rs. 22-7-6 dam besides cesses. Plaintiff, on the allegation of having had separate collection, sues in these two suits for recovery of his half share of the rents and cesses of the two aforesaid holdings for the years 1315 and 1316. The defendants in their written statements raised certain pleas but none of them was pressed. The only question that was urged on behalf of the defendants in both these suits is, that the plaintiff not having been the landlord of the defendants at the time the suits were instituted, the suits cannot be considered as suits brought by a landlord against his tenants, and, plaintiff cannot, therefore, claim the benefit of the longer period of limitation provided by Article 2 (b), Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act, but the ordinary period of limitation provided by Article 110, Schedule I of the general law of limitation ought to govern these suits. Accordingly, it is contended that the claim for the rents of the first three quarters of 1315, which fell due more than three years before the institution of the suits, is time-barred.

There does not appear to be any authoritative decision directly bearing on this point and the question does not seem to me to be altogether free from doubt. The amount claimed in both these suits is below Rs. 50; under section 153 (b), Bengal Tenancy Act, there will, therefore, be no appeal against any decree that may be passed by me in either of these two suits. According to rule 1, Order XLVI of the Civil Procedure Code, I, therefore, consider it proper at the request of the plaintiff to refer the following question for the decision of the Hon'ble High Court:

Whether in a suit for recovery of rent of a raiyati holding by one whose interest as landlord of the mauzah has ceased to exist long before the institution of the suit, the period of limitation provided in Article 2 (b), Schedule III, Bengal Tenancy Act is applicable or the period of limitation provided by Article 110 of the general law of limitation should apply?

My own opinion is, that the special limitation provided by the Bengal Tenancy Act cannot apply to a suit by an ex-landlord, but his suit should be governed by the ordinary limitation of three years as provided in Article 110 of the Limitation Act.

Article 2 (b), Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act, refers to a suit for the recovery of an arrear of rent in a suit brought by (i) a sole landlord, (ii) entire body of landlords or (iii) one or more co-sharer landlords. Evidently, the suit must be between parties, who, at the time of the institution of the suit, stand in the relation of landlord and tenant, and does not include a suit by one who is not the landlord at the time of the institution of the suit but might have been so at some previous time. The principle of the decision in Mohendra Nath Kalamoree v. Koilash Chandra Dogra (1), which was a suit for recovery of rent by an assignee, seems to me to be applicable with all force to a suit for recovery of rent by an ex-landlord. I was referred to the case of Srimanta Roy v. Mahadeo Mahata (2), in which it was held that a suit by a ticadar, after the expiration of his lease, against a tenant for the recovery of arrears of rent, which had fallen due during the pendency of his lease, can be brought under the provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act. I understand this decision to mean that such a suit is a suit for rent, in the same way as in the Full Bench case of Srish Chunder Bose v. Nasim Kazi (3), it was held that a suit brought by an assignee of a landlord against a tenant is a suit for rent. This Full Bench ruling was considered in the case of Mohendra Nath Kalamoree v. Koilash Chandra Dogra (1) and, in spite of it, it was held that Article 2 (b), Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act, does not apply to a suit by an assignee. The ruling in Sumanta Roy v. Mahadeo Mahata (2) does not, in the same way, decide that the limitation provided in the Bengal Tenancy Act applies to a suit by an ex-landlord. In the case of Hem Chunder Bhunjo v. Mon Mohini Dassi (4), it was held that the word "landlord" in section 66 of the Bengal Tenancy Act cannot mean an ex-landlord. The same meaning ought to be attached to the same word throughout the Act and the Schedule attached to an Act is a part of the Act. The word "landlord" used in Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act cannot, therefore, mean an ex-landlord. For these reasons, I am inclined to hold that an ex-landlord is not entitled to the period of limitation provided by Article 2 (b), Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act, but his suit should be governed by Article 110 of the general Limitation Act. As the point, however, is not absolutely free from difficulty, I refer the question for decision of the Hon'ble High Court.

(1) 4 C. W. N. 605.
(2) 8 C. W. N. 531; 31 C. 550.

If the Hon'ble High Court decide the question in favour of the plaintiff, both these suits will be decreed in full with costs, but if it be decided against the plaintiff, he will get in each suit a partial decree for rent and cesses of one quarter of 1315 and whole of 1316 together with damages at 25 per cent., and proportionate cost. Interest at 6 per cent. per annum will run from the date of decree."

Babu Kulwant Sahay, for the Plaintiff.

JUDGMENT.—This is a Reference under rule 1 of Order XLVI of the Civil Procedure Code of 1908. The question upon which our opinion has been sought is formulated in these terms: "Whether in a suit for recovery of rent of a raiyati holding by one whose interest as landlord has ceased to exist before the institution of the suit, the period of limitation provided in Article 2 (b), Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act, is applicable or the period of limitation provided by Article 110 of the Indian Limitation Act of 1908 should apply."

The plaintiff was an intermediate tenure-holder for a term, and the period of his lease expired on the 29th September 1909. On the 11th September 1911, he commenced this suit for recovery of arrears of rent which had accrued due to him before the expiry of his lease. The tenant contended that as the plaintiff ceased to be his landlord before the date when the suit was instituted, the provision of Article 2 of Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act could not apply. That Article is in these terms: "A suit for recovery of arrears of rent brought by a sole landlord or the entire body of landlords or one or more co-sharer landlords, in all cases where the arrear fell due before a deposit was made under section 61, must be instituted within three years from the last day of the agricultural year in which the arrear fell due." The contention of the tenant is, that to determine whether this is a suit for the recovery of arrears of rent brought by a sole landlord, the Court ought to have regard to the relationship of the parties at the point of time when the suit is commenced. In our opinion, this is not a reasonable construction of Article 2. Whether a suit for the recovery of arrears of rent has been brought by a landlord within the meaning of that Article, ought to be determined with reference to the relation in which the parties stood when the right to sue accrued, that is, when the arrears of rent claimed fell due. If this view is adopted, there is no question that Article 2 is applicabla. The view we take is supported by the principle which underlies the decisions of this Court in the cases of Chhataraput Singh v. Gopichand Bothra (5), Srimanta Roy v. Mahadeo Mahata (2) and Maharaj Bahadur Singh v. Forbes (6). In the first of these cases, the principle was laid down that a decree for rent, obtained by the landlord after he has parted with his interest, is a rent decree and is enforceable as such. The same principle

(3) 4 C. W. N. 357; 27 C. 827.
(4) 3 C. W. N. 604.
(5) 26 C. 750; 4 C. W. N. 446.
(6) 35 C. 737; 7 C. L. J. 652.

was recognised in Maharaj Bahadur Singh v. Forbes (6), and it was further laid down in Srimanta Roy v. Mahadeo Mahata (2) that a suit framed for the recovery of such arrears is a suit under the Bengal Tenancy Act. It is worthy of note that an attempt made to support the contrary view was not successful in the case of Khetra Pal Singh v. Kritartha Moyi Dasi (7), which overruled the decision in Hem Chander Bhunjo v. Mon Mohini Dassi (4). In the case last mentioned, it had been ruled that a decree for arrears of rent obtained by a landlord at a time when he was the landlord of the defendant, lost its character as a rent-decree, if, before execution was taken out, the plaintiff had ceased to be the landlord. This view, however, can no longer be maintained in view of the decision of the Full Bench in Khetra Pal Singh v. Kritartha Moyi Dasi (7). The Full Bench affirmed the doctrine that the character of the decree as a rent-decree is not affected by subsequent events. Mr. Justice O'Kinealy appears to have held, in the case of Hem Chander Bhunjo v. Mon Mohini Dassi (4), that as a decree for ejectment obtained by the landlord cannot be executed against the tenant under section 66 of the Bengal Tenancy Act after he had ceased to be the landlord, a decree for rent cannot be enforced by a sale of the holding after the decree-holder has ceased to be the landlord. It is fairly clear, however, that there is no analogy between the two classes of cases. The landlord who has obtained a decree for ejectment is entitled to execute the decree and obtain possession of the holding, only so long as he is the landlord ; after the tenant has been ejected, he is entitled to take possession of the land, only because it is included within his property ; when he ceases to be the landlord, he is obviously not entitled to execute the decree for ejectment. The same considerations, however, do not apply to an application for execution of a decree for rent by the sale of the defaulting holding. Reference may in this connection be made to the case of Sheikh Munsar v. Loknath Roy (8), where it was ruled, upon the authority of the decision in Shama Soonderee Dossi v. Brindabun Chunder (9), that a suit by an assignee of rent is in essence a suit for rent; the same view was subsequently affirmed by a Full Bench of this Court in the case of Sris Chunder Bose v. Nasim Kazi (3). In Mohendra Nath Kalamoree v. Koilash Chandra Dogra (1), it appears, however, to have been held that although a suit by an assignee of rent is a suit for rent for the purposes of the determination of the jurisdiction of the Court in which the claim can be enforced, it cannot be treated as a suit for rent for the purposes of the determination of the question of limitation. The case mentioned is not on all fours with that now before us, and when the question arises again, it may require re-consideration. At any rate, we are not prepared to extend the doctrine, which underlies the decision in Mohendra Nath Kalamoree v. Koliash Chandra Dogra (1), to cases where, as here, the plaintiff, upon the expiry of the term of his own lease, seeks to recover arrears which had accrued due to him when he was the landlord of the defendant. It is further worthy of note that the decision in the case of Mohendra Nath Kalamoree v. Koilash Chandra Dogra (1) was not followed in the case of Shashi Kumar Mirbahar v. Seeta Nath Banerjee (10). We are, therefore, of opinion, upon a construction of Article 2 of Schedule III of the Bengal Tenancy Act, that the provisions of that Article apply to a suit for recovery of rent of a holding by one whose interest as landlord had ceased to exist before the institution of the suit, provided that the arrears claimed accrued due to him when he was the landlord of the defendant. There will be no order for costs, as the defendant has not entered appearance in this Court.

The same order will govern the second suit mentioned in the order of reference.

The records will be sent down as soon as possible with this expression of our opinion.

MADHAVAIYA CHETTY v. DAMODARAM CHETTY.

MADRAS HIGH COURT.

CIVIL SUIT No. 208 OF 1910.

July 26, 1912.

Present:—Mr. Justice Backewell.

B. MADHAVAIYA CHETTY—PLAINTIFF

B. DAMODARAM CHETTY AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS.

Hindu Law—Joint family—Nucleus of family property—Acquisition by joint labour—Joint family property.

If the members of a Hindu family choose to live together, work jointly together, throw all their earnings into a common stock and have one food, in such a case the presumption is that they must have intended their property to be joint family property and the ordinary consequences attach to it and the right of all the members to partition necessarily follows. It is not necessary in such a case that there should be a nucleus of joint family property.

Sudarsanam Maistri v. Narasimhulu Maistri, 25 M. 149 at p. 155; 11 M. L. J. 335; Gopalsami Chetti v. Arunachellam Chetti, 27 M. 32 at p. 35; Muniswami Chetty v. Maruthammal, 34 M. 211; (1910) M. W. N. 233; 8 M. L. T. 124; 20 M. L. J. 687; 7 Ind. Cas. 176, Karsandas Dharamsey v. Gangabai, 32 B. 479, 10 Bom. L. R. 184, followed.

Where the plaintiff's father carried on business jointly with his uncles and cousins without the aid of any patrimony and they lived and acquired properties together and at a partition between them, the plaintiff's father got considerable properties for his share:

Held, the properties were joint family properties in which the plaintiff, as the son of his father, acquired an interest and the plaintiff's father had no right to dispose of the same by Will.

FACTS.—B. Lakshmiah and B. Munuswami were brothers who carried on business in piece goods as hawkers. B. Lakshmiah died leaving Madurai and Ramaswami his sons. B. Munuswami and B. Madurai entered into a partnership with C. Munuswami in a piece-goods business and sometimes later Ramaswami, who then arrived at an age that he could take part in the business, joined the firm. The business was carried on for about 12 years under the name of C. Munuswami Chetti & Co. and was a flourishing concern. In 1897, Ramaswami having died in the meantime, B. Munuswami and B. Madurai severed their connection with C. Munuswami Chetti and Co., receiving at the time of their leaving the firm a large sum for their share of profits. B. Munusawmi and B. Madurai and B. Narayanaswami, son of B. Munuswami started a business in piece-goods under the name of B. Munuswami Chetty and Co. and the capital for this business was the sum of money above referred to. The other members of this family were either too young to take part in the business or were still attending school. The new firm carried on business from 1897 to 1903 and earned large profits. During the whole of the period above referred to, B. Munuswami and other members of the family lived together and separate accounts were not maintained of their expenditure. Nor did they divide profits. In 1903, disputes having arisen among the members of the family, the properties of the total value of Rs. 1,60,259-15-8 were divided in three shares between B. Munuswami, B. Madurai, and B. Narayanaswami. B. Madurai, subsequent to this division, carried on a piece-goods business in partnership with certain others and at the date of his death was possessed of immoveable property worth about a lac of rupees. He made a Will disposing of this property.

The suit was by one of his sons for the setting aside of the Will on the ground that his father had no power to dispose of the properties as they were joint family properties.

Messrs. Venkaitasubba Rao and Radhakrishnayya, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. C. P. Ramaswami Aiyar, for the 1st Defendant.

Mr. V. Masilamani Pillai and A. Suryanarayana, for the 2nd and 3rd Defendants.

Mr. Venkatasubba Rao, for the Plaintiff:—The property, which the plaintiff's father obtained at the partition, is joint family property. The evidence shows that there was enough nucleus on which the members built their subsequent fortune. For the purposes of this case, the existence of a nucleus is immaterial. The members here have lived together and acquired properties in common. To constitute joint family property, a nucleus is not necessary. The nature of joint family property is well discussed by Beaman, J., in Karsandas Dharamsey v. Gangabai (1). He draws the distinction between ancestral property and joint family property and shows that the property available for division among members of a joint family need not necessarily be ancestral. If members of a joint family acquire property together jointly or by joint labour, in the absence of an indication to the contrary, the presumption is that it is joint family property. Sudarsanam Maistri v.

(1) 32 B. 479; 10 Bom. L. R. 184.

Narasimhulu Maistri (2), Gopalsami Chetti v. Arunachellam Chetti (3), Haridas Lalji v. Narotam Raghanji (4). The onus is heavily on those who say that it is not joint family property. They must plead and prove any special contract which impressed on the property the character of partnership property as distinguished from joint family property. Rampershad Tewarry v. Sheo Churn Doss Tewarry (5), Muniswami Chetty v. Maruthammal (6), per Wallis J.

The moment it becomes joint family property, sons acquire a right by birth and the right to interdict any disposition of the same. And there can be no joint family property in which the sons do not get an interest and in respect of which the principle of survivorship does not operate: Karuppayi Nachiyar v. Sankarayanan Chetty (7). If proof of intention to treat the property as joint is necessary in this case, Exhibit B, the partition deed, is conclusive and every phrase used therein indicates unmistakeably what the intention of the parties was. In Chellayamal v. Muttialamal (8), their Lordships inferred a similar intention from a consideration of the documents similar to Exhibit B. The fact that Narayanasami took an equal share does not show that Exhibit B. is not a deed of partition. Evidence shows that to avoid litigation and purchase peace, the other parties agreed to this arrangement The property in the hands of Madurai Chetty, the plaintiff's father, having become impressed with the character of joint family property and the necessary incidents attaching thereto, he had no right to make a Will of that property. Lildas Narandas v. Motibai (9). Mayne, who, in para. 477 of the old edition of his book, seemed to hold a contrary view, relying on Chatturbhooj Meghji v. Dharamsi Naranji (10), in the latest edition indicates that Bashyam Iyangar, J., has taken a different view in Sudarsanam Maistri v. Narasimhulu Maistri (2). Besides on the facts of this case, Chatturbhooj Meghji v. Dharamsi Naranji (10) is not against me.

Mr. V. Masilamany Pillay, for Defendents Nos. 2 and 3.—I rely on Mayne's Hindu Law, 7th Edition, para. 477, and Chatturbhooj Meghji v. Dharamsi Meghji (10). Even Bashyam Iyengar, J., says the question is only one of intention. The evidence shows that the parties intended to treat the property as partnership property. Exhibit B supports me. Narayanasami, under Exhibit B, takes a share equal to that of his father Munuswami and his cousin Madurai, whereas at a family partition property should have been divided equally between Munuswami as representing one branch and Madurai as representing the other. The conduct of Madurai also shows that he regarded the property to be self-acquired property. The fact that he made a Will is indicative of it.

JUDGMENT.—The question in this case is whether the property disposed of by the Will of one B. Madurai Chetty, is property over which he had a power of testamentary disposition or whether it was joint family property. The testator had been engaged in a business in piece-goods in which his immediate family ancestors had been engaged for some years. His father, Lakshmiah Chetty, and his uncle, B. Munuswami Chetty, carried on business together as hawkers of piece-goods for some time and after Lakshmiah's death in 1876 or in 1877, B. Munuswami Chetty and the testator carried on the same hawker business. In 1885, the testator, B. Munuswami Chetty, and the 1st witness for the plaintiff, C. Munuswami Chetty, opened a piece-goods business with one Ramaswami Chetty, the testator's brother, a child about 9 or 10 years old. The 1st witness for the plaintiff stated that the testator and his relations brought in a capital of about Rs. 2,000 for the business but no accounts have been produced. That business was carried on for 12 years and in 1897, the 1st witness for the plaintiff separated from the business and the testator, B. Munuswami Chetty and one Narayanaswami Chetty, the 1st witness for the defence, who was the son of B. Munuswami Chetty, carried on the peice-goods business up to the year 1903. In that year, these three persons executed a Muchilika appointing arbitrators for the partition of their properties which was carried out by means of a partition-deed, Exhibit D, dated 4th July 1903.

With regard to the allegation of the 1st witness for the plaintiff that a capital of Rs. 2,000 was brought into the business in 1885, no accounts have been produced and his evidence is highly partisan and I am not inclined to put much faith in that statement. Obviously, the previous business that had been carried on by Lakshmiah and his brother was a small hawker business and it is quite possible that it was carried on with borrowed capital. With regard to any capital that might have been required for the business which was started in 1885, no accounts have been produced and the statement of the first witness for the plaintiffs that the testator and B. Munuswami Chetty carried large capital of Rs. 60,000 into the new business must also be regarded with considerable doubt. I think it, therefore, safer to assume that when business was commenced in 1897, it was with little or no capital. There is no reliable evidence to prove what the new capital of the business consisted of. The accounts of the business from 1897 to 1903 have not been put in but Narayanaswami, the first witness for the defence, has given a general description of the accounts that were kept. He said: "There are not several accounts of drawings in the firm books. There is one account of household expenses. There is no capital account. There is nothing to show division of profits. We did not divide profits. What was taken was for household expenses and that was not divided. No individual accounts were kept for what was expended." He then says that immoveable properties were largely purchased out of the profits of the business in the names of Munuswami and Madurai, the testator. It is admitted that all but two out of 13 properties are in the names of Munuswami, representing one branch of the family, and Madurai the other.

Then, with regard to the family life of the parties, the same witness says: "I have lived there (i.e., the house which stands in the name of Muthialammal, his grandmother) ever since I can remember. It is one of the family properties included in the division (in Exhibit B). We all lived there before any business was started as owners. There was a passage between two houses. After I came of age, the next house was bought. There was one cooking, one food."

Then, it appears that in 1903, some discussions arose in the family. After some shuffling, which was apparent throughout the whole course of the witness's evidence, Narayanaswami said that the important cause of dissension was that he took Rs. 1,75,000 and debited it in the accounts and refused to part with it." I determined to divide and did this for the purpose. I got my dues."

Under these circumstances, the parties entered into Exhibit B, dividing the property of which they were possessed. The whole frame of this document has exactly the features of a division of family property. Every phrase used in it deals with the family. It contains provisions which would be natural in a division of family properties but which would be unnatural in a division of partnership properties—such as provisions for charity and for maintenance of family members. The only thing which was pointed out by the learned Vakil for the defendant, is that the shares would not be natural in a division of family properties and that all the members of the family were not included. I think this is sufficiently explained by circumstances under which the division was arrived at. Narayanaswami Chetti had seized a considerable sum and was claiming an equal share with the other two, his father, B. Munuswami and his cousin, the testator, and the only alternative to giving him an equal share was to go to law and waste a considerable portion of the family property. It seems to me that the whole arrangement was one dictated by this man and that, under those circumstances, the division is perfectly natural. The revolting member of the family is kept out by giving him the one-third share which he asks, and the other two branches of the family each take half of the remaining assets. Thus, each branch of the family obtains a third.

The legal point has been raised whether, if it is not proved that there is any nucleus of family property, the property in the hands of the family may be considered to be joint family property with the ordinary rights of the members of the family to a share on partition. I think that in this Court the point is clearly dealt with by the dicta of Mr. Justice Bhashyam Iyengar in Sudarsanam Maistri v. Narasimhulu Maistri (2), Gopalsami Chetti

v. Arunachellam Chetti (3), which have been approved by Mr. Justice Wallis in Muniswami Chetty v. Maruthammal (6). And there is also an express decision on the point by Mr. Justice Beaman in Karsandas Dhiramsey v. Gangabai (1). I think that from these cases it is perfectly clear that if the members of a Hindu family choose to live together, work jointly together, throw all their earnings into a common stock and have one food, in such a case the presumption is that they must have intended their property to be joint family property. I think the evidence in this case shows conclusively that the property was intended to be held as joint family property. That being so, the ordinary consequences attach to it and the right of all the members to partition necessarily follows.

I give an oral judgment holding that the property is joint family property with the incidents of partition and did not pass under the Will of B. Madurai Chetty. The 2nd defendant is a minor and cannot give a discharge for the property and the person entitled to possession, as the eldest male member of the family, is the plaintiff. There will be a decree that the 1st defendant do deliver possession of the plaint property to the plaintiff. Taxed costs of all parties will be paid out of the estate by the 1st defendant, who will be allowed to retain his costs, charges and expenses incurred as executor of the Will.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 384 OF 1909.

November 14, 1912.

SANT SINGH—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT

versus

MULA AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Custom—Adoption of collateral—Jats of the Gujranwala District—Repudiation of adoption—Age.

Among Jats of the Gujranwala District, a sonless proprietor may validly adopt any one of the descendants of a common ancestor, residing in the village, whom he prefers.

Duni Chand v. Ram Chand, 28 P. R. 1887, distinguished.

When an adoption has once been completed, it cannot be set aside or repudiated by the adoptiv father.

Among Jats and kindred tribes in the Punjab, a man may appoint an heir from the descendants of a common ancestor; he need not necessarily appoint the nearest collateral.

The age at which an adoption takes place is immaterial.

Second appeal from the order of the Additional Divisional Judge, Sialkot Division at Sialkot, dated the 12th February 1909, reversing that of the Munsif, 1st class, Gujranwala, dated the 15th August 1907, dismissing plaintiffs' claim.

Rai Bahadur Lala Sukh Dial, for the Appellant.

Khawaja Zia-ul-din, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case are simple enough. One Arura, a Jat of the Gujranwala District, adopted one Sant Singh, and on the 10th February 1904, executed a deed reciting and confirming that adoption. A suit was instituted by some of the present plaintiffs on the 16th March 1904 to set aside the adoption, but it was dismissed under section 98 of the Civil Procedure Code, on the 22nd December 1904. Arura has since died and the plaintiffs have now brought a suit for possession of the land, alleging that the adoption of Sant Singh by Arura, the factum of which they fully admit, was not valid and, consequently, that they are entitled to succeed to the property left by Arura.

It appears that on Arura's death, the land was mutated in the name of Sant Singh, the adopted son, and that entry was maintained although appealed up to the Court of the Financial Commissioner.

The sole point, therefore, before us on the pleadings is, whether the adoption of Sant Singh by Arura was valid or not. In 1904, Arura was a defendant in a case and made a statement to the effect that he, undoubtedly, adopted Sant Singh, but that he made a mistake in doing so, and desired to repudiate the adoption owing to Sant Singh's alleged misconduct. The misconduct alleged is of a very flimsy character and it is not now contested that it was within the power of Arura to set aside the adoption which had once been completed. We need not, therefore, discuss that point further.

As regards the validity of the adoption, we notice that the lower Appellate Court has stated that Sant Singh is not a collateral of Arura though he belongs to the same got. It is now admitted on both sides that Sant Singh was a collateral of Arura though in the 9th or 10th degree. He is a member of the same village and admittedly descended from a common ancestor.

The onus of proving that Sant Singh was validly adopted by Arura was thrown by the first Court upon Sant Singh and that Court considered that the onus had been discharged. The lower Appellate Court appears to have relied upon the fact that Sant Singh was not a collateral and upon the repudiation of the adoption by the adoptive father. As noted above, neither of these reasons can be maintained and we have to fall back upon the question whether the adoption was or was not a valid one. The general, though not the universal, principle of the Jats and kindred tribes in the Punjab is, undoubtedly, that a man may appoint an heir from amongst the descendants of a common ancestor, and that he need not necessarily appoint the nearest collateral. This point is fully discussed in Nidhana v. Shaman (1). It is also a general principle that the age at which the adoption takes place is immaterial. Budh Singh v. Mula Singh (2) is an authority on this point, as is also Chandu v. Akbar (3), inter alia. No point has been made in argument before us as to the age of Sant Singh when appointed. What is relied upon by the respondents-plaintiffs is the entry in the riwaj-i-am and the fact that no instances were quoted in support of the defendant's case, and the facts that Sant Singh is only distantly related to the deceased, and that there are nearer collaterals of the deceased in the village.

As regards the entry in the riwaj-i-am, it is almost identical with that quoted in Nidhana v. Shaman (1) and we do not think that the clause which points to the advisability of adopting from amongst near collaterals, is anything more than advisory; we think that it is not mandatory. It is true that in Nidhana v. Shaman (1), a number of precedents were given which are absent in the present case, but as regards the terms of the riwaj-i-am, they are almost identical, and we must hold that it has not been shown that Arura was debarred from appointing any one of the descendants of a common ancestor, residing in the village, whom he preferred. Much stress was laid by the learned Pleader for the respondents on a case reported as Duni Chand v. Ram Chand (4). In that case, a Jat of the Gujranwala District had adopted a member of the same got living in another village. It was not shown that he was a collateral of the adoptive father or that he was descended from a common ancestor, however remote. In that case, it was held after inquiry that the adoption was not proved to be valid by the custom of the tribe to which the parties belonged. The case here, however, is quite different. The adopted son was a member of the same village community, a collateral, though distant, and admittedly descended from a common ancestor. That being so, we think that the custom of appointing heirs being established to exist amongst the tribe to which the parties of this suit belong, the burden of proving that this particular adoption was invalid lay upon the plaintiffs and they have failed to discharge it.

The appeal, therefore, must succeed and the suit be dismissed with costs. Costs against plaintiffs throughout.

Appeal allowed.

uent sale of property for Government revenue—Suit by mortgagee to recover surplus sale-proceeds withdrawn by registered owner—Limitation.

In execution of a mortgage decree, the plaintiff purchased one of the mouzahs within estate K. The entire estate K, was sold for arrears of Government revenue a few months after the plaintiff's aforesaid purchase. After payment of the arrears, a surplus was left with the Collector, who paid it to the defendant, the registered owner, on March 31, 1904. The plaintiff brought this suit on May 23, 1907, for recovery of the money as representing the mortgaged property purchased by him:

Held, (1) that the money received by the defendant, which belonged to the plaintiff, was money received by the defendant "for plaintiff's use" within the meaning of Article 62 of Schedule II of the Limitation Act of 1877, and that the suit was, therefore, barred, being brought after three years from the date on which the defendant received the money;

Mahomed Wahib v. Mahomed Ameer, 32 C. 527; 1 C. L. J. 167, relied upon:

(2) that the suit was not governed by Article 132, for the plaintiff having already purchased the property, could not be said to be seeking to pursue against the surplus sale-proceeds the remedy for the recovery of the money charged upon the immoveable property.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiffs and the defendant No. 2 were mortgagees of a certain revenue paying estate. In execution of the mortgage-decree obtained by the plaintiffs, they purchased one of the mauzahs situated in the estate named Khazaserai on the 19th May 1900. On the 7th January 1901, the entire estate, consisting of Khazaserai and another lekhiraj property Patirha, was sold for arrears of Government revenue. After payment of the arrears, a surplus of about Rs. 2,454 was left with the Collector and the defendant No. 1 who was the registered owner withdrew the surplus on the 31st March 1904. On the 2nd July 1905, the plaintiffs applied to the Collector for the payment of the surplus to them as representing the mortgaged property which they had already purchased in execution of the mortgage-decree. This application was rejected on the 4th August 1909 on the ground that the money had been paid out to the registered proprietor. The plaintiffs brought his suit on the 23rd May 1907 for the recovery of the money from defendant No. 1. The principal plea was that the suit was barred by limitation. Both the lower Courts have held that the suit is barred under Article 62 of Schedule I of the Limitation Act. It is contended before us that the suit is not one governed by Article 62 but that the Article properly applicable to the present case would be either 142 or 132 or 120. Article 62 contemplates a suit for money payable by the defendants to the plaintiffs for the money received by the defendants for the plaintiffs' use and provides three years as the period of limitation from the time when the money is received. The question to be first determined on this point is whether the money was received by the defendants for the plaintiffs' use. Although, in common parlance, it may be said that the defendants took out the money for his own use and not for the plaintiff's, yet the words "for the plaintiff's use" have received judicial interpretation almost in all the High Courts, in which it has been held that money received by the defendants, which belonged to the plaintiffs, would be money received by the defendants for the plaintiffs' use. The latest case on this point is Mahomed Wahib v. Mahomed Ameer (1), in which all the previous cases on the point have been considered. We think that this case would, according to the principles laid down in the case, be governed by Article 62 of Schedule II of the Limitation Act. It is contended that there is another class of cases, in which it has been held that when a suit is filed for recovery of money charged on immoveable property, when the immoveable property is represented by surplus sale-proceeds, the suit is governed by Article 132 of the Schedule. The facts of the present case are, however, distinguishable from those cases in that in the present case the plaintiffs had already made a purchase in execution of their mortgage-decree so that they cannot be said to be seeking to pursue against the surplus sale-proceeds, the remedy for the recovery of the money charged upon the immoveable property.

In this view of the case, the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Sri Rajah VARADARAJA APPAROW BAHADUR ZEMINDAR GARU—RESPONDENT.

Landlord and tenant—'Savaram'—Melvaram—Kudivaram—Madras Estates Land Act (1 of 1908), s. 185—Leases granted after 1*st July* 1898, admissibility of—Evidence—Judge's personal knowledge of facts, whether can be imported into judgment.

Per Sundara Aiyar, J.—The word 'Savaram' does not necessarily import the absence of kudivaram right in the cultivating ryot—Savaram was compensation granted to a zemindar or Revenue Officer under the Muhammadan Government. In some cases land exempt from payment of rent was granted to him. But if no land was available, the grant to the zmindar would consist merely of the revenue on a portion of the lands for the assessment of which the zemindar was responsible to the State.

Per Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—In consequence of certain land being known as savaram, the Courts need not necessarily presume that both melvaram and kudivaram belong to the zemindar, but the Courts may presume such land to be of the above character.

Per Sundara Aiyar, J.—Under section 185 of the Madras Estates Land Act, 1908, it is the date of the contract that is material in deciding whether the evidence is admissible. The Act does not lay down any rule as to all the kinds of evidence that may be produced to prove that the land in question is the zemindar's private land, and evidence of dealings subsequent to 1st July 1898 is not altogether excluded.

Akhju Singh v. Jagannath Prosad Singh, 13 Ind. Cas. 1, referred to Per Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—The leases granted after 1st July 1898 are shut out as evidence by section 185 of the Madras Estates Land Act if they are sought to be used for the purpose of proving the character of the tenure of the land and even if such leases are sought to be proved merely in order to show that the land was treated in the same manner after July 1898 as before July 1898. Leases granted before 1st July 1898, though they were only to come into force after 1st July 1898, are admissible in evidence.

Per Sundara Aiyar, J.—A Judge is not entitled to rely on specific facts not proved by the evidence in the case but known to him personally or otherwise. But a Judge may use his general knowledge and experience in determining the credibility of evidence adduced before him and applying it to the decision of the specific facts in issue in the case.

Hurpurshad v. Sheo Dayal, 3 I. A. 259 at p. 285; 26 W. R. 55 and Durga Prosad Singh v. Ram Doyal Chaudhuri, 38 C. 153; 10 Ind. Cas. 955, explained and distinguished.

Per Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—A Judge must be allowed to use even his personal knowledge of concrete private facts, provided he mentions his knowledge to the parties and they do not object to his deciding the case, and he must be allowed to use his knowledge of general orpublic facts, historical, scientifi c, political and otherwise, in coming to a conclusion.

Second appeals against the decrees of the District Judge of Kistna, dated the 24th day of October 1910, in A S. Nos. 149 to 154, 156 and 158 to 161, and 162 of 1910, presented against those of the District Munsif of Gudivada in Original Suit Nos. 268, 269, 272, 275, 367, 370 and 371 of 1908, 373 of 1908, 209 of 1909, 377 of 1908 and 210 of 1909, respectively.

JUDGMENT.

SUNDARA AIYAR, J.—These are appeals by ryots in the village of Manikonda in the proprietary estate of Gannavaram against whom decrees of ejectment were passed by the District Court of Kistna, reversing the decrees of the District Munsif of Gudivada, who held that ryots possessed occupancy-rights in their lands and could not be ejected. The lands in question were asserted by the proprietor to be his private lands in which both the melvaram and kudivaram rights were vested in him. He alleged that both by custom and contract he was the full proprietor and that the tenants had no occupancy-rights. The defendants, on the other hand, asserted that they were part of the public lands of the estate held by the ryots with occupancy-rights. They were, undoubtedly, known as savaram lands and were described as such in the pattas, muchilikas and leases executed between the parties. The plaintiff contended that the word 'savaram' itself indicated his full proprietary right in the land. The District Munsif denied this but the District Judge accepted the interpretation claimed for the plaintiff. We are of opinion that on this point, the District Munsif was right in holding that the word did not necessarily import the absence of kudivaram right in the cultivating ryot. Wilson's and Wilkins' Glossaries cited by the District Judge are both opposed to the interpretation accepted by him. Both these learned writers define savaram as an allotment of land or of the Government revenue derivable from it held by zemindars or other Revenue Officers under the Muhammadan Government as their personal compensation for services rendered by them. Mr. Grant, the author of the Survey of the Northern Circars, no doubt, describes it as a grant of land. See pages 7 and 155 of Vol. II of the Fifth Report of the Parliamentary Committee. The word is supposed to have the same meaning as 'Nunkar' in Bengal. The latter word is defined by Baden Powell as 'money allowance' (or free land). In Maclean's Manual of Administration 1893, 'Savaram' is treated as a grant of land. All that is clear, however, is that savaram was compensation granted to a zemindar or Revenue Officer under the Muhammadan Government. Sometimes, the zemindar was a descendant of a ryot family that enjoyed demesne or private lands and remained in possession of them after the family ceased to exercise sovereign powers, but continued to have zemindari rights under the Muhammadan rulers. The holder was allowed to retain these private lands as compensation for services rendered by him to the State and partly also in consideration of his being responsible for the collection and payment of the State revenue. The private land in his own occupation was itself exempt from the payment of any revenue. But the zemindar was sometimes a mere renter under Government holding his office at its pleasure. In such cases, some land was sometimes granted to him and exempted from the payment of any revenue. But if no land was available, the grant to the zemindar would consist merely of the revenue on a portion of the lands for the assessment of which the zemindar was responsible to the State. This is the view taken both by Wilson and Wilkins. The materials available for the interpretation of the word do not justify the Judge's view that savaram necessarily conveys the idea of full proprietary right in the zemindar. In Second Appeals Nos. 994 to 1024 of 1902, relating to the same estate, certain savaram lands were held not to be the zemindar's private property. In Second Appeals Nos 518 and 519 of 1910 also, which came up from the same District, 'savaram' lands were held not to be the same as private lands. Mr. Seshagiri Iyer, the learned Vakil for the appellants, contends, that the finding of the District Judge against his clients is completely vitiated by the Judge's interpretation of the words 'savaram.' This argument is not without foundation. The Judge observes: "Starting then with this finding (i. e., that savaram was the actual grant of land and not of land revenue), we have to see whether the lands claimed now as savaram by the appellants were the original lands granted to him by the original Sovereign or were so accepted by the permanent Settlement or have so long been treated as savaram as to justify their acceptance as original savaram." There was, however, no serious dispute between the parties before the District Munsif that the lands on question were designated as 'savaram' in the documents relating to them. In appeal, an attempt was made to show that in two cases, lands not originally described as savaram in the zemindar's accounts were so designated in the accounts of subsequent years. But these variations were found by the District Judge to be easily explicable. The judgment of the Appellate Court shows clearly to our minds that the Judge did not fail to address himself to the real question between the parties, viz., whether the evidence was sufficient to establish that the zemindar was the owner of both the melvaram and the kudivaram in the lands. The discussion is not directed to the point whether the lands in this suit were proved to be savaram in ancient times or at the time of the permanent Settlement. The Judge first shows that savaram lands were treated in the accounts of the estate as different from the seri or public cultivable lands, that they were held by the ryots on rates of rent different from the seri lands, and that Government, by collecting water rates on savaram lands from the zemindar, while it levied it from the ryots in the case of seri lands, apparently treated the former as belonging to the zemindar. He then refers to evidence showing that from the year 1892 the zemindar asserted and the ryots admitted that the full proprietary right in the lands belonged to the former. He finds that in 1896 and 1897, the zemindar let these lands definitely as his own private lands and that in 1898 and subsequently he substituted grain rents for money rents and put up the lands for auction to the ryots who offered the highest bids of rent. These are points directly relating to the question whether the kudivaram right belongs to the zemindar or to the ryots and have no bearing on the identity of the lands with these belonging to the zemindar as savaram in olden times. In summing up his conclusions, the Judge observes that the plaintiff has proved the lands to be private. We are, therefore, of opinion that the lower Appellate Court's incorrect interpretation of the word savaram does not affect the validity of the finding that the lands in question are the zemindar's private lands.

Another objection taken to the finding is, that the pattas of the year 1897, in which the lands were let as the private lands of the zemindar, ought not to have been taken into consideration, inasmuch as the leases evidenced by them were to operate from 1st July 1898, the beginning of the Fasli year 1308. The argument is based on section 185 of the Estates Land Act which enacts that,—"When in any suit or proceeding, it becomes necessary to decide whether any land is the landlord's private land, regard shall be had to local custom and to the question whether the land was before the 1st day of July 1898 specifically let as private land and to any other evidence that may be produced; but the land shall be presumed to be private land until the contrary is shown." We cannot accept this contention. The letting took place before 1st July 1898 although the period of the lease commenced only subsequently. It is the date of the contract that is material in deciding whether the evidence is admissible. The Legislature wished to make all contracts made from and after the 1st July 1898 inadmissible against the ryots on the ground that the proprietors had been making attempts to convert public lands into their own private lands for sometime before the Act was passed. Suppose a zemindar made a lease in 1895 for a period of three years and at the same time gave a lease to another person to come into operation on the expiration of the previous lease, it would be impossible to hold that the letting to the second lessee was after the 1st July 1898. Such an interpretation is not required either by the words or the mischief of the statute. See Nilmoni Chuckerbutti v. Bykant Nath Bera (1). Mr. Govinda Raghava Aiyar for the respondent asks us to hold that leases granted after 1st July 1898 are not shut out by the section and that it only provides affirmatively that leases prior to that date should be taken into account. This is hardly consistent with the object of the section, nor is it easy to see why there should be any provision to making a letting before 1st July 1898 admissible if leases both before and after that date were regarded as equally admissible. The appellants also contend that subsequent dealings after 1st July 1898 ought not to have been taken into consideration by the Judge for any purpose. But he was certainly entitled to take them into account for deciding whether they had not been held as private lands by the zemindar for a period of 12 years prior to the commencement of the Act. Moreover, it cannot be held that when a zemindar has proved that he let certain land as private land before 1st July 1898, subsequent letting of the land in the same character cannot be proved to show that it was treated in the same manner after July 1898 as in the letting previous to July 1898. The Act does not lay down any rule as to all the kinds of evidence that may be produced to prove that the land in question is private land, and it cannot be held that all evidence subsequent to 1st July 1898 is shut out altogether. See Akhiu Singh v. Jagannath Prasad Singh (2).

The third objection to the finding of the Appellate Court is that the Judge's opinion that the khats of 1896, which contained a statement that the tenants had no occupancy-right were not executed by the ryots with a knowledge of the contents of the documents, was based by him on his own personal knowledge and that he acted illegally in importing his own private knowledge in deciding the question whether the plaintiffs' witnesses who stated that the ryots had a talk over the terms of the khats and raised no objection to them, or the defendant's witnesses who denied all knowledge on the part of the ryots of the terms, should be believed. There is no doubt that a Judge is not entitled to rely on specific facts not proved by the evidence in the case but known to him personally or otherwise. See Hurpurshad v. Sheo Dyal (3) and the cases cited in Ameer Ali and Woodroffe on Evidence at pages 115 and 806. But, at the same time, it is quite clear that a Judge may use, and cannot help using, his general knowledge and experience in determining the credibility of evidence adduced before him and applying it to the decision of the specific facts in dispute in the case. See Thayer's cases on Evidence, page 10, and Best on Evidence, page 176, section 187, where it is observed,—"But here an important distinction must be borne in mind, viz., the difference between general information and particular personal knowledge." Wigmore in his Treatise on Evidence says (see section 2570 Vol. IV) that,—"A juror is entitled to use his knowledge of the conditions affecting various kinds of values 'of land.'" The data on which legal inference is based are not all proved by evidence. Very often, though not always, what may be said to be of the nature of a major premise has not got to be proved. The Judge is entitled to act upon his own knowledge of the conditions of society including the history of its economical progress. It is not necessary to prove that population has increased and that there is great demand for land on the part of the cultivators now in parts of the country while in former times land was plentiful and cultivators were scarce. The dividing line is not easy to fix in all cases. What the Judge has done in this case is to use knowledge gained by him from his own experience that in 1896 there was no such scarcity of land for cultivation as to induce ryots to sign any muchilika that they might be required to execute. That is merely a fact of economical history. The Judge has not used his own knowledge as to the conduct either of the particular zemindar or of his ryots or the relations between them in any particular case or to fix the exact time at which any particular change commenced. He does not use his knowledge of the character of any particular individual, which is necessarily of a variable kind (see Wigmore, section 2570 Vol. IV). No doubt, the private knowledge used by the Judge related to lands in the Nuzvid Zemindari. But that is really an extensive tract of territory and the Judge did not import into the judgment any knowledge of the village in question or even specifically relating to the Gannavaram Estate in the Nuzvid Zemindari. We do not think that the Judge over-stepped the boundary line in this case. The onus was on the ryots to prove that they had no knowledge of the contents of the khats which they executed and the Judge was entitled to disbelieve evidence of facts which prima facie required strong proof. Durga Prasad Singh v. Ram Doyal Chaudhuri (4) does not really help Mr. Seshagiri Iyer. There the Judge was using his knowledge of a fact of a specific character, viz., that landlords were deliberately inducing ignorant ryots to sign documents describing themselves as temporary lessees, ticadars or ijaradars. The question whether pressure was used in that case undoubtedly required to be proved by evidence relating to the execution of the particular document. In Hurpurshad v. Sheo Dyal(3), the Privy Council merely held that a Judge cannot use his knowledge of the character of a particular witness in deciding as to his credibility

The objection taken to the finding of the District Judge on the question whether the zemindar is entitled to both the varams in the lands must, therefore, be held to be untenable and the second appeals must be dismissed with costs.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—The facts of the case have been fully set out in the judgment just now delivered by my learned brother and I need not repeat them. As two of the questions involved in the case are of some importance, I think it is not inappropriate to add a judgment of my own. As regards the meaning of the word savaram, this word, like seri, Jeroyati and similar words, seems to have different meanings in different parts of the country but, so far as this Presidency is concerned, the opinion of Mr. Grant, Dr. Maclean, Baden-Powell and of Sir G. S. Forbes seems to be that the word 'savaram', when applied to a land in a zemindari tract, indicates usually that the land itself, both melvaram and kudivaram, belongs to the zemindar free from any obligation to pay revenue to Government on the extent of such land. I do not say that in consequence of a land being known as savaram it should be presumed to belong (both melavaram and kudivaram) to the zemindar but I think that Courts may presume such land to be of the above character. The learned District Judge in this case seems to have put the presumption rather too strongly, but otherwise his judgment, which has gone very carefully into the evidence, seems to be not open to criticism.

As regards the other important question as to how far a Judge could use his own knowledge when arriving at a conclusion on the evidence adduced before him, the authorities are by no means clear. In the case of Hurpurshad v. Sheo Dyal (3), the Judge in the lower Court imported into the case his own knowledge of the fact that the family of the parties had recognised the division which one Chandan had made prior to his demise though there was no evidence let in about such recognition by the family. Their Lordships of the Privy Council held that this ought not to be done as the Judge's knowledge might have depended on mere rumour or hearsay. Their Lordships in the next sentence (page 286) state:—"But even if the Commissioner's statement of facts from his own knowledge be taken as evidence"—this shows that their Lordships did not finally decide that if the Judge's knowledge was not based upon mere rumour or hearsay but was the impression made directly on his own senses and if such knowledge had been communicated to the parties for criticism and comment, such knowledge could not be used by him in arriving at a conclusion on the evidence before him. In Lakmidas Khushal v. Bhaiji Khushal (5), a Subordinate Judge decided the suit after local inspection in which he found that a passage for rain-water spoken to by the plaintiff's witnesses as existing did not really exist. It was contended before the High Court that the Subordinate Judge acted illegally in importing his knowledge obtained at the local inspection in deciding the case and the appellant's Vakil relied on the oft-quoted and as often misunderstood case of Kessowji Issur v. Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company (6). But one of the learned Judges (Chandavakar, J.) easily distinguished that case on the ground that all that the Privy Council decided was that the learned High Court Judge's personal knowledge obtained on an inspection of the locality on a different day amidst possibly different surroundings was no safe criterion in deciding the question in issue in that particular case. The learned Judge (Chandavarkar, J.) in Lakmidas Khushal v. Bhaiji Khushal (5) clearly held that the Subordinate Judge did not act illegally in using his knowledge of the non-existence of the rain water passage in deciding the case before him. In Bourne v. Swan & Edgar, Ltd. (7), Farwell, J., said that two classes of cases must be distinguished in these matters and while in one class of cases the, Judge's direct knowledge can be used only for the purposes of enabling him to understand the questions that are being raised, to follow the evidence and to apply the evidence, there are cases of a different kind where it is the eyesight of the Judge that is practically the ultimate test. In cases of infringment of patent rights or infringment of trade-marks and in cases of 'passing off' the defendant's goods as plaintiff's, the Judge has mostly to rely upon the evidence of his own senses. As regards the demeanour of witnesses, the Judge has to depend upon the knowledge and the impression brought to his mind by his eyes and ears. Even as regards the credibility of witnesses, let us suppose that a person known to the Judge as of the highest character is produced as a witness before the Judge. Is it possible for him to put out of his mind his knowledge of the character of the witness in coming to a conclusion upon the evidence? It is simply asking the Judge to perform an impossible feat. As to using the observations made by the Judge at a local inspection merely to understand the evidence, I shall here quote the remarks of Bissel, J. in an American case,—"We are very frank to say we do not appreciate the refined distinction which is drawn by some authorities wherein it is held that the Jury are not at liberty to regard what they have seen as evidence in the case but must utterly reject it otherwise than as an aid to the understanding of the testimony offered. The folly of it is apparent from the constitution of the human mind and the well known processes by which Juries arrive at conclusions. If a dozen witnesses should testify that there was no window on the north side of the house from which one had sworn that he had viewed the affray and the Jurors on view should see the window, all lawyers would know that it would be futile in the argument to insist on the Jury that their verdict must be based on the non-existence of the window since the point had been sustained by a vast preponderance in the number of witnesses" (11 Colo. App. 41.) I know that there are old dicta to the effect that a Judge should decide only on the evidence before him and should not at all use his private knowledge. Wigmore refers (paragraph 2569, note 2) to a case in Henry IV's time where the Judge allowed a prisoner to be convicted on the evidence but got a pardon for him from the King because the Judge knew of his personal knowledge that the accused was not guilty. This shows the absurd lengths to which the doctrine of not using personal knowledge in coming to a conclusion in the case could be carried and why it is that there is some agitation now in this country for village panchayets to be constituted as Judges so that they might use their own knowledge of the facts of the case and the character of witnesses to come to conclusions on facts. I do not, of course, wish to restore the days of Mariada Raman or Haroun-al-Raschid but a Judge must be allowed to use even his knowledge of concrete private facts, provided he mentions his knowledge to the parties and they do not object to his deciding the case and he must be allowed, of course, to use his knowledge of general or public facts, historical, scientific, political and otherwise in coming to his conclusions. Let us take the case of a witness who belongs to a hill tribe which is known to the Judge by his past experience as a Revenue Officer as consisting of persons who are generally incapable of telling complicated lies. Is not the Judge entitled to use his said knowledge in arriving at a conclusion on the evidence of that witness? Judges and Juries do use and, it seems to me, are entitled to use their general past experience of men and things in arriving at conclusions of fact and such experience is not only not considered as a disqualification but is a very necessary qualification for coming to sound conclusions of fact. I know that English Judges have laid down in some cases the rule as to the using of the Judge's own knowledge in coming to conclusions upon the evidence rather too strictly. [See. London Omnibus Company Ltd. v. Lavel (8)]. But, with great respect, I am inclined to think that the only restriction which can be imposed upon the Judge is that he should not import knowledge obtained by mere rumour or hearsay of concrete facts connected with that particular case before him for arriving at a conclusion. When a Judge is supposed to be reliable enough to come to a conclusion on the evidence of facts deposed to before him as seen or heard by witnesses, it is surely anomalous and even startling to hold that he cannot be relied on to use impartially the facts directly seen and heard by himself. The only result of thus holding would be that Judges would be induced to take some formal evidence of the same facts from much less reliable sources than themselves and to omit all mention of their own knowledge in their judgments and this course cannot be held as conducive to a satisfactory decision of the cases when they come up on appeal before the Appellate Court.

When a proposition of fact has to be established before a judicial tribunal, there are two principal heads under which the modes of presentation of the evidentiary facts fall. "The first is by the presentation of the thing itself as to which persuasion is desired" (Wigmore, section 24) and this mode is called immediate or direct real evidence (Pratyaksha Pramana). In cases of contempt of Court, committed in the presence of a tribunal, "it has direct real evidence of the fact." "The thing which is the source of the evidence is present to the senses of the tribunal." This first and best mode of proof (called Pratyaksha in Sanskrit) is sometimes rather pedantically called 'Autoptic proference' in English. When a Judge sees the demeanour of a witness or observes that a witness is blind or deaf or a prosecutrix who complains of rape is a brazen muscular woman or that an accused charged with running away from custody is a lame man, it is surely open to him to use such direct knowledge in coming to his conclusions as to the rights and wrongs of the parties before him without having these facts proved by the statements of others as witnesses. The second principal head of proof (inference or Anummanam) falls under two sub-heads, viz., (a) the evidence given by a human being heard or read by the tribunal and called testimonial or direct evidence and (b) other connected facts called circumstantial or indirect evidence (see Starkie 1-13).

When a tribunal knows a fact by direct real evidence, that fact is necessarily established much more satisfactorily than by the other kinds of evidence. It may be necessary to provide that when a fact is known to the Judge in this way, he should make a note of it in writing during the course of the trial and read it out to the parties so that the parties might be aware that the Court has knowledge of that fact and so that arguments and comments might be based and explanations offered by both sides on such fact so stated by the Judge as known to him before the Judge decides on the rights and liabilities of the parties. This is the principle of the rule enunciated in some Indian cases that the Judge who has made a local inspection should place on record the evidence and impressions gathered by him. [See Rai Kishori Ghose v. Kumudini Kanta Ghose (9)]. In England and America, Juries are mostly the Judges of fact and the Juries are presumed not to be able to arrive at proper conclusions without a pretty exhaustive summing up of the evidence by the Judge. Further, if one of the Jurors has previous private knowledge of a fact, the others might not know it. Hence, there is the rule that that juror must testify as witness in the case though his said private knowledge and his having testified as a witness do not make him incompetent to sit on the Jury as one of the judges of facts, as his knowledge after he gives his evidence is commented upon by the Judge in his summing up. The system of trial by Juries, who are returned "of the vicinage whence the cause of action ariseth", was originally based on the circumstance that "the law supposeth them hence to have sufficient knowledge to try the matter in issue though no evidence were given on either side in Court." If such evidence of witnesses is given, the Jury "may have evidence from their own personal knowledge by which they may be assured and sometimes are that what is deposed in Court is absolutely false" and "the Jury may know the witnesses to be stigmatized and infamous." (Vaughan, C. J., in Bushell's case 1670). But between 1650 and 1700, the necessity of controlling the Jury in some further way under the changed and changing conditions of society was felt and hence, the Judges who were guided by such motives gradually laid down a new rule. From 1702 the new rule had been established that a Juror should give evidence and be subjected to the test of cross-examination before he could use the facts in his own direct knowledge and communicate them to his fellow-Jurors, if those facts are not 'notorious' or 'unquestioned' facts or facts deducible from the common fund of experience and knowledge of which anybody could, reasonably, take 'notice' without proof and are not "matters of mere private interest."

If a Judge has knowledge of some particular concrete fact, which is a matter of mere 'private interest' peculiar to the particular case before him, which fact is not an existing natural fact (of relative permanence like the existence of a stream or a tree) but one that has already happened and which fact is a matter of strong controversy between the parties, he should, no doubt, retire from the case as Judge so as to be able to give his evidence for one side or the other before another Judge. But where a Judge has no personal or pecuniary interest in a case and merely uses his knowledge of human nature or his general opinion of large classes of people based on his previous experience or the testimony of his own senses in respect of things and persons observed by him in the course of the proceedings before him after he had given notice to the parties (or even outside the proceedings, provided he mentions such knowledge to the parties), I do not see how he could be prevented (except by asking him to do the impossible feat of forgetting everything and even not to be led sub-consciously by facts within his knowledge) from using such knowledge. I cannot even bring myself to understand why he should be so prevented, especially if he has special technical learning, knowledge and general information which gives him very useful materials for arriving at a proper conclusion. A Judge is appointed presumably for the reason that his learning, impartiality and trained powers of observation are superior to and more reliable than the average learning, etc., of the litigants and witnesses before him. In systems of law where the Judge has very little to do with findings on facts, a Judge might be made merely to sum up the evidence before him impartially (without asking the Jury to consider what he knows) and leave it to the Jury to come to their own conclusions. But where, (as in India in all Civil cases and most Criminal cases), the Judge is a Judge of both facts and law, it is impossible to ask him not to use his knowledge of particular classes of people, and other like circumstances when arriving at a conclusion on facts. Of course, if an Appellate Court finds that a lower Court has unduly pressed such general knowledge (say, by unduly suspecting the genuineness of an unregistered document because it was executed in a town notorious for forgeries or because the writer was of a particular caste or profession), the appellate tribunal would use its own presumably sounder knowledge of human nature to set right the inferior Court and give advice to the lower Court not to be led too much away by such considerations. It has been sometimes laid down that a Judge must as Judge "ignore what he knows as a private man" and he "may have to ignore" as a private man what he knows as Judge. I respectfully dissent from such observations. In some old cases (collected in foot-note 4 in Wigmore, para. 2569), it was held that the Judge's personal knowledge of a witness's lack of credit should not be used. In a later case, however, the trial Judge's "great familiarity with that portion of the state" was considered as a ground for not reversing his judgment and a Judge's personal knowledge of the services of a Counsel (obtained as Judge sitting in the previous case) was allowed to be used by the Judge in fixing the remuneration of that Counsel in an action brought by the Counsel for such services. I think the only practical rule which can be laid down in these cases is that if a Judge knows of his own knowledge as an individual observer of a past relevent concrete private incident and that fact cannot be subjected to clear proof at the time of trial (such as a person's colour, resemblance of features, appearance, behaviour, chemical experiments on the present condition of the object) and if the truth of such incident is contested between the parties, he should mention his private knowledge of such incident to the parties and he should refuse to be the Judge in that case, unless both the parties, after he so mentions to them his said personal knowledge of that particular incident, state that they have no objection to his continuing as Judge. That the Judge was competent to give evidence in the witness-box and to subject himself to cross-examination and then to decide the case was the old rule but this has been discountenanced for obvious reasons in modern times and, in my opinion, should not be allowed. All that can be permitted is that the Judge's personal knowledge should (as in cases of proceedings for contempt) be recorded and be allowed to be commented upon in a moderate manner. In the case of concrete particular facts, the Judge who uses his own knowledge should only be obliged to state whether he knows it by direct knowledge or by rumour or hearsay and should not be subjected to cross-examination. General knowledge of the tenures in a particular area or of the character of certain populations as also direct knowledge gained by his own senses and mind—it is impossible to prohibit the Judge from using such knowledge in drawing inferences from the evidence before him and in coming to conclusions as to the rights of parties before him. In the present case, the learned Judge has not gone further than using the general knowledge which he had acquired as a past Revenue Officer and as a Revenue Court of experience in the course of the performance of his duties in zemindari tracts; and I hold that he was entitled to use such knowledge in coming to a conclusion on the facts after the consideration of the evidence let in in this case. One other short point has to be noticed, viz., whether the leases granted after 1st July 1898 are wholly shut out as evidence by section 185 of the Estates Land Act. I am inclined to hold that they are so shut out if sought to be used for the purposes of proving the character of the tenure of the land and even if such leases are sought to be proved merely in order to show that a land was treated in the same manner after July 1898 as before July 1898. I agree, however, with my learned brother that leases granted before 1st July 1898, though they were to come into force only after 1st July 1898, are admissible in evidence and in the result, I agree that these second appeals should be dismissed with costs.

Injunction, temporary—Order to furnish security and submit accounts—Appeal—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 94 (e), 115, O. XXXIX, r. 1, O. XLIII, r. 1, cl. (r)—Interlocutory order for ends of justice—Revision.

In a suit for ejectment, the plaintiff prayed for the issue of a temporary injunction restraining the defendant from working mica mines on the disputed property. The Court ordered the defendant to furnish security to the extent of Rs. 5,000 and submit accounts every week. An appeal was filed against that order. Subsequently, the Court directed the issue of an injunction as the security and the accounts had not been furnished. No appeal was preferred against this order:

Held, (1) that the order appealed against did not grant a temporary injunction nor did it stay and prevent the wasting of the property; that it was not an order contemplated by rule 1 of Order XXXIX, and that, therefore, it was not appealable under clause (r) of rule 1 of Order XLIII;

(2) that the order was made under clause (e) of section 94 of the Civil Procedure Code for the ends of justice, and that the High Court should not set it aside under section 115.

Appeal from the order of the Sub-Judge of Hazaribagh, dated August 12th, 1911.

Babu Khetra Mohan Sen, for the Appellants.

Babus Dwarka Nath Chakravarti and Lalit Mohan Mukherjee, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The respondent instituted a suit for ejectment against the appellants on the 10th December 1910. On the 11th February 1911, he prayed for the issue of a temporary injunction restraining the defendants from working the mica mines on the disputed property and raising mica therefrom. The application for injunction was opposed by the defendants. The Court thereupon directed that the matter be taken up on the 12th August. On that date, an order was made in these terms,—"The plaintiff has brought a suit for ejectment. The defendant alleges himself to be a lessee of a mica mine. The plaintiff is afraid that the defendant will appropriate a major quantity of the mica in the mine and thus prejudice the plaintiff seriously. Notice has been served on the other side to show cause why he should not be prevented from working in the mica mines. Ordered that the defendant do furnish security to the extent of Rs. 5,000 and submit accounts of the monies appropriated every week from the date of the application for injunction. Date is fixed for 6th September."

The present appeal is directed against this order. The appellants also moved this Court on the 25th August 1911 and prayed for a Rule upon the plaintiff to show cause why the order in question should not be set aside. The Court granted a Rule and directed further proceedings to be stayed ad interim. Before this order was communicated to the Court below, on the 7th February 1911, the Subordinate Judge directed the issue of an injunction inasmuch as the security and the accounts had not been furnished within the date specified. No appeal, however, has been preferred against the order of the 7th September.

On behalf of the respondent, a preliminary objection has been taken to the competency of this appeal on the ground that it is not an order under rule 1 of Order XXXIX of the Code and is, consequently, not appealable under clause (r) of rule 1 of Order XLIII. In our opinion, this contention is well founded and must prevail.

Rule 1 of Order XXXIX provides that where in any suit it is proved by affidavit or otherwise that any property in dispute in the suit is in danger of being wasted, the Court may, by order, grant a temporary injunction to restrain such act or make such other order for the purpose of staying and preventing the wasting of the property, as the Court thinks fit, until the disposal of the suit or until further orders. It is not disputed that the order in question does not grant a temporary injunction; nor can it be contended that the order stays and prevents the wasting of the property. Inspite of the order, the defendants were entitled to work the mine. They were merely called upon to furnish security and submit periodical accounts. The order in question is clearly one not contempleted by rule 1 of Order XXXIX. The appeal is, therefore, incompetent and must be dismissed with costs. We assess the hearing fee at two gold mohurs.

We have been invited, however, to set aside the order in the exercise of our revisional jurisdiction. But there is obviously no ground for such interference. The order was made under clause (e) of section 94 of the Code, which authorises the Court, in order to prevent the ends of justice from being defeated, to make such interlocutory orders as may appear to the Court to be just and convenient. This Rule must, consequently, be discharged but there will be no separate order for costs.

As the trial of the case has been delayed for nearly two years by reason of the application for injunction and the order therein, the records will be returned without delay to the Court below so that the hearing may be expedited.

Appeal dismissed; Rule discharged.

Khawaja Zia-ud-Din, for the Appellant.

Lala Dharm Das Suri, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The only points of all those taken which have any force are that there was no finding by the lower Appellate Court that refusal by the appellant to deliver possession had not been proved, and that the lower Appellate Court had misdescribed the mortgage-deed.

The first point is met by the pleadings in which it was alleged and not denied that delivery of possession had been refused and the second point is immaterial having regard to the refusal to deliver.

The mortgage was not a simple mortgage, but refusal to deliver possession gives the mortgagee the right to sue for the mortgage-money and interest. Cf. Hira Lal v. Ghasitu (1) and Ghose on Mortgage, Edition 4, p. 278. Soman Mull v. Kanh Chand (2), Gulam Husain v. Mehtab (3) and Gian Singh v. Mohan Singh (4) do not apply to the facts of this case. Permission to withdraw the suit and file a fresh suit was obtained from the Small Cause Court, in which the previous suit, relied on as a bar to the present suit, was filed and oral evidence of modifications of the registered contract was rightly excluded, section 92 (3) of the Evidence Act being clearly inapplicable and section 92 (4) being specifically inapplicable to registered contracts. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

BALDEO—RESPONDENT.

Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 111—Position of active confidence—Experienced mukhtiar of inexperienced young man—Burden of proof—Allegation of benami transaction—Practice—Party waiting to be produced as witness by opposite party.

Where the affairs of an inexperienced young man, who has just come into possession of his property, are managed by an experienced mukhtiar, the latter stands in a position of active confidence to the former within the meaning of section 111 of the Evidence Act.

Where a sale to a person in a position of active confidence to the vendor is impugned on the ground that the vendor intended the sale-deed to be a benami document, the rule in section 111 as to burden of proof applies and it is for the vendee to prove that the transaction was for consideration and was entered into in good faith.

Moonshee Buzloor Ruheem v. Shumsoonnissa Begum, 11 M. I. A. 551; 8 W. R. (P.C.) 3, followed.

A party knowing the facts of his case personally, should appear as his own witness and not wait to be produced as a witness by the opposite party.

First appeal, against the decree of the District Judge, Nagpur, dated the 15th October 1909.

Messrs. P. S. Kotwal and Madho Rao Padhye, for the Appellant.

Mr. F. W. Dillon, Sir B. K. Bose, Rao Bahadur Bapu Rao Dada and Mr. M. B. Kinkhede, for the Respondent.

FACTS.—Suratsing sued to recover possession of landed property sold by his father Hanuman to the defendant Baldeo, on the ground that Baldeo was Hanuman's mukhtiar and induced Hanuman, who was of weak intellect, to execute the deed of sale in Baldeo's favour by falsely representing to him that it was necessary to execute a benami sale-deed in order to protect the property. The defence was that the sale was genuine and that full consideration had been paid as stated in the deed.

JUDGMENT.—A great part of the arguments in this Court has been devoted to the question of the burden of proof. The grounds on which it is argued that the burden of proving consideration lay on the defendant are two-fold, firstly, that Hanuman was of weak intellect, an imbecile, and, secondly, that the defendant was in a position of active confidence towards Hanuman within the meaning of section 111 of the Evidence Act. It was for the plaintiff to prove these circumstances. The District Judge has held that the plaintiff has failed to prove that Hanuman was an imbecile or of weak intellect, and I entirely agree with him. His reasons are given in paragraph 6 of his judgment. It would, in my opinion, be impossible to hold otherwise in face of the evidence of the plaintiff's own witnesses. For instance, the 12th witness, Vithoba, says Hanuman was a person of ordinary intelligence, like the witness himself.

It is an admitted fact that the defendant was Hanuman's mukhtiar, though it is not admitted that he did anything more than Court work for him. It is clear from the defendant's own written statement and evidence as 9th witness for plaintiff that defendant did a great deal for Hanuman as his mukhtiar. Hanuman was a young man who had just come into his property and Baldeo was a man of experience who had also been the mukhtiar of Hanuman's predecessor-in-title, Musammat Latkan Bai. No Indian cases of exactly a similar kind have been cited, nor have I been able to find such cases, but I have no hesitation in saying that Baldeo stood towards Hanuman in a position of active confidence, just as much as a Solicitor or Barrister. I would note here that a sale to a Solicitor is not necessarily invalidated by reason of the consideration having in part consisted of costs already incurred, though the fact of the client being indebted to the Solicitor is an unfavourable feature, on account of the additional influence it must necessarily have created (vide cases cited at page 44 of Dart on the Law of Vendors and Purchasers, 7th Edition). Similar considerations appear to me to apply in this case and, if section 111 of the Evidence Act applies, it is for the defendant to prove the fairness of the transaction, which on the pleadings means that it was for consideration.

An ingenious argument has been put forward on behalf of the respondent, namely, that section 111 of the Evidence Act is not applicable when, as here, the persons impugning the transaction do so on the ground that it was a nominal transaction, and not on the ground that the executant was induced to believe that he was executing a genuine document for consideration whereas in fact there was no consideration. It is argued that when it is admitted that the executant knew that the document was not for consideration and not intended to take effect, the question of the fairness of the transaction does not arise, but only the question of the reality of the transaction, and that it lies on the person who alleges its unreality to prove it, and that the circumstances necessary for the application of section 111 do not exist. It appears to me that this argument, though ingenious, is fallacious. Here the defendant asserts that the sale-deed was in good faith, that is to say, for consideration, while the plaintiff says that it was not for consideration. The good faith of the transaction is certainly in question, and once it is established that the defendant was in a position of active confidence towards Hanuman, the section applies. The good faith of the transaction means the good faith of the whole transaction, that is to say, that the transaction was entered into in good faith by both the parties. A benami transaction may, as between the parties to it, be entered into in good faith just as much as any other transaction, and if, as the plaintiff alleges, the transaction was in fraud of Hanuman, the method of carrying out the fraud is of no importance as regards this provision of the law, whether it was by inducing him to execute a document which he believed to be genuine, or whether it was by inducing him to execute a document which he intended to be a benami document while the defendant intended to use it as a real transfer. I hold that section 111 is applicable. I am confirmed in this view by the ruling in Moonshee Buzloor Ruheem v. Shumsoonissa Begum (1), where it was alleged by the person impugning the transaction that it was benami. On the other hand, the defendant is entitled to take advantage of anything in the plaintiff's pleadings and evidence which supports his case, and if the plaintiff positively asserts that the fraud was committed in a particular way, and the story as told is improbable, the defendant is entitled to ask the Court to take that improbability into consideration in weighing the evidence. Moreover, though it lies on the defendant to prove that the transaction was bona fide, if the plaintiff seeks to gain any particular advantage from the fraud having been committed in a particular way, the plaintiff would, to gain that advantage, have to prove that the fraud was committed in that particular way before he could obtain that particular advantage. Thus, if the suit were time-barred if the fraud were of an ordinary nature, and not time-barred if Hanuman executed a benami deed, then it would lie on the plaintiff to prove that the deed was intended by Hanuman to be benami.

[After reviewing the evidence, the judgment proceeds :—]

I quite disbelieve the story of the transaction being believed by Hanuman to be nominal, and I agree with the District Judge that Baldeo has proved the payment of consideration by as good evidence as it was likely he could get after such a lapse of time.

I cannot ignore Baldeo's own evidence as 9th witness for the plaintiff. It has its unsatisfactory features but, on the whole, it is good evidence. Baldeo, I regret to remark, was examined as a witness for his adversary instead of for himself. This practice, which, I am sorry to say is not dying such a quick death as it should, considering the frequent criticisms of this Court, is bound to result in the evidence being recorded in an unsatisfactory manner.

It is clear that Baldeo did use his influence to induce Hanuman to sell his Central Provinces property to him, but the influence took the form of inducing him to sell to Baldeo rather than to some one else, Baliram. I can see nothing improper in this since Baldeo thus made sure of being paid what was owed him.

I agree with the District Judge that the respondent has sustained the burden of proving that the sale-deed was executed in good faith, and for consideration, and I dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Mr. Daulat Ram, for Mr. Devi Dial, for the Appellant.

Mr. Roshan Lal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The following is the pedigree of the parties:—

On the 3rd November 1910, the defendants-respondents, sons of Masta and Mutsaddi, sued Uttam Singh, Charat Singh and Dewa for possession of 6 bighas, being 2/3rds of 9 bighas, mortgaged by Lakha Singh to Charat Singh shortly before Lakha's death. The defences set up were (1) that Lakha had adopted Uttam and that the then plaintiff, consequently, had no right to Lakha's land, (2) that the mortgage was for consideration and legal necessity.

The suit was tried by a Munsif of the first class, who devoted the greater part of his judgment to the first issue and decided that the alleged adoption had not been established and gave the then plaintiffs a decree on the 28th February 1911. On the latter date, the plaintiff-appellant, Uttam, filed a suit against the previous plaintiffs and his brothers, Charat and Dewa, for possession of Lakha's estate on the ground that he had been adopted, i. e., appointed heir under the Customary Law, by Lakha. This suit was cognisable by a Munsif of the first class but was tried by a Subordinate Judge. The Court of first instance held that the suit was not barred by the rule of res judicata, embodied in section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the question of adoption having arisen only between the collaterals and Charat, and the plaintiff before him having nothing to gain from that suit, being merely a "by-stander" and the issue not arising directly between him and the present defendant. The lower Appellate Court held that the suit was barred by section 11 and dismissed it on the ground that Uttam Singh had been impleaded in the former suit and set up his adoption in defence. The lower Appellate Court further held that the fact that Uttam Singh, subsequently, declined to submit to the jurisdiction of the Court and announced his intention of filing a suit on his own account did not help him, inasmuch as he had not obtained the permission of the Court to withdraw from the defence and file a separate suit. I see no reason for interfering with this conclusion. In the previous suit, the question of adoption was directly and substantially in issue between the then plaintiffs, and the present plaintiff-appellant. They were litigating under the same title and the Court was competent to try the present suit. The decision of the issue against the then plaintiffs would have entailed dismissal of their suit, and the fact that Charat Singh was then the defendant in possession does not obviate the fact that the present plaintiff-appellant was a party to the suit, and set up the adoption on which he now sues. The facts dealt with in Zaman Ali v. Manji (1) and Labhu v. Hira

BHURA v. RAMRAO.

Singh (2), cited for the appellant, are so clearly distinguishable from those of the present case that they do not help him. Here there was in the former suit a "real adjudication" of the question of the title of those plaintiffs and the present plaintiff as between them. The greater part of the judgment of the Court in the previous suit, as already stated, was devoted to the adoption. For these reasons, I hold that section 11 bars the present suit and I dismiss the appeal, but, having regard to the circumstances under which this suit was filed, I leave the parties to bear their own costs of this Court.

Appeal dismissed.

An alienation by a Hindu widow of her deceased husband's estate in order to provide the expenses of his divided nephew's marriage is not binding on her husband's reversioners, as such expenses do not constitute legal necessity.

A Hindu widow, upon whom the absolute-occupancy-holding of her husband has devolved under section 38 (1) of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act, 1883 or section 41 (1) of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act, 1898, obtains an interest therein analogous in all respects to the estate of a Hindu widow in land inherited by her from her husband subject only to the provisions of the statute as to surrender and alienation.

Appeal against the decree of District Judge, Chhindwara, dated the 16th January 1911, confirming that of the Subordinate Judge, Chhindwara, dated the 26th August 1910.

Messrs. Ramdas Chhabildas and A. C. Roy, for the Appellant.

Messrs. J. Mitra and P. S. Kotwal, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—It is expedient to briefly state the facts of the case. One Bapu Rao Mahratta had an absolute occupancy holding. He died on the 5th September 1884, not "in 1894" as stated in the judgment of the lower Appellate Court. Under the provisions of Act IX of 1883, his holding devolved on his widow, Musammat Laxmi Bai, there being no lineal descendant of her husband. Bapu Rao had two brothers, Aba Saheb and Balwant Rao. Neither of these was joint with him in the holding above mentioned. Aba Saheb predeceased Bapu Rao, leaving a son named Vithoba. In 1891, Musammat Laxmi Bai and Vithoba executed a mortgage of the holding in favour of one Khushal, part of the consideration being money borrowed to meet the expenses of Vithoba's marriage. In 1893, Laxmi Bai and Vithoba sold the holding to the defendant for Rs. 1,200, whereof Rs. 772 were applied in satisfaction of the mortgage and a grain debt, and Rs. 428 were advanced in cash. In 1902, Musammat Laxmi Bai died, and then, unless the alienation endures beyond her life-time, the holding devolved upon the heirs of her husband, who were Vithoba, the son of Aba Saheb, and Ramrao the son of Balwant Rao—also dead. The present plaintiff is Ramrao, and he claims half the estate. The defendant denied the plaintiff's alleged relationship with Bapu Rao, and asserted that holding had been alienated to him for legal necessity by the widow of Bapurao.

The first Court found,—

(1) that the plaintiff is Bapu Rao's brother's son and was one of two heirs in whom the reversion vested on the death of Musammat Laxmi Bai in 1902; and

(2) that, of the consideration of Rs. 1,200, a sum of Rs. 772 went to pay money borrowed for the marriage of Vithoba, which was a legal necessity.

The first Court, therefore, gave the plaintiff a decree for half the holding, on payment of Rs. 772 with interest thereon from the date of Laxmi Bai's death, minus whatever the defendant might be found to have recovered as profits of the holding from the same date.

Against this decree, both parties appealed to the District Judge, who dismissed the appeal of the defendant, holding on the appeal of the plaintiff,—

(1) that only Rs. 666 represented the amount connected with Vithoba's marriage; and

(2) that Vithoba's marriage was not a legal necessity binding on the estate of his uncle Bapurao, since it was an estate in severalty wherein Vithoba had no co-parcenary interest.

The District Judge, therefore, cancelled the condition appended by the first Court to plaintiff's decree for possession. The defendant has now made this second appeal, and the grounds pressed before me are,—

(1) that the marriage of Vithoba was a legal necessity; and

(2) that the right of Laxmi Bai in the holding was a right created by contract and statute, and her power to alienate the holding as the tenant thereof for the time being was not governed or restricted by the Hindu Law, but only by the Tenancy Act. In support of this argument, reference was made to Ghanya v. Ukund Rao (1).

With regard to the first of these points, it was urged that the dictum from the case of Sundra Bai v. Shivnarayana (2), quoted by the lower Appellate Court, is obiter. That is, no doubt, the case: but no text or authority is forthcoming in support of the view that a Hindu is so far bound to provide the marriage expenses of the son of his divided deceased brother, as to justify an alienation of his estate by his widow for that purpose. A Bombay case was cited, wherein it was held that it is the pious duty of a Hindu widow to adopt a son whenever she can to a husband who has died sonless, in order that his name and line may be perpetuated, and his obsequies duly performed: and it was sought to draw an analogy from this case to sustain the argument of the appellant. No doubt Bapu Rao died without lineal issue: but, on the authority cited, the widow's duty was to adopt a son, and not to waste the inheritance on a nephew. Assuming adoption was not permissible in the present case, Bapu Rao left a brother and two nephews, besides his widow, to look after the ceremonies necessary for his spiritual benefit, and the analogy claimed does not hold good. I have no reason, as at present advised, to differ from the lower Appellate Court on the question of legal necessity, and the appeal, therefore, fails under this head.

Then, as to the power of Laxmi Bai to alienate. In Ghanya v. Ukund Rao (1), I decided that an agricultural holding governed by the Central Provinces Tenancy Act " is an estate created by contract and statute, and its devolution is governed by the same statute ". And I added that, although the statute makes such devolution follow the personal law of the tenant, "it is not enacted that all the principles of such personal law shall be applied to the estate. The statute merely directs that when it becomes necessary to find the heir of a deceased tenant, he shall be the person who would be heir to an estate of ownership in land. The Tenancy Act does not recognize such things as succession by right of survivorship, the vesting of a son's interest by birth, and so on". I might add that it is only in the case of an absolute occupany that the personal law is fully followed. It is only partly followed in the case of occupancy and ordinary tenant-right.

The learned Counsel for the appellant inferred from this ruling that the Tenancy Act provides, not only the devolution, but also the quantum of the estate held by an agricultural tenant as such, and that it contains none of the limitations imposed by Hindu law on a widow. It was, therefore, wrong to go into questions of legal necessity and reversionary rights under Hindu Law. A Hindu widow holding an absolute occupancy-right has precisely the same right of alienation as any other tenant, the enactment making no distinction between male and female tenants. If she can surrender, she can sell.

This argument is, no doubt, plausible : but there are several reasons why I must decide against it. In the first place, it comes as an eleventh hour surprise. The case was fought out in the lower Courts on the assumption by both parties that the estate of Laxmi Bai in the absolute occupancy was that of a Hindu widow, and, though the question now raised is purely one of law, it is nevertheless an entirely new ground of defence, neither pleaded nor put in issue. However, I should not put it aside on this ground alone. But there is against it the much stronger argument arising out of the maxim of stare decisis. Ever since an absolute occupancy tenure was made heritable, it has been accepted law in these Provinces that, when held by a Hindu widow, as such, it is governed by all the restrictions applied by Hindu Law to the estate of a Hindu widow in land inherited by her from her husband. It is only necessary to refer to the cases of Fakira v. Hari (3); Musammat Salita v. Sitaram (4) and Sheoshankarpuri v. Musammat Rakhma (5). I should require very strong reasons to disturb a view of the law so settled. Such reasons are entirely wanting. I have no doubt, as already decided in Ghanya v. Ukund Rao (1), that the Tenancy Act does not make the holding of a Hindu tenant an estate at Hindu law; and that the nature and extent of the interest of every agricultural tenant must depend upon his contract with the landlord, supplemented and controlled by the enactment, and by nothing else. But, by using the personal law as a guide to devolution, the statute necessarily introduces such limitations as the personal law provides for the purpose of securing such devolution. If the statutory devolution is to follow Hindu law, it must secure that, after the death of a widow who has inherited the tenancy from her husband, the holding shall devolve upon the heirs of her husband, and not upon her heirs. That is what the Tenancy Act does provide, and it is, therefore, not correct to say that it makes no difference between male and female tenants. Where the tenant is a Hindu female, upon whom the Tenancy has devolved from a male propositus, she is not a fresh stock of descent. I do not interpret the enactment to mean that the heir is to be found for each tenant in turn. The words "shall devolve as if it were land" mean a continuous devolution along a chain of heirs reckoned from the first tenant. Therefore, the Tenancy Act, by its application of the Hindu Law rule of inheritance, necessarily gives Hindu females, who have become tenants by devolution, a qualified estate, saddled with a reversion: and it seems reasonable to asume that the Legislature intended, in this particular instance, to apply the personal law for the purpose of fixing those qualifications.

I, therefore, hold that a Hindu widow, upon whom the absolute occupancy holding of her husband has devolved under section 38 (1) of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act, 1883, or section 41 (1) of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act, 1898, obtains an interest therein analogous in all respects to the estate of a Hindu widow in land inherited by her from her husband, subject only to the provisions of the statute as to surrender and alienation.

For the above reasons, this appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Mr. K. Ramachandra Aiyar, for 1st Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The only question argued before us is that the finding on the question whether Ramachandra Rao was entitled to one-half or only one-fifth of the properties should not be accepted. The decision of the question depended upon whether Ramachandra Rao was adopted to Triambaka Rao, the uncle of Narayana Rao and Krishna Rao, or not. The Subordinate Judge has considered in detail the evidence on the question and has referred to the conduct of the parties which was relied on as proving an adoption. It is argued that there was evidence given of an oral partition at which Ramachandra Rao was given one-third of the property. This partition is said to have been in 1894, seven years before the mortgage, which was in 1901. The Subordinate Judge has referred to Exhibit III in which this oral partition was set up and he was not prepared to place reliance on Exhibit III. We cannot say that the absence of express reference to the oral evidence of the partition in 1894 would vitiate the finding when the Subordinate Judge found himself unable to accept Exhibit III, in which the oral partition was referred to, as reliable against the plaintiff. We must, therefore, dismiss the appeal with costs.

The question raised in the memo. of objections is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to mesne profits on the four-fifths share sought to be redeemed from the date of plaint up to the time of his being put in possession of one-half share subsequent to the decree of the District Munsif. It is argued that he is, because he tendered four-fifths of the mortgage amount to the 1st defendant and the latter refused to receive it. It is urged that the mortgage-money ceased to carry interest after the 1st defendant's refusal to accept payment and to deliver four-fifths of the properties; and that 1st defendant was bound to account for four-fifths of the mesne profits from that date under section 76, clause (e), of the Transfer of Property Act. The claim is not and cannot be rested on the ground that the plaintiff has actually sustained any damages by any wrongful act on the part of the 1st defendant. The right claimed is a statutory one. Does it exist in a case of this sort? The 1st defendant, in his written statement, did not deny the tender. He alleged that the plaintiff was not entitled to demand apportionment of the mortgage-amount with respect to the share of the property belonging to him and to ask for partition and redemption in the same suit. He denied the plaintiff's right to get mesne profits till possession of the land was obtained. It is clear that the plaintiff could not be put into possession of what he claimed without a partition. The parties were not agreed whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover one-half or four-fifths of the land. The plaintiff did not offer to pay the amount tendered and agree to leave the question of the share which he was entitled to recover to be determined by Court. He had no right to require the defendant to accept the amount on the footing that his claim to recover four-fifths of the land was well founded. The provisions of the Transfer of Property Act do not, in terms, refer to a case where the mortgagor claims to split up the mortgage in consequence of the mortgagee having become the owner of a portion of the equity of redemption, or to a case where there are disputes between the parties as to the extent of the subsisting interest of the mortgagor in the equity of redemption so as to compel the mortgagee to take upon himself the task of deciding such disputes rightly for himself at the risk of losing the interest on the money due to him and becoming accountable for mesne profits. In Searles v. Sadgrove (1), it was observed: "The sum tendered must include the full amount due upon the mortgage for principal, interest and costs and the tender of such amount is not made valid by the mortgagor having a set-off for the balance." A statutory right of this character should not be extended where there are disputes between the parties of the kind that existed in this case, so as to throw on the mortgagee an undue amount of responsibility. The claim for mesne profits must, therefore, be disallowed and the memo. of objections dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed; Memo. of Objections dismissed.

UMRAO—RESPONDENT.

Central Provinces Tenancy Act (IX of 1883), s. 38 (2)—Occupancy holding—Intention to mortgage, notice of—Criterion for determining necessity for notice—Interest—Calculation—Interpretation of statutes—Object of statute.

The criterion for determining whether a landlord is entitled to notice under section 38 (2) of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act, 1883, of an intention to mortgage an occupancy holding, is the annual rent of the entire holding if the entire holding is to be transferred; if only a part of the holding is to be transferred, then only so much of the annual rent as corresponds with that part.

The provisions of a statute should not be evaded by shift or contrivance. To carry out effectually the object of a statute, it must be so construed as to defeat all attempts to do or avoid in an indirect or circuitous manner that which it has prohibited or enjoined.

The mere fact that re-payment in full of mortgage-money is contemplated within a period shorter than five years should not be looked upon as limiting the calculation of interest to that period when applying to the transaction the test prescribed by section 38 (2) of the Tenancy Act. The whole interest payable on the principal during the five years immediately succeeding the mortgage should be taken into consideration.

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Nagpur, dated the 13th May 1911, confirming that of the Munsif, Ramtek, dated the 25th January 1911.

Mr. A. C. Roy, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—On the 4th November 1886, Anand Rao, one of two joint tenants of an absolute occupancy holding, rented at Rs. 24 per annum, mortgaged it to the present appellant for a sum of Rs. 75, made up of Rs. 60 principal and Rs. 15 prospective interest. That sum was made payable by three instalments of Rs. 25 each, the first in Chet (March—April) 1887, the second in Chet (April—May) 1888 and the third in Chet (April) 1889. On each defaulted instalment, interest at 2 per cent. per mensem was to be paid. The appellant eventually foreclosed, and in July 1909 obtained possession of the share. The suit out of which this appeal arises was then brought by the respondents as landlords to recover possession on the ground that notice of the mortgage was not given to them as required by section 38 (2), Central Provinces Tenancy Act of 1883.

The appellant's case in the Courts below was, that the provision just cited is inapplicable, inasmuch as eight times the annual rent of the entire holding is Rs. 192, i.e., much in excess of any sum that could possibly have become due during the five years immediately succeeding the mortgage. The Courts below have concurred in holding that, for the purpose of testing the validity of the mortgage, half the rent, not the whole, should be looked to, inasmuch as only half was mortgaged. Both Courts considered the interest payable during the aforesaid period of five years to be in excess of Rs. 36 and the plaintiffs' claim for possession was accordingly decreed.

In this Court, the appellant's case is two-fold. In the first place, it is argued that according to the strict terms of section 38 (2), Tenancy Act of 1883, it is "the annual rent of the holding" which has to be looked to, while in section 3 (7) the term "holding" was defined as "a parcel of land held by a tenant of a landlord under one lease or one set of conditions". If this contention is allowed, nothing could be easier than to evade the provision in question. To take the simplest kind of case, a sole tenant paying Rs. 10 as annual rent might mortgage half his field to-day for Rs. 80 and the remaining half for a like sum to-morrow. He would thus have effected what is tantamount to a single mortgage for Rs. 160, which would clearly require to be preceded by a notice to the landlord. Similarly, where there are two joint tenants of a holding rented at Rs. 10, each might mortgage his undivided half for Rs. 80 with a similar result. Common sense, therefore, demands that the annual rent of the entire holding should be looked to only when some right extending over the entire holding is to be transferred. This view finds support in the dictum that to carry out effectually the object of a statute, it must be so construed as to defeat all attempts to do or avoid in an indirect or circuitous manner that which it has prohibited or enjoined: see Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, page 171 (4th Edition). I may also quote as pertinent to the subject under consideration

"In our judgment, clauses in statutes avoiding transactions or instruments are to be interpreted with reference to the purpose for which they are inserted, and when open to question are to receive a wide or a limited construction, according as the one or the other will best effectuate the purpose of the statute."

This principle that the provisions of a statute shall not be evaded by shift or contrivance was applied by Straight, C. J., in Harjas v. Radha Krishan (2), where the words "held by him as sir" in section 7 of the North-Western Provinces Rent Act, 1881, had to be construed. That section runs thus:—

"Every person who may hereafter lose or part with his proprietary rights in any mahal shall have a right of occupancy in the land held by him as sir....."

It was contended that, where a proprietor was out of possession of his sir at the time of selling his proprietary rights, having previously mortgaged it with possession to the vendee, he did not "hold" the sir. To this, the learned Chief Justice replied:—

"I think that the words 'held by him as sir' must be construed to mean land belonging to him, or to which he was entitled, as sir. In my opinion, we ought to give as liberal an interpretation as is consistent with the canons of construction to these words. Otherwise, it is easy to foresee how the door may be opened to the very mischief at which the Act aimed, by sales in future being preceded by a possessory mortgage of the land subsequently conveyed, so that the purchaser should be in possession of the sir at the date of sale, and thus be able to say that he and not the ex-proprietor held it at that time. Thus, the provisions of the statute would be easily evaded."

For these reasons, I agree with the Courts below that Rs. 96, not Rs. 192, is the sum by which the landlord's right to notice of intention to effect the mortgage of 1886 should be tested.

It is further contended on the appellant's behalf that the rate of interest primarily charged under the mortgage contract was only Rs. 15 in 2½ years or Rs. 6 per annum. To my mind, there is an obvious fallacy underlying this contention. Rupees 15 were added as prospective interest to the principal and, given punctual payment of all the three instalments, that sum only would have been recovered qua interest. But the mortgage-deed nowhere lays down that each instalment of Rs. 25 included one and the same amount as interest. The lower Appellate Court has correctly calculated that the contract is identical in effect with one to pay interest at Rs. 1-7-0 per cent. per mensem on Rs. 60, the 1st instalment including Rs. 4-5-0, the 2nd Rs. 6-14-3 and the third about Rs. 4 on account of interest. Even leaving out of consideration the enhanced rate chargeable after default, the interest payable on the principal during the five years immediately succeeding the mortgage was over Rs. 50. The mere fact that re-payment in full within 2½ years was contemplated should not be looked upon as limiting the calculation of interest to that period when applying to the transaction the test prescribed by section 38 (2) aforesaid: see Rekchand v. Krishna (3).

The appeal accordingly fails and is dismissed with costs. There is, however, an obvious clerical error in the lower Appellate Court's decree, the plaintiffs being given possession of only one-fourth instead of one-half of the holding. This will now be corrected.

grant that relief unless and until the plaintiff is willing and agrees to restore any benefits that he may have received under the transaction covered by such document.

A., the de facto guardian of a minor, mortgaged the latter's ancestral property in order to pay off a just debt contracted by the father of the minor; the minor sued to recover the mortgaged property on the ground that A. had no authority in law to mortgage his property:

Held, (1) that the estate of the minor, which came to him through his father, could not have been made liable, either directly or indirectly, in respect of claims against his father for monies lent, as during his life-time the latter did not charge the estate in his possession with the payment of those debts;

Though, under section 41 of the Specific Relief Act, a Court has ample power, on adjudging a cancellation of a mortgage debt in favour of the plaintiff, to require the latter to make such compensation to the other as justice may require, such power will not be used if it is shown that the defendant has been in possession for several years and been enjoying the produce during that time.

Second appeal from the decree of the Divisional Judge, Multan Division, dated the 24th February 1909, reversing that of the Munsif, 1st class, Multan, dated 6th April 1908, decreeing the claim.

Mr. Shah Nawaz, for the Appellant.

Bhagat Gobind Das, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The Munsif and the Divisional Judge have concurred in holding that Pahlwan, the paternal uncle of the plaintiff, had no authority, as his de facto guardian, to mortgage his property to the defendant, Asa Mal, and it is now admitted that this finding is correct in law. It is, however, urged on behalf of the defendant that the mortgage was effected in order to pay off a just debt incurred by Sultan, the father of the minor plaintiff, and that Anant Ram v. Nazir Hussain (1) and other decisions of this and other High Courts to a similar purport, are authorities for the proposition that in a case where a minor plaintiff seeks for equitable relief, such as the cancellation of a document, the Courts will not grant that relief unless and until the plaintiff is willing and agrees to restore any benefits that he may have received under the transaction covered by such document. In the present instance, the contention is that the money was lent to the late father of the plaintiff for various necessary purposes, such as the payment of Government land revenue, the improvement and repairs of the wells on the land and the like and it is urged that as the plaintiff has inherited his father's estate which had benefited by those loans, he should be compelled to restore the amount of his father's debt to the defendant before he is granted the relief. In this connection Balak Ram v. Dadu (2) is quoted.

In view of the Full Bench decision reported as Jagdip Singh v. Narain Singh (3), it is quite clear that the estate of the minor which has come to him through his father could not have been made liable, either directly or indirectly, in respect of the claims which the defendant had against Sultan for monies lent to the latter, it being admitted that Sultan himself, during his life-time, did not charge the land in his possession with the payment of that debt. In these circumstances, it follows that there was no legal liability enforceable against the minor plaintiff or against the estate in his hand to pay his father's debt. Mr. Gobind Das concedes that this is so under the authority of the Full Bench ruling, but he submits that in a case of this kind, it is not necessary for the creditor to show that the minor has received any benefit of a kind which might in some events be legally enforceable against him. He argues that under section 41 of the specific Relief Act, this Court has ample power, on adjudging a cancellation of a mortgage-debt in favour of the plaintiff, to require the latter to make any compensation to the other which justice may require. There is force in this argument, but in the present instance, we do not feel called upon to order plaintiff to make any compensation at all. In our opinion, the defendant, who has been in possession of the land for the last 12 years and been enjoying its produce during that time, has been sufficiently compensated, and nothing further can reasonably be demanded of the plaintiff as compensation to the defendant.

We accordingly accept the appeal and setting aside the decree of the Divisional

Madras Act (II of 1894), s. 17—Service Inam—Resumption by Government—'Granted or continued' by Government—Non-interference by Government with holder's rights—Whether amounts to 'continuance.'

Under section 17 of Madras Act II of 1894, Government has no right to resume land granted by the proprietor of an estate. In order that Government may have the rights of resumption, the right to the land must, in the first instance, either have emanated from Government, or the continuance of the right must have been due to an act of Government. Mere sufferance by Government, or forbearance from taking steps which it might have been open to the Government to take, will not amount to a 'continuance' by the Government of the land in respect of the office. Mere collateral expressions of opinion which were not intended to be a recognition or confirmation of the right of the holder would equally be insufficient to amount to a continuance.

Second appeals against the decrees of the Subordinate Judge of Kistna at Ellore, in A. S. Nos. 391 and 392 of 1910, presented against those of the District Munsif of Narsapur, in O. S. Nos. 423 and 432 of 1908 respectively.

JUDGMENT.

SUNDARA AIYAR, J.—This is a suit for a declaration that Government had no right to resume and assess certain lands which the Government treated as Karnam service inam and enfranchised under the provisions of section 17 of Act II of 1894. The plaintiff's case is that the lands were never Karnam service inam, and that they were jirayati lands held by his predecessors-in-title at a special rate of rent under an Agraharamdar. The District Munsif held that the lands were enjoyed as emoluments for service on favourable rents under the Agraharamdar, and that they must be held to be inam lands. On appeal, the Subordinate Judge reversed the Munsif's finding and held that it was not proved that the lands were service inam lands. Exhibit B, an extract from the Inam Register, shows that in 1787 the lands were in the possession of the Karnams on favourable rates of rent. The Agraharam was in the Zemindary of Mogalatore at that time. There is nothing to show, assuming that the lands were Karnam service inam, that they were granted by Government. Government's right to enfranchise under section 17 of Act II of 1894 exists only if the remuneration of a village office consists in the whole or any part of lands or assignments of revenue payable in respect of lands granted or continued in respect of or annexed to such office by the State. The section requires that the land or assignment of revenue in respect of the land in question must have been either 'granted or continued' by the State. The argument of the learned Government Pleader is that, though there may be nothing to show that the Government made the grant originally, the land was continued by Government. What appears from the evidence, putting it at the best in favour of Government, is that Government did not interfere with the enjoyment of the lands by the Karnams, although they granted the Agraharams within which the lands are situated in 1813 to a certain person as a whole and that in 1860, when the inam inquiry was held, Government did not interfere with the rights of the ryots when they confirmed the Agraharam to the holder of it, and gave him the inam patta. The statements in the Inam Register, Exhibit B, have been the subject of much discussion at the Bar. It states as follows: "The Karnams state that they enjoy Kattubadi inams in the village. In the accounts of Fasli 1197, 8¾ putties of land are stated to be held on a cist of 3 pagodas per putti, whilst other lands pay 6 pagodas per putti. The former appear to be held by the family of the Karnams and the shist in question is nimmabandi or half". Then follows a reference to a statement made by the Agraharamdar. Then the Register proceeds to say:—"These remarks are merely made for record". It is then stated that the Agraharamdar desired to have a title-deed for the whole Agraharam in confirmation of the grant of 1813. The Special Assistant recommends the grant of it to the Agraharamdar and he states that the request might be acceded to "as we need not interfere with the subordinate tenures, though the right of the holders to them is unquestionable and must be respected by the Agraharamdar". As we read the document, the Special Assistant was of opinion that the Karnams had a right to hold the lands they were in possession of; but he did not consider it necessary to decide that question. The observation,—"These remarks are merely made for record", makes this clear to us. We do not think it can be said that there was any confirmation or recognition by Government of the title of the Karnams. They did not consider it necessary to confirm or to recognise the right, because it was considered unnecessary to arrive at a final decision about the rights of the Karnams to the lands they claimed. The result is that in 1860 Government merely left the rights of the Karnams, if they had any, undisturbed. We cannot hold that there was any act done by Government which could be relied on by the Karnams as a recognition or confirmation of their rights. For the same reason, we think there was nothing done by Government which it could rely on as an act of recognition or confirmation by it of the rights of the Karnams.

On these facts, can it be held that the land was "granted or continued" by Government in respect of the office? Under the section, Government has no right to resume land granted by the proprietor of the estate. The principle adopted appears to be that, in order that Government may have the right of resumption, the right to the land must either have, in the first instance, emanated from Government, or the continuance of the right must have been due to an act of Government. At any rate, there must have been recognition by Government of the right which could be set up by the holder in support of his possession. Mere sufferance by Government, or forbearance from taking steps which it might have been open to the Government to take, will not, we think, amount to a 'continuance' by the Government of the land in respect of the office. Mere collateral expressions of opinion which were not intended to be a recognition or confirmation of the right of the holder would equally be insufficient to amount to a continuance. Our attention has not been drawn to any decided case or other authority in favour of the view that the continuance of the lands in the possession of the holder and non-interference of Government with his possession would be sufficient under the section. On this ground, we agree in holding that this second appeal must be dismissed with costs. In the opinion of one of us, the finding of the Subordinate Judge is defective on the question whether the lands were really Karnam's service inam lands or not. It is unnecessary to make any further observation on that matter in view of the conclusion we have arrived at.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—As I said during the course of the argument, I do not think that this Court can interfere with the finding of fact of the lower Appellate Court, that the lands in dispute are not service inam lands and, on this short ground, the second appeal must be dismissed.

As I, however, concur with my learned brother in his opinion on the question of law, on which opinion also, these second appeals fail, it is unnecessary to elaborate my reasons for holding that the Appellate Court's judgment, though it is not as full as it might be desired, should be accepted as regards the facts found.

Appeals dismissed.

Declaratory suit—Petition by Hindu widow for transfer of patta to the name of another—Suit to declare such transfer not binding on reversioner not maintainable.

A petition to the Revenue Authorities by a Hindu widow for transfer of patta in respect of her husband's lands to another person's name would not, by itself, furnish a cause of action to a reversioner for a declaration that his reversionary right cannot be affected by the widow's conduct, as such petition does not amount to the assertion of a right to the property sought to be affected.

Second appeal against the decree of the District Court of Ganjam, in A. S. No. 103 of 1909, presented against that of the District Munsif of Chicacole, in O. S. No. 30 1908.

Mr. V. Ramesam, for the Appellant.

Mr. K. V. L. Narasimham, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is a suit by the reversioners of the 1st defendant's husband. The prayer in the plaint is for a declaration that a petition put in by the 1st defendant before the Revenue Authorities for the transfer of the patta of her husband's lands to the 2nd defendant, her daughter's husband, cannot affect the plaintiff's reversionary right to succeed to the property on the 1st defendant's death. The only allegation in the plaint in support of this prayer is that the 1st defendant presented a petition to the Revenue Authorities asking for transfer of the patta standing in her name to the 2nd defendant's name. There is no allegation in the plaint that, prior to the suit, either the 1st or the 2nd defendant set up that the 2nd defendant was the illatom son-in-law of the 1st defendant. The question for decision is whether this plaint discloses a cause of action for a declaration that the plaintiff's reversionary right is unaffected by any act of the widow which would be prejudicial to their right. We are unable to find any allegation of an act done by the widow, which, prima facie, would affect the reversioner's rights. A mere petition to transfer the patta of her husband's properties to another person's name would be perfectly consistent with the intention that the person to whose name the patta is to be transferred should enjoy the property during the widow's life-time. In answer to the plaint, both the first and second defendants did set up that the 2nd defendant was the first defendant's illatom son-in-law and the lower Courts have found that they failed to prove this case. Our attention, however, has not been drawn to any evidence of an assertion, before the date of the plaint, by either the 1st or the 2nd defendant of the latter's status as an illatom son-in-law. The 2nd defendant was born in the 1st defendant's house and afterwards married her daughter. It cannot be said that the 1st defendant's act of keeping him in her house would itself amount to any assertion of right in the 2nd defendant to live there as illatom son-in-law. It is not the plaintiff's case that the 2nd defendant was introduced into the 1st defendant's house as illatom son-in-law and began to live with her in consequence of any assertion of a right to the property of the 1st defendant's husband. We must, therefore, hold that neither the plaint nor the evidence shows that, prior to the institution of the suit, there was any assertion of the right of the 2nd defendant to succeed to the property in the possession of the 1st defendant as illatom son-in law. The petition for transfer of the patta would not be evidence of any such assertion. In Second Appeal No. 601 of 1903, this Court held that an application by a widow for transfer of patta to another person's name would not, by itself, furnish a cause of action to a reversioner for a declaration that his reversionary right cannot be affected by the widow's conduct. We are, therefore, constrained to reverse the decrees of the Courts below and to dismiss the plaintiffs' suit, but, in the circumstances, the parties will bear their own costs throughout.

Agra Tenancy Act (II of 1901), s. 95--Suit between rival claimants to occupancy holding—Jurisdiction—Civil or Revenue Court.

The question of title to a tenancy arising between rival claimants to that tenancy is a question which is cognizable by a Civil Court.

Zubeda Bibi v. Sheocharan, 22 A. 83; Hamid Ali Shah v. Vilayat Ali, 22 A. 93; Bhup v. Ramlal, 33 A. 795; 8 A. L. J. 1109; 11 Ind. Cas. 263, followed.

Such a question is not a matter which can be determined under section 95 of the Tenancy Act.

Appeal under section 10 of the Letters Patent against the following judgment of Mr. Justice Chamier, dated 11th of April 1912, in Second Appeal No. 775 of 1911:—

"The plaintiffs in the present suit brought a suit against the first defendant under section 58 of the Agra Tenancy Act, alleging that he was a tenant-at-will of certain land. The first defendant replied that he was the occupancy-tenant of the land and he at once took steps by instituting another proceeding to have the Revenue Record corrected. Both cases came before the Assistant Collector together and were disposed of by one judgment. The suit under section 58 was taken on appeal to the Commissioner, who decided that it was not maintainable, because one of the present plaintiffs did not wish to eject the defendant. The result was, that in that suit no decision was given as to the rights of the first defendant. Meanwhile, the Revenue Record had been corrected in the manner suggested by the first defendant. The plaintiffs instituted the present suit in the Court of the Munsif, saying that the first defendant had taken the land from them as a tenant, that he had resisted the suit under section 58, that when doing so, he had pleaded that he was the occupancy tenant of the land, and that this amounted to a denial of the plaintiff's title with the result that the plaintiffs were entitled to treat him as a trespasser and they asked for a decree for possession against him. The Munsif decreed the claim and his decision was confirmed by the Subordinate Judge on appeal. In second appeal, it is contended on behalf of the first defendant that the suit is not maintainable. It appears to me that this contention is sound and must be accepted. The plaintiffs admit that the first defendant was their tenant. They say that he is liable to be treated as a trespasser, because he set himself up as an occupancy-tenant. Before I can hold that the defendant, who admittedly was, till recently, a tenant of some kind, has become a trespasser, I must hold that he was wrong in claiming to be an occupancy-tenant of the land. I cannot decide that he was wrong in claiming to be an occupancy-tenant without trenching on the jurisdiction of the Rent Court. The question whether a person is a tenant-at-will or an occupancy-tenant is one in respect of which a suit can be brought under the Tenancy Act and the decision is reserved exclusively for the Revenue Court. I hold that the present suit is not maintainable. I allow the appeal and dismiss the plaintiffs-respondents' suit with costs in all Courts. I have said nothing about the effect of the order that the Revenue Record should be corrected, for it is not clear whether it was made under the Revenue Act or a declaration made under the Tenancy Act."

The plaintiff appealed.

JUDGMENT.

RICHARDS, C. J.—This Letters Patent Appeal arises out of a suit in which the plaintiffs sought to recover possession of certain immoveable property, treating the defendant as a trespasser. The facts, so far as I consider them material, are as follows:—Prior to the institution of the present suit, the plaintiffs brought a suit in the Revenue Court seeking to eject the defendant as their sub-tenant. They claimed that they were the occupancy-tenants and that the defendant was their sub-tenant. The plea put in by the defendant was that he was not a sub-tenant but the occupancy-tenant of the holding. The Assistant Collector was of opinion that the defendant was, as he alleged, the occupancy-tenant. In other words, he held that the relation of landlord and tenant did not exist between the plaintiffs and the defendant. As a result of this finding, the suit for eject-ment in the Revenue Court necessarily failed. There was an appeal to the Commissioner, who held for other reasons that the ejectment suit brought by the plaintiffs failed. The plaintiffs then instituted the present suit to get possession of the property. The question, of course, upon which the success or failure of the suit depended, was whether or not the defendant was the occupancy-tenant. The learned Munsif decided in his favour. On appeal, the learned Subordinate Judge confirmed the decision of the Munsif. On second appeal to this Court, a learned Judge held that the present suit was not cognizable by the Civil Court and on that ground allowed the appeal and dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

It seems to me that the question of title to a tenancy, arising between rival claimants to that tenancy, is a question which is cognizable by a Civil Court. This has been decided, I think, in principle in the case of Zubeda Bibi v. Sheo Charan (1) in the case of Hamid Ali Shah v. Wilayat Ali (2) and in the case of Bhup v. Ram Lal (3). The learned Judge of this Court says:—"Before I can hold that the defendant, who admittedly was till recently a tenant of some kind, has become a trespasser, I must hold that he was wrong in claiming to be an occupancy-tenant of the land. I cannot decide that he was wrong in claiming to be an occupancy-tenant without trenching on the jurisdiction of the Rent Court. The question whether a person is a tenant at-will or an occupancy-tenant is one in respect of which a suit can be brought under the Tenancy Act and the decision is reserved exclusively for the Revenue Court". I cannot altogether agree with what the learned Judge has stated above. It is quite true that if a person was claiming to be an occupancy-tenant, whilst his landlord was contending that he was a mere tenant-at-will, this would be a question exclusively triable by the Revenue Court. But that is not the question in the present suit. The question in the present suit is,—"to whom does the tenancy belong; does it belong to the plaintiffs or to the defendant?" If the tenancy belongs to the plaintiffs, then they are clearly entitled to treat the defendant as a trespasser, having regard to the plea that he put forward in the Revenue Court in which he totally denied their title and claimed that he alone was the occupancy-tenant. If, on the other hand, the tenancy belongs to the defendant, it is quite clear that the plaintiffs' suit must be dismissed. It has been contended that the present suit is of the nature mentioned in section 95 of the Tenancy Act. In my opinion, it is only necessary to read the opening words of that section to see that the section deals with questions arising between landlord and tenant and that it does not in any way apply to rival claimants to any of the various classes of tenants mentioned in the Tenancy Act.

I, therefore, would allow the appeal as no other question arises.

BANERJI, J.—I am also of opinion that the jurisdiction of Civil Court was not excluded by reason of the provisions of the Tenancy Act. The suit in this case would be cognizable by the Civil Court unless it came within the purview of any of the clauses of section 95 of that Act. I adhere to the view, expressed in the case of Bhup v. Ram Lal (3), that where a dispute arises between rival claimants to a tenancy, that is not a matter which can be determined under section 95. In the present case, the dispute is between persons who claimed to be entitled to the tenancy. There is no question as between either of them and the landlord. The plaintiffs allege that the defendant is a trespasser and they claim to eject him as such. Such a suit could not be brought in the Revenue Court and the only Court which could take cognizance of it is the Civil Court. It is true that the plaintiffs sued in the Revenue Court to eject the defendant on the allegation that the defendant was their sub-tenant. Had the Revenue Court decided that question and had held that the defendant was the tenant of the holding, there might have been some difficulty in the plaintiffs' way but in this case, as pointed out by the lower Appellate Court, the Commissioner did not determine the question whether the plaintiffs were the tenants of the holding or the defendant was so. He dismissed the plaintiff's suit by reason of a defect in the frame of the suit. So that the question, "who is the tenant of the holding", remained undecided by the Revenue Court. As both parties claimed to be tenants, the question was one between rival claimants to the tenancy and it could not be taken into the Revenue Court in any of the forms of suits mentioned in section 95 of the Tenancy Act. The Civil Court, therefore, had jurisdiction to hear the case. On the merits, that Court found in favour of the plaintiffs. They were, therefore, entitled to the decree which was granted by the Courts below and this appeal must prevail.

BY THE COURT.—The order of the Court is that we allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the learned Judge of this Court, and restore the decree of the lower Appellate Court with costs of both hearings in this Court.

JUDGMENT.—The instances on the record, the entry in the Riwaj-i-am and Volume VI of Customary Law drawn up at the 1880-86 Settlement, page 10, and the entry in the Riwaj-i-am drawn up at the recent Settlement, with the instances given in the Volume of Customary Law prepared by Mr. Kitchen for the Attock District, of which the Attock Tahsil now forms part, page 15, Volume XXIV, make it quite clear that the case has been rightly decided by the lower Courts which have come to a concurrent finding. The plaintiffs, who are related to the deceased in the 4th degree, are not entitled to succeed in preference to the defendants, who are the daughters of the deceased, the parties being Pathans of the Chhach tract of the Attock District. The learned Pleader for the appellants admitted that on the record he could not hope to contest the concurrent finding of the lower Courts. Master and servant—Liability of servant for wrong done on behalf of master.

Inasmuch as the law holds the doer of a wrong liable for it, a wrong-doer cannot escape liability on the ground that he was a servant acting for the benefit of his master.

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Bhandara, dated the 4th November 1911, confirming that of the Subordinate Judge, Bhandara, dated the 20th July 1911.

JUDGMENT.—The only point pressed in this second appeal is that the defendant-appellant Kodu should not have been mulcted in costs. It is found, however, by the lower Appellate Court that Kodu took an active part in dispossessing the plaintiff-respondent and so giving rise to this suit which was brought to eject Kodu and his master as trespassers. The law seems to be clear that whoever commits a wrong will be held liable for it himself and cannot be excused on the ground that he was a servant acting for the benefit of his master. Thus in Stephens v. Elwall (1), Lord Ellenborough, C. J., and Le Blanc, J., held that a servant may be charged in trover, although the act of conversion be done by him for the benefit of his master. The learned Chief Justice said:—

"A person is guilty of a conversion who intermeddles with my property and disposes of it, and it is no answer that he acted under authority from another who had himself no authority to dispose of it. And the Court is governed by the principle of law, and not by the hardship of any particular case. For what can be more hard than the common case in trespass, where a servant has done some act in assertion of his master's right, that he shall be liable, not only jointly with his master, but if his master cannot satisfy it, for every penny of the whole damage; and his person also shall be liable for it; and what is still more, that he shall not recover contribution ?"

The decision in Bennett v. Bayes(2) proceeds upon the same ground, though it was therein laid down that a servant acting as a mere conduit pipe for communicating an authority from his master to another person might not render himself liable for damage resulting from the act done under that authority.

The lower Appellate Court's order mulcting Kodu jointly with his master in costs is perfectly legal. This appeal is accordingly dismissed without notice to the respondent.

As declaratory suits are an exceptional form of litigation, the power conferred by section 42 to institute such suits ought not to be extended beyond what the law absolutely requires.

Second appeal from the order of the Commissioner, Lahore Division, dated 22nd July 1880.

ORDER OF REFERENCE.

SMYTH AND ELSMIE, JJ., (11th May 1882.)—The first point in appeal is that the plaintiffs are not the immediate reversioners and have, therefore, no right to sue. The first Court held that it was unnecessary to consider whether the plaintiffs were immedaite reversioners or not as the point was unimportant with reference to the decision passed at the same time in another case which had been brought by Musammat Tara Devi, one of the widows of the deceased, against the same defendant, Barkat Ram, in which it was held by the Court that Barkat Ram was not the adopted son of Dhari Mal. The decision in that case has now been set aside by the Court in appeal in accordance with a compromise come to by the parties, and it becomes, therefore, necessary in the present case to decide whether the plaintiffs were entitled to bring the present suit.

The facts are these:—

Dhari Mal died leaving two widows, a daughter, Ananti, by one of the widows, and a grandson, Barkat Ram, the son of Anunti. Barkat Ram set up a title to succeed to Dhari Mal's estate on the gronnd that he had been adopted by Dhari Mal. The plaintiffs, who are the brother's sons of Dhari Mal, brought the present suit against Barkat Ram to obtain a declaration that Barkat Ram was not the adopted son of Dhari Mal. One of the pleas taken for Barkat Ram was that the plaintiffs were not entitled to bring the suit, because (1) in the presence of Dhari Mal's daughter, they were not the immediate reversioners and (2) in the presence of Dhari Mal's daughter's son, Barkat Ram, who, if not adopted by the deceased, would succeed to the property as full proprietor on his mother's death, the plaintiffs were not reversioners at all.

The right of the daughter and of her son to succeed to the property after the death of the widows has not been inquired into by the lower Courts. It is contended by Mr. Higgins that the point is not one which it was necessary to consider in the present case, because, even assuming that the allegation of the defendant as to the right of his mother as the daughter of the deceased, and of himself as the daughter's son to succeed to the property are correct, the plaintiffs would still be entitled to bring this suit for the purpose of contesting the status of the defendant as adopted son of the deceased. As regards the daughter, Mr. Higgins alleges that she is colluding with the defendant, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs as the next reversioners not colluding are entitled to sue and in support of this contention, he relies on cases reported as Raghu Nath v. Thakuri (1) and Rani Anund Kunwar v. The Court of Wards on behalf of Chandra Shikhar (2). He refers also to cases decided by this Court and reported as Sikandar Khan v. Bahadar Khan (3), Mehtab Khan v. Mehtab Bibi (4) and Gulam Haidar v. Sikandar Khan (5). As regards the daughter's son, Barkat Ram, Mr. Higgins urges that his position in the present case is not that of daughter's son but that of alleged adopted son of the deceased and that for the decision of the question of the plaintiff's right to bring the present suit, only the latter position of the defendant can be regarded; and in support of that view, he relies on the case reported as Jindkaur v. Majlis Rai (6).

With regard to the daughter; we find no evidence on the record that she is acting in collusion with the defendant, and we consider that the case would, under any circumstances, have to go back for inquiry and decision on that point. As regards the question of the plaintiff's right to bring this suit in presence of a daughter's son, if we assume as alleged by the defendant, that he, if not adopted by the deceased, would be entitled to succeed upon his mother's death to all the property of the deceased as full proprietor, we think that it should be answered in the negative. As, however, the decision cited by Mr. Higgins, Jindkaur v. Majlis Rai (6), is the other way, we consider that the question should be referred to a Full Bench for a ruling. The question which we refer, is, whether the plaintiffs, the nephews of Dhari Mal, are entitled to bring a suit against the defendant to contest his adoption by Dhari Mal, in view of the fact that the defendant, even if held not to be the adopted son of Dhari Mal, is, as the son of Dhari Mal's daughter, entitled (as we must assume that he is for the purpose of the present reference) to succeed to Dhari Mal's estate as full proprietor on the death of his (defendant's) mother.

Mr. K. P. Roy, for the Appellant.

Mr. Higgins, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT OF THE FULL BENCH.

ELSMIE, J.—The circumstances under which this reference was made are set out at length in the order of Division Bench dated 11th May last. The nephews of one Dhari Mal, deceased, sued to set aside or to obtain a decree declaring the alleged adoption by Dhari Mal of his daughter's son, Barkat Ram, to be invalid. As Dahri Mal had left two widows, a daughter and a daughter's son, all of whom were entitled to succeed to the property before the nephews, it was contended that the plaintiff's suit would not lie. But Mr. Higgins urged that, even assuming that the plaintiffs were not immediate reversioners, they were nevertheless entitled to bring this suit for the purpose of contesting the status of the alleged adopted son, and further that as the daughter was colluding with defendant, the plaintiffs could come in as the next non-colluding reversioners. Mr. Higgins merely relied on the cases reported as Rani Anand Kunwar v. The Court of Wards on behalf of Chandra Shikhar (2) and Jindkaur v. Majlis Rai (6).

The Division Bench, after referring to the file and ascertaining that it contained no evidence that the daughter was acting in collusion with the defendant, decided that the following question from which, as I understand it, the alleged collusion by the daughter is excluded, should be laid before the Full Bench.—

"Whether the plaintiffs, the nephews of Dhari Mal, are entitled to bring a suit against the defendant, to contest his adoption by Dhari Mal, in view of the fact that the defendant, even if held not to be the adopted son of Dhari Mal, is, as the son of Dhari Mal's daughter, entitled, as we must assume that he is for the purpose of the present reference, to succeed to Dhari Mal's estate as full proprietor on the death of his (defendant's) mother ?"

The Division Bench, while expressing its opinion that the question should be answered in the negative, felt bound to make the reference to the Full Bench, because the case of Jindkaur v. Majlis Rai (6) appeared to lay down the opposite view without express qualification. In that case, a widow had adopted her daughter's son to be the son of her deceased husband and it was contended that the plaintiff, who was not an heir presumptive or indeed an heir at all, could not bring a suit to contest the adoption. The Court held, however, that there was no doubt that the suit would lie, but the Court also pointed out that the plaintiff was the nearest non-colluding heir and it seems open to doubt whether in the absence of proved collusion, the Judges would have held that the suit was maintainable. However that may be, the case was decided before the Specific Relief Act come into force, and I presume that the question now before us must be answered with reference to section 42 of that Act. The words of the section, in so far as they are material at present, are the following: "Any person, entitled to any legal character or to any right as to any property, may institute a suit against any person denying or interested to deny his title to such character or right, and the Court may, in its discretion, make therein a declaration that he is so entitled."

Now, the plaintiffs in the present case are persons whose interest in Dhari Mal's estate is allowed, for the purpose of this reference to be remote, future and contingent. They are not the presumptive heirs or men having a vested remainder whose estates are ready to come into possession at any moment when the existing estate may happen to determine. It, perhaps, might be doubted whether their position as contingent remainder-men and possible reversioners on the failure of heirs to the daughter and her son, gives them a "legal character or a right to" Dhari Mal's property which would permit them to bring this suit. I observe that while the illustration of section 42 clearly contemplates a suit of the present nature, when brought by a presumptive heir, there is no illustration which appears to cover the facts in the present case. I should, therefore, be inclined to say, with reference to section 42 of the Specific Relief Act, that it is doubtful whether that section was intended to apply to such a suit brought by persons in the position of the present plaintiffs and that, as the granting of decrees under that section, is entirely discretionary, it cannot be held that plaintiffs are "entitled" to maintain the action. But, however that may be, and assuming for the sake of argument that the plaintiffs are prima facie entitled to a "legal character" or right in regard to property within the meaning of the section, the question then arises whether the defendant has denied or is "interested to deny" the plaintiffs' title to such character or right. Here no actual denial is alleged, and I fail to see that the defendant is "interested to deny" the title. Under the terms of the reference, the defendant, as daughter's son, has a right to succeed to the property after widows and the daughter and before the plaintiffs. As adopted son, he would succeed before the widows and daughter, but the fact of his adoption would not have the effect of putting him or any other existing person in a more favourable position in regard to the property than he is now, so as to injure the plaintiffs' chances of succession. If it be said that defendant may die before his mother and may, therefore, as daughter's son never take the property at all, whereas if he be an adopted son, his personal heirs would succeed on his death whenever it might occur, I do not think that we can fairly regard him, the defendant, as interested, on behalf of his possible heirs, to deny plaintiff's title as a contingent reversioner. Moreover, I have not been able to find any authority for supposing that if defendant takes the property as adopted son, his heirs would be other than those who would be his heirs, if he succeeded as daughter's son. In the absence of lineal descendants, the plaintiffs apparently would be the heirs in any case, and I know of no authority for holding that the lineal heirs of a daughter's son would not represent their father and take the property before male collaterls such as the plaintiffs. In the case put in illustration of section 42, Specific Relief Act, it is clear that a suit would lie against a stranger who by his position as adopted son deprives the person presumptively entitled to possession of the property on the death of the widow of his right to immediate succession and places him at least one degree further off from the inheritance. In the present case, whether defendant is an adopted son or not, the plaintiffs have no right to come in until after defendant and his lineal heirs. Under this view, therefore, I think the question referred for our decision should be answered in the negative.

I have referred to the various authorities to which our attention was drawn at the hearing. All of them relate to cases which arise prior to the date on which the Specific Relief Act came into force. The latest decision on an analogous point appears to be that of the Privy Council in the case reported as Rani Anund Kunwar v. The Court of Wards on behalf of Chandra Shikhar (2), where it was held, in conformity with previous rulings, that such a suit must, as a general rule, be brought by the presumptive reversionary heir. If it should be held that we are not at liberty to interpret the meaning of the Specific Relief Act without reference to the rulings of the Privy Council on the former law relating to declaratory decrees, then, I think, the dictum which I have just quoted would be a sufficient authority to enable us to reply negatively to the present reference from which, as I have before explained, I take the element of alleged collusion to have been excluded. The general rule, as already stated, was sufficient to enable their Lordships in the Privy Council to dispose of the case before them, because the plaintiff had not come into Court alleging that any acts or omissions by way of collusions or otherwise, on the part of the nearer reversioners, had given him a right to sue. It is true that their Lordships state their opinion that a suit of this nature may be brought by a contingent reversionary heir under certain circumstances such as when the nearest reversionary heir refuses to institute proceedings or he has precluded himself by his own act or conduct from suing or has colluded with the next heir or concurred in the act alleged to be wrongful. But the expression of this opinion does not appear to have been strictly necessary to the decision of the case, as it had not been alleged that any of these circumstances had arisen in the plaintiffs' favour and it would probably have been sufficient to say that there had been no attempt to show why plaintiffs' case should not be governed by the general rule that such a suit could only be maintained by the nearest reversioner. Moreover, the suit which came before their Lordships on appeal had been instituted in India on the 28th August 1870 i.e., many years before the passing of the Specific Relief Act in 1877, and their Lordships decided it with reference to the former law and to precedents [see Bhikaji Apaji v. Jaggan Nath Vithal (7) and Kooer Gulab Singh v. Rao Kuran Singh (8)] of date prior to that year. But, even if we take this case as our guide in disposing of the present reference, I think we should say, on the facts stated in the question, that the plaintiffs are certainly not entitled to maintain the present suit and that the Courts to place the matter on the narrowest ground should, at all events, refuse to grant a declaratory decree.

SMYTH, J.—The latest ruling on the subject of this reference is that by the Privy Council quoted by my learned colleague [Rani Anund Kunwar v. The Court of Wards on behalf of Chandra Shikhar (2)]. I think it is desirable to refer to it somewhat more at length. It was in a suit brought by a contingent reversionary heir to contest an adoption made by a Hindu widow of a son to her deceased husband, and upon the question whether the contingent reversionary interest which the plaintiff had was sufficient to enable him to maintain the action, their Lordships were of opinion that "although a suit of this nature may be brought by a contingent reversionary heir, yet that, as a general rule, it must be brought by the presumptive reversionary heir, that is to say, by the person who would succeed if the widow were to die at that moment. They are also of opinion that such a suit may be brought by a more distant reversioner if those nearer in succession are in collusion with the widow or have precluded themselves from interfering. They consider that the rule laid down in Bhikaji Apaji v. Jaggan Nath Vithal (7) is correct. It cannot be the law that any one who may have a possibility of succeeding on the death of the widow can maintain a suit of the present nature, for, if so, the right to sue would belong to every one in the line of succession, however remote. The right to sue must in their Lordships' opinion be limited. If the nearest reversionary heir refuses, without sufficient cause, to institute proceedings, or if he has precluded himself by his own act or conduct from suing or has colluded with the widow, or concurred in the act alleged to be wrongful, the next presumable reversioner would be entitled to sue. See Koer Gulab Singh v. Rao Kuran Singh (8). In such a case, upon a plaint stating the circumstances under which the more distant reversionary heir claims to sue, the Court must exercise a judicial discretion in determining whether the remote reversioner is entitled to sue and would probably require the nearer reversioner to be made a party to the suit."

(7) 10 B. H. C. R. 351.

Now, upon the facts as stated in the order of reference to the Full Bench, and which, for the purpose of disposing of the reference, we must assume to be true, the plaintiffs in the present case are not the nearest reversioners. Even if we set aside the alleged adoption of Barkat Ram as not yet proved, if the widows were to die, the plaintiffs would not be entitled to succeed to the property. Dhari Mal's daughter, Anunti, would first succeed for life, and after her, her son, Barkat Ram, would succeed as full proprietor. It would only be on the death of Barkat Ram without leaving a widow or issue that the plaintiffs would succeed to the property and their interest in the property is thus very remote and merely contingent.

At the same time, I think their interest in the property is of such a nature as would enable them to maintain the suit under section 42, Act I of 1877, if they could show that the act, of which they complain, was one which wrongfully affected their interest in the property, and that it was done in collusion with the nearer reversioners or that the nearer reversioners were precluded by their conduct from suing; or if they could show that the defendant, "denied or was interested to deny" their reversionary title to the property within the meaning of the above section, and was acting in collusion with the nearer reversioners. But nothing of this kind is shown to be the case here. The act of which the plaintiffs complain is the setting up of a title in Barkat Ram as adopted son of Dhari Mal, and the suit is brought for a declaration that Barkat Ram is not such adopted son. But taking, as we must, for the purpose of this decision the rule of succession to Dhari Mal's property to be correctly stated in the order of reference, it is not clear how the plaintiffs' interest in the property is injuriously affected by the title of adopted son set up by Barkat Ram. Whether adopted or not, he is in either case entitled to succeed to the property as full owner before the plaintiffs. If adopted, he is entitled to the present possession of the property as the son of the deceased; if not adopted, he cannot claim to be put in possession till after the death of the two widows and of his mother. If he got present possession as adopted son and died without leaving a widow or issue of his own, the property would go to the plaintiffs; and from that point of view, his adoption is rather favourable than otherwise to the plaintiffs' interest; for if he was not adopted, and if he succeeded to the property, the property would pass on his death to his own heirs and not to the heir of Dhari Mal, and the plaintiffs in that event might be excluded altogether from the succession. Nor does the defendant by setting up his title as adopted son deny the title or character of the plaintiffs as the reversionary heirs, nor is it clear how he is interested to deny such title or character. As already stated, the defendant, whether as adopted son of Dhari Mal or as son of Dhari Mal's daughter, would be entitled to succeed before the plaintiffs, and accordingly he has no object in denying nor does he deny that plaintiffs are entitled to succeed as reversioners in the event of his dying without leaving a widow or descendants.

There is another point of view from which the question now before us may be considered. The question whether a Court will entertain a suit for a declaratory decree is one for the exercise of judicial discretion. In the case already cited, the Privy Council remarked that "upon a plaint stating the circumstances under which the more distant reversionary heir claims to sue, the Court must exercise a judicial discretion in determining whether the remote reversioner is entitled to sue." And see also the case of Rani Brohmomoyee v. Raja Anund Lall Roy (9). Under the circumstances of the case before us, as stated in order of reference, I think a Court would exercise its discretion wisely if it refused permission to the plaintiffs to sue. For this is not a case where the property has been alienated or wasted, and, as already stated, it is not apparent how the plaintiffs' interest in the property is injuriously affected by the title (even assuming it to be false) set up by Barkat Ram. The adoption here set up is not that of a stranger; if it had been so, no doubt the plaintiffs' interests might have been injuriously affected. It is the adoption of a person who was already in the line of heirs and who, if he lived long enough, would have been entitled to succeed to the property as an heir before the plaintiffs. It may be that one of the widows and the boy's mother are acting in collusion for the purpose of conferring on the boy a right to the present possession of the property, but if any one has reason to complain of this, it is the other widow and she does not now complain.

The answer I would give to the question referred for our decision is that the suit is not maintainable under section 42, Act I of 1877.

RATTIGAN, J.—The question referred to us by the reference order assumes that between the plaintiff and the estate of deceased Dhari Mal, there are four intervening lives, namely, those of the two widows of Dhari Mal, his daughter and daughter's son, who also claims to be the adopted son of Dhari Mal. This being so, the "legal character" which the plaintiff may be said to possess, on the supposition that there had been no valid adoption of the daughter's son, is that of possible contingent reversioner who would have a right of succession to the estate of Dhari Mal in three possible events, e. g.,

(a) if he survived the widows and if the daughter and daughter's son both predeceased them, the former leaving no other issue entitled to inherit by Hindu Law;

(b) if having succeeded to the widows, the daughter outlived her son and then died in the plaintiff's life-time, leaving no other descendants of her own, entitled to inherit by Hindu Law;

(c) if the daughter's son, having succeeded either the widows of Dhari Mal or his own mother, subsequently died in the plaintiff's life-time without direct or collateral heirs of his own, and without having validly alienated the estate.

Now, to entitle the plaintiff to maintain a declaratory suit under section 42 of Act I of 1877, it must be shown that the plaintiff's "legal character" or his "right to any property" has been denied by the defendants, or, if not denied, that the defendants are at least "interested to deny" one or the other. Assuming, however, the plaintiff's "legal character" and his right to succeed to Dhari Mal's estate to be as described above, and no other character or right can be assigned to him under the reference order, it is difficult to see how the defendants can be said to be "interested to deny" the one or the other, and it is not alleged that they have in point of fact denied either his character of a contingent reversioner or his right of succession subject to the limitation above stated. For the daughter's son, by setting up a title by adoption, at most merely expedites the devolution of Dhari Mal's estate into his own hands, but he does not thereby necessarily deny, nor is it to his interest to deny the plaintiff's legal character to succeed to the estate in the events above enumerated because in any case he would have a prior right of inheritance to the plaintiff. And, inasmuch as it is apparent from the reference order that the widows and the daughter admit the title thus set up, it may be taken that they are willing to relinquish their own prior title in favour of the daughter's son, which it is quite competent for them to do [Kamessur Pershad v. Kadir Khan (10); Protap Chander Roy v. Sreemuty Joy Monee Debee (11), Mohunt Kishen Geer v. Busgeet Roy (12)]. So that even if the daughter's son had no valid claims to the status of an adopted son of Dhari Mal, the surrender of the estate by the intervening heirs in his favour, he being the next reversionary heir, would as effectually cut off the plaintiff's reversionary rights as if the alleged adoption had really taken place (for he would then take as full owner and succession would pass to this heir, Mayne's Hindu Law, section 479). The only advantage the title by adoption would convey to the daughter's son, as far as the plaintiff is concerned, would be a superior right of collateral to the plaintiff himself than he would possess as the daughter's son of Dhari Mal. But that circumstance would not entitle the plaintiff to maintain a declaratory suit under section 42, Act I of 1877.

BARKAT RAM v. JAGAT RAM.

In the case reported in Rani Anund Kunwar v. The Court of Wards on behalf of Chandra Shikhar (2), the adoption was of a stranger, whose introduction into the new family might very seriouly prejudice the reversioners in that family and in a case of that kind, as their Lordships of the Privy Council pointed out, a more distant reversioner might bring a suit to challenge the adoption, if those nearer in succession were either in collusion with the widow or had concurred in the act alleged to be wrongful. The reason for permitting a distant reversioner to bring a suit under such circumstances is obvious and it is quite reasonable also that he should not be deprived of that right by the consent or collusion of the nearer heirs because, although the latter might legally relinquish their own right of succession, they could not vest that right in another to the prejudice of the proper heir. The personal law of the parties would then determine who was to be regarded as the proper heir, and the devolution of the estate would pass to him. But the peculiarity of the present case is that the alleged adopted son is himself the person who would be the next heir if the widow and the immediate reversionary heir, (his own mother), who concurred in his title, were excluded. So that by admitting this person into immediate possession, the intervening heirs only relinquished their own prior rights but they do not prejudicially affect the plaintiff's legal status or his rights to any property. It is wholly immaterial, therefore, by what title the daughter's son claims to have succeeded, for whether he has done so as daughter's son with the consent of the widows and his own mother, or as adopted son, he has not in either veiw of the case denied by that act the plaintiff's legal character as a contingent reversioner next after himself, nor the ultimate right of succession which he was entitled to claim under the Hindu Law.

Declaratory suits are an exceptional form of litigation, and it is not desirable that the power to institute such suits, conferred by section 42 of the Specific Relief Act, should be extended beyond what the law absolutely requires. In the present case, I do not think the plaintiff brings himself within the purview of the section, which, in my opinion, should be interpreted strictly, and I accordingly concur in the proposed answer to the reference.

BARKLEY, J.—I concur in answering the question referred to the Full Bench in the negative. It being assumed in the reference that the daughter's son is entitled to succeed as full proprietor to Dhari Mal's estate, (immediately after his own mother's interest, which will arise upon the death of the widows, comes to an end), it appears to me extremely doubtful whether the plaintiff can be said to be entitled either to any legal character, or to any right as to Dhari Mal's property, within the meaning of section 42 of the Specific Relief Act. He has rather the mere possibility of becoming so entitled on the happening of one of the three events described in Mr. Justice Rattigan's judgment, which I have had the advantage of perusing. If there were no daughter's son, the plaintiff might be described as the persumptively entitled to possess property if he survived the widows and the daughter, as in that case all the interests, prior to his own, would be restricted interests, and he would then be the nearest reversioner who could take an absolute estate. But it is not easy to see how he can be so described when there is a daughter's son who, if he survived, would take an absolute estate, to which the plaintiff would have a bare possibility of succeeding only in case the daughter's son died before him, leaving no heirs, direct or collateral, of his own, and not having alienated the estate. While I am not prepared to go the length of holding, with a Division Bench of the Calcutta Court, in a case reported as Greeman Singh v. Wahari Lall Singh (13), that section 42 of the Specific Relief Act "refers only to existing and vested rights, and not to contingent rights," in the case put in illustration (c) of the person presumptively entitled to possess the property, if he survives a Hindu widow, is not a case of a vested right. I think the test of whether a reversionary heir can be said to be entitled either to any legal character, or to any right to property is furnished by the question whether he would succeed if all restricted estates prior to his own were at once to terminate; and I observe that the cases cited with approval by the Judicial Committee of Privy Council in Rani Anund Kunwar v. The Court of Wards on behalf of Chandra Shikhar (2), in which a person who was not the nearest reversioner was held entitled to sue, are both cases in which the reversioner nearer than the plaintiff was entitled only to a restricted estate. The case in Bhikaji Apaji v. Jaggan Nath Vithal (7) was one in which the nearest reversioner, a daughter, had resigned her rights in the particular property in the plaintiff's favour, and that in Koer Gulab Singh v. Rao Kuran Singh (8) was one in which the nearest reversioner was the mother of the last male owner, and was alleged to have concurred in the widow's alienation. But, supposing that the plaintiff has a title to any legal character or to any right to the property left by Dhari Mal, his suit must be against "some person denying or interested to deny his title to such character or right," and I agree with my learned colleagues that the defendant, who is not alleged to deny the plaintiff's title to succeed next after him and his heirs, is not a person interested to deny such title. The adoption, which the defendant alleges would merely accelerate his own estate, and it would, at the same time, make the plaintiff one of his collateral heirs, who would succeed if he died leaving no lineal heirs.

Even if the suit could be maintained by the plaintiff against the defendant, I also agree in considering the case to be one in which it would be a proper exercise of the discretion given by section 42 for the Court to refuse to grant a declaratory decree on account of the remoteness of the possibility of the plaintiff's interests being affected.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 1237 OF 1909.

July 16, 1912.

PALLI VEETIL ABU BAKER—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Muhammadan Law—Mosque—Right to worship—Religious institution—Right to offer prayers—Right to recite Koran.

Every Muhammadan worshipper has the right both to offer prayers and to recite the Koran as a part of his right of worship in a mosque.

There is nothing to prevent a worshipper from receiving at the mosque money offered to him there by others or from distributing sweetmeats. But no worshipper can claim to use the mosque as of right for such purposes.

Second appeal against the decree of the District Court of South Malabar, in A. S. No. 54 of 1909, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif of Calicut, in O. S. No. 531 of 1907.

Mr. J. C. Rosario, for the Appellant.

Mr. C. V. Anantakrishna Iyer, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

SUNDARA AIYAR, J.—The plaintiff in this suit sought a declaration of his right to perform certain ceremonies in the Muchanti Mosque in Calicut and to restrain the defendant from preventing him in any way from performing them. He also asked for damages alleged to have been sustained by him in consequence of an obstruction caused by the defendant. Now, the plaint states in paragraph 3 (4) that the plaintiff was in the habit of offering prayers and reciting the Koran in the mosque for 5 days consecutively from the 20th to the 24th in the month of Shaban and distributing sweetmeats, kapu, etc., that were brought for the said purpose by the persons who went there.

MUTHALA KANDI v. PALLI VEETIL ABU BAKER.

The prayer in the plaint is that the defendant should be restrained from preventing the plaintiff from performing the usual ceremonies such as reciting the Koran, etc. Reading the prayer with paragraph 3 (4) of the plaint, it is probable that the plaintiff wished to obtain an injunction restraining the defendant from interfering with the performance of any part of the ceremonies set out in paragraph 3 (4) including the distribution of sweetmeats, kapu, etc., brought by other persons on the occasion of his offering prayers and reciting the Koran. The defendant denied altogether the plaintiff's right to recite the Koran in the mosque and alleged that that was not one of the rights which the members of the congregation of the mosque had as a part of their right of worship.

Both the lower Courts have found that any Muhammadan worshipper has the right both to offer prayers and to recite the Koran as a part of his right of worship in the mosque. The Courts do not base this finding on any special right which the plaintiff has in consequence of the reputed sanctity of his father or any special right possessed by the plaintiff in connection with the celebration of the anniversary of his father. The finding proceeds on the ground that as the plaintiff as a worshipper had the right to offer prayers and to recite the Koran, he was entitled to do so on the days mentioned in the plaint, namely, from the 24th to 28th of Shaban. There is no reason for not accepting the lower Courts' finding as so understood. The lower Courts do not find that the plaintiff was entitled, as of right, to use the mosque either for collecting subscriptions or for distributing sweetmeats. It may be that there is nothing to prevent a worshipper from receiving at the mosque money offered to him there by others. But it is a very different thing to say that the plaintiff can claim to use the mosque as of right for the purpose of collecting subscriptions or distributing sweetmeats. A claim as of right to use the mosque for such purposes appears prima facie to be an extraordinary one. As the plaintiff does not, in his prayer, in terms ask, except by the use of the word et cetra, for any right beyond offering prayers and reciting the Koran and as neither of the Courts below has found that he has the right to use the mosque for collecting subscriptions or distributing sweetmeats, the injunction as framed in the decree of the lower Court must be regarded as vague.

It is necessary to make one further observation with reference to the prayer in the plaint and the phraseology of the injunction. The plaintiff asks for an injunction restraining the defendant from interfering with the plaintiff's performance of ceremonies including the offering of prayers and the recital of the Koran. If he meant that he had any special right to celebrate a ceremony in connection with the anniversary of his father, the findings of fact arrived at by the lower Courts do not support any such pretension. It is at least doubtful whether the lower Courts intended to recognize any such special right. It is necessary to modify the terms of the injunction so as to make it clear that the plaintiff's claim can be supported only on the rights possessed by him as an ordinary worshipper to offer prayers and recite the Koran on any day and at any time he chooses. His right must, of course, be subject to similar rights possessed by other members of the community. It is quite clear that the plaintiff's exercise of his right cannot be carried out in such a manner as to cause disturbance to other persons engaged in worship. If the defendant has any rights as the Mulla to enforce the exercise by the plaintiff of his right in such a manner as not to disturb others, the declaration in favour of the plaintiff of his right to offer prayers and to recite the Koran cannot affect the right of management or of discipline.

The decree must, therefore, be modified by its being declared that the plaintiff is entitled to offer prayers and to read the Koran in the Muchanti mosque as a worshipper. The injunction must be that the defendant be restrained from preventing the plaintiff's exercise of the above rights as an ordinary worshipper without prejudice to any rights that the defendant may have as Mulla to require the plaintiff to exercise his right without infringing the rights of other persons. In the circumstances, each side will bear their own costs throughout.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—I was at first inclined to reverse the judgment of the lower Courts and dismiss the suit wholly, because the defendant did not deny the plaintiff's right to recite the prayers in the mosque and because the plaintiff based his right to recite the Koran, not as an ordinary worshipper, but as part of the annual ceremony which he was entitled to perform for 5 or 6 days in connection with his father's death. It appears from the evidence of 4th plaintiff's witness that about 200 persons used to congregate in the mosque on such occasions and that this assembled crowd used to bring offerings and subscriptions and they used to have these offerings distributed among the crowd collected. Surely, the plaintiff cannot be allowed to have the ceremonies in connection with his deceased father's anniversary performed in the mosque? However, as defendant went too far in denying the right of even ordinary worshippers to recite the Koran in the mosque without his permission, it is better that an injunction do issue in the terms now made very clear in the judgment of my learned brother.

Injunction issued.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908*), s.* 104 *(1)(a), O. XXXII, r.* 7*, Sch. II, cls.* 8 and 15 *(1) (a)—Reference for minor to arbitration—Superseding arbitration—Appeal—Revision.*

Unless an award is superseded under Schedule II, para. 8 of the Civil Procedure Code, section 104 (1) (a) bars an appeal; but if the Court has, in superseding an award, adopted a procedure not authorised by law, and there is no other remedy available, the Chief Court will interfere on revision.

Hira v. Dina, 37 P. R. 1895, followed.

Where matters in dispute are referred to arbitration through the Court, and an arbitrator is deliberately selected, a plea that the reference was bad by reason of the parties being minors and sanction of the Court not having been granted under Order XXXII, rule 7 of the Code, has no force.

Petition, under section 70 (a) of Act XVIII of 1884 as amended by Act XXV of 1899, for revision of the order of the District Judge, Ferozepore, dated 27th July 1911, setting aside the appointment of an arbitrator.

Mr. Nand Lal, for the Petitioners.

Rai Sahib Pundit Sheo Narain, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—I concur with Mr. Justice Shah Din, who issued notice, in the opinion that no appeal under section 104 (1) (a) of the Code of Civil Procedure lies, the arbitration not having been superseded under Schedule II, clause 8 of the Code, and I also concur in the opinion that revision lies, the proceedings of the Court below in superseding the arbitration having been materially irregular. The arbitrator had not delivered an award and the proceeding held by the Court below to indicate prejudice was preliminary. The provisions of the Code for dealing with awards are, therefore, inapplicable and the learned Pleader for the respondents has been unable to cite any authority for the procedure adopted by the Court below. Schedule II, clause 15 (1) (a), cited by him, is limited to awards. Here there was no award. The plea that the reference to arbitration was bad by reason of the parties being minors and sanction of the Court not having been granted under Order XXXII, rule 7, has apparently no force, even if the rule applies to references to arbitration, the submission to arbitration having been through the Court and the arbitrator having been delibrately selected.

Hira v. Dina (1) is authority for interference on the revisional side when the Court below has adopted procedure not prescribed by the law and no other remedy is available.

The application is allowed and the order of the 27th July 1911, setting aside the appointment of L. Rama Nand as arbitrator, is set aside with costs. Counsel's fees fifty rupees.

Application allowed.

Petition, under section 115 of Act V of 1908, praying the High Court to revise the order of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Tuticorin dated 24th January 1910 in M. P. No. 452 of 1909, in O. S. No. 248 of 1909, on the file of the Court of the District Munsif, Tuticorin.

Mr. K. Srinivasa Iyengar, for the Petitioner.

Mr. C. V. Ananthakrishna Iyer, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The Subordinate Judge decided that the petitioners are not entitled to rateable distribution under section 73, Code of Civil Procedure, as they did not apply to execute their decrees before the assets were realized by the Court, though they had attached the properties sold before judgment. The contention of the petitioners is that their subsequent application relates back to the attachment.

Assuming the Subordinate Judge is wrong in his decision on this question of law, the High Court will not interfere with his decision; further, the petitioners have their remedy by suit.

Revision dismissed.

Arbitration, agreement to refer to—Arbitrators appointed but unwilling to act—Reference to other arbitrators—Award inoperative—Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), s. 21—When bars suit.

Certain matters in dispute were referred to three named arbitrators, two of whom were unwilling to act: the agreement to refer to arbitration contained no provision to appoint arbitrators in the room of those unwilling to act:

Held, that the agreement was inoperarive and of no effect.

Appeal against the decree of the District Court of Kurnool, in O. S. No. 31 of 1907.

Dr. S. Swaminadhan and Mr. S. Ranganadha Iyer, for the Appellant.

Mr. J. Adam, for Mr. J. C. Adam, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The suit was brought by the plaintiff for partition and recovery of her share of her father's estate. It was dismissed by the District Judge on the ground that the parties had agreed to refer the matters in dispute between them to arbitration and that the suit was, therefore, barred by section 21 of the Specific Relief Act.

It is proved that on the 23rd October, the plaintiff's husband, acting under a general power-of-attorney, and the defendants executed a muchilika (Exhibit B) by which they agreed to refer the dispute to arbitration. Three arbitrators were appointed by that muchilika; Mustan Saheb for the plaintiff, Gafur Saheb for the defendants and Venkatarangiah for both parties. On the 30th October, the plaintiff's husband issued a notice (Exhibit C) revoking the reference to arbitration as illegal because he said it was only to three persons and not to five. The plaintiff's husband also stated in the notice that unless in five days the defendants chose five arbitrators, the matter would be put into Court. The Judge has held that this notice, though erroneous, was bona fide. Venaktarangiah, plaintiff's witness No. 1, says that he was appointed an arbitrator without his knowledge or without his consent being taken; that he was and is unwilling to act as an arbitrator. Mustan Saheb, plaintiff's witness No. 2, gives evidence to the same effect; it is clear, therefore, that the agreement between the parties to refer the differences between them to the arbitration of these three persons named in the muchilika cannot now be carried out and, as there is no provision in the muchilika (Exhibit B) for the appointment of new arbitrators in their place Exhibit B, has become inoperative and has no effect.

Under section 11 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, it was held, in Deutsche Springs Stoff Actien Gesellschaft v. Briscoe (1), that if there is no subsisting agreement or agreement capable of being carried into effect, the suit is maintainable. In India section 21 of the Specifie Relief Act provides that if any person has entered into a contract with another to refer a controversy between them to arbitration and has refused to perform, it "the existence of such contract" shall bar any suit by him in respect of any subject which he has contracted to refer. This section, in our opinion, requires that there must be a subsisting contract to bar the plaintiff's suit. Because if, as in this case, the agreement cannot be carried out and the plaintiff's suit is not maintainable there is, no tribunal for the determination of the disputes between the parties.

The case in Ram Kumar Singh v. Jaganmohan Singh (2) is directly in point. In that case, the disputes were referred for decision to three named arbitrators. One of the parties gave notice to the arbitrators asking them not to make any award. The arbitrators took no action after that nor did the other party for many years. It was held on the facts that the agreement had ceased to be operative at the time of the suit. Section 21 of the Specific Relief Act was, therefore, held not to be applicable.

It was then argued that there is a general agreement to refer the controversy to arbitration and the fact that two arbitrators refuse to act does not entitle the plaintiff to maintain the suit. But, as we have pointed out, the agreement was to refer the dispute to three named arbitrators without any provision for the appointment of other arbitrators.

Partition suit—Final decree in the first instance—Decree for possession of share, whether executable.

There is no reason why in a partition suit, where the claim is for a certain share in joint property, a final decree should not be passed in the first instance, especially where the subject-matter of the suit is a house and the share can be ascertained without difficulty in execution.

A decree in a partition suit directing the plaintiff to receive possession by partition of a definite share in a house is not merely declaratory and is capable of execution.

Second appeal from the order of the Divisional Judge, Delhi, dated 9th February 1912, confirming that of the Munsif, 1st class, Delhi, dated 9th October 1911, dismissing objections of appellant to execution of decree.

Mr. Santanam, for the Appellant.

Lala Sangam Lal, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—In my opinion, the decree of this Court under consideration was a final decree and gave plaintiff a right to receive possession of one-third of the house. It did not merely declare him entitled to the one-third, but actually provided that he "do receive possession by partition of the one-third". Whether or not a final decree should have been passed in such a case unless and until the third share had been defined after local inquiry, is another matter with which I am not here concerned, though I confess I see no reason why in certain cases of claims for shares in joint property, a final decree should not be passed in the first instance, especially where, as here, the subject matter of the suit is a house, and the shares can be ascertained without difficulty in execution. In the present instance, the Munsif, in executing the decree, issued a commission to a respectable person to effect a partition of the house and the Commissioner's report, in compliance with the Munsif's orders, is on the record. I hold that the Courts below were right in treating this Court's decree as "final," and as capable of execution, and I dismiss this appeal with costs.

In a suit for maintenance, the Vakil of the plaintiff consented to the rate proposed by the defendant: the plaintiff sought to revise the order on the ground that the consent of her Vakil was not binding on her :

Held, that as the order was appealable, an application for revision was not competent.

A Vakil, who has an engagement vakalat empowering him to compromise an action, does not need to get a special and separate power in order to effect a compromise.

Petition, under section 115 of Act V of 1908, praying the High Court to revise the decree of the Court of the District Munsif of Ellore, in Original Suit No. 271 of 1910.

Mr. T. Prakasam, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.—The petitioner who was plaintiff before the District Munsif's Court could have appealed to the District Court against the Munsif's decision, if she considered that decision was legally wrong. If she had done so, and if she failed even in appeal, she could have come up in second appeal to this Court, in a suit relating to a claim for maintenance.

Instead of doing so, she has put in this revision petition under section 115 of the Civil Procedure Code, 225 days after District Munsif's decision. This is not a case in which "No appeal lies" to the High Court and hence section 115 cannot apply. There is no question of jurisdiction, perversely illegal decision, or material irregularity of procedure involved but only a question whether the District Munsif committed an error of law in allowing the plaintiff's Vakil's consent to bind the plaintiff in the decision of the suit. It is admitted that the Vakil's vakalat empowered him to compromise the suit but the contention is that without a special and separate vakalat (other than the engagement vakalat which empowered the Vakil to compromise), the Vakil's consent to the rate of maintenance proposed by the other side is not binding on the plaintiff.

I see no reason to hold that a Vakil who has got a vakalat empowering him to compromise an action should get a second vakalat which contains the same power simply because the first vakalat empowers him to do other things also besides empowering him to compromise. A Vakil in the Indian Courts is both the Solicitor who acts and a Counsel who pleads for his client. In Mathews v. Munster (1), it was held that, where the defendant's Counsel, in the absence of the defendant and without his express authority, assented to a verdict for the plaintiff for £350 with costs and withdrew all imputations against the plaintiff, the settlement was a matter which was within the apparent general authority of Counsel and was binding on the defendant. In Butler v. Knight (2), it was held that, even when the client had expressly prohibited her Solicitor to accept any compromise, and even though she had obtained judgment and decree, she was bound by the act of her Solicitor in accepting a compromise so far as the other party was concerned, if that other party had no notice of any limitation having been imposed on her Solicitor's authority and that her only remedy lay in an action for negligence against her Solicitor. In the present case, the Vakil had express authority to compromise the suit. I think that serious inconvenience would result to the administration of justice by Courts if, even after a Vakil has been given power to compromise the suit by the plaintiff who engages him and after the opposite party, on the faith of that vakalat, has offered terms of compromise which were accepted and acted upon, and after the Court has, on the faith of the assurance of the legal practitioners, passed its decision by their consent, the plaintiff should be allowed to take the objection that she did not give a special second vakalat mentioning only the power to compromise. There is no allegation even in the revision petition that she had prohibited the Vakil to compromise the suit notwithstanding that the vakalat to act gave him such power and that the defendant knew that her Vakil had no such power (that the vakalat gave him such power is spoken to by her Vakil who was examined in the review petition case. See Mr. Gomoji Row's order on the Review Petition.)

The Privy Council held, in Rajunder Narain Rae v. Bijai Gobind Singh (3), that when a Vakil admitted that the rental of a zemindari in dispute was a certain sum, the admission was binding on his client. Jagapati Mudaliar v. Ekambara Mudaliar (4) was a case in which the vakalat did not give power to the Vakil to compromise the suit. That there is no distinction between Vakils and Counsel in these matters is clear from Venkata Narasimha Naidu v. Bhashyakarlu Naidu (5).

This petition in revision put in by the plaintiff is, therefore, rejected.

The burden of proving that the entire estate left by a land-owner is ancestral rests on the person who asserts that it is. The fact should be proved conclusively.

If the property in the possession of an adopted son is not ancestral, the collaterals of his adoptive father cannot succeed to the property, although the adoption is invalid by custom.

Pandit Jawala Pershad, for the Appellant.

Sardar Kharak Singh, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Kharak Singh, defendant-respondent, was the step-son of Labha's brother. He was adopted by Labha and on Labha's death, he has taken Labha's land as adopted son.

Plaintiffs-appellants in the present suit repudiated the adoption and claimed the whole land.

The claim has been decreed as regards a part of the land held to be ancestral, but it has been dismissed as regards 147 kanals, 9 marlas, on the ground that plaintiffs appellants have failed to prove that this portion is ancestral.

In view of Sant Singh v. Sadda Singh (1), Counsel for the plaintiffs-appellants does not press ground of appeal No. 1 and, if the land is not proved to be ancestral, it is clear that plaintiffs-appellants cannot disturb defendant-respondent's possession.

It is not disputed that this area of 14 kanals, 9 marlas, was acquired by purchase, but there is no means of ascertaining whether it was purchased by Nidnan Singh, the common ancestor or by his sons. No doubt, it is not unlikely that Nidhan Singh was the purchaser but the lower Appellate Court has rightly held, on the authority of Atar Singh v. Thakar Singh (2), that this is not sufficient.

Plaintiffs-appellats must prove conclusively that the land is ancestral, and this they have failed to do.

Appeal from the judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice Wallis, dated the 24th day of August 1910, in the Ordinary Original Civil Jurisdiction of this Court, in C. S. No. 295 of 1908. See 8 Indian Cases 293; [1910] M. W. N. 532; 8 M. L. T. 247.

Mr. M. O. Parthasarathy Iyengar, for the Appellant.

Mr. M. A. Tirunarayana Chariar, for the 2nd Respondent.

Mr. C. E. Odgers, for the 1st Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The question is whether the mortgage by deposit of title-deeds is fraudulent within the meaning of section 24 of the Insolvency Act, 11 and 12, Victoria, C. 21.

A promissory-note was executed and the title-deeds were deposited to secure the amount of the note on the 10th August 1908, by the Insolvents, Cantham & Co., defendants Nos. 1 to 4. They carried on their business on the 11th, the 12th was holiday. On the 13th, it was found that they had absconded and a creditor presented a petition of adjudication the same day. The insolvents have not appeared since.

GOLLAPUDI v. LAKSHMI NARASIMHAM.

The promissory-note is for a sum of Rs. 20,962-1-6. This is made up as follows:—Rupees 6,500 is alleged to have been paid by the plaintiffs at the time of the execution of the pro-note.

Rupees 2,500 is said to have been paid to one Mallikarjunudu at defendants' request.

Rupees 3,000 is said to have been paid to Sanku Ramasami Chetti.

Rupees 1,700—the amount the plaintiffs undertook to pay to one Radhakrishna's son on account of the defendants who owed that sum under a pro-note.

Rupees 1,200, another amount the plaintiffs undertook to pay another creditor.

Rupees 6,062-1-6—the amount which was due at that time to the plaintiffs by the defendants on account of prior dealings between the parties.

Rupees 20, 962-1-6.

It is stated before us that the sum of Rs. 1,200 was not really due to the creditor and the real debt is only about Rs. 500. Wallis, J., decided that the plaintiffs had failed to prove that they paid the sum of Rs. 6,500 to the insolvents or Rs. 2,500 to Mallikarjunudu and declared the promissory-note and the mortgage to be fraudulent within section 24 of the Insolvency Act. This is an appeal from that decision. Mallikarjunudu is a near relation of the insolvents and a partner in their cotton-press business. Their accounts show that he was indebted to them in the sum of Rs. 58. Why, then, it was necessary to pay him the sum of Rs. 2,500 has not been explained. He has not been examined as a witness by the plaintiffs. In these circumstances, we are not prepared to interfere with the finding of the learned Judge, who considers the oral evidence of payment of no weight.

The witnesses, who speak to the payment of Rs. 6,500, speak also to the payment to Mallikarjunudu which we have found is false. With the exception of the 1st plaintiff and Papiah plaintiff's 4th witness, they are all gumastas of the plaintiffs or the insolvents. There is evidence that on the 8th, two days before the execution of the pro-note, a creditor, defendant's 2nd witness, knowing that the insolvents were in bad circumstances, brought pressure to bear on them and obtained from them valuable jewels as security. The plaintiffs are neighbours and friends of the defendants and must have known this. It is also conceded that the defendants had to utilize for their own purposes a sum of Rs. 3,000 which they had borrowed as agents for the minor son of their relative, and the plaintiffs were informed of this before the loan It is clear, therefore, when the defendants asked the plaintiffs for a further loan of Rs. 12,000, they must have known that the defendants were in difficulties. In these circumstances, it is not likely that the plaintiffs would have paid anything without securing more satisfactory evidence of such payment. We agree with the learned Judge, and find that the plaintiffs have failed to prove this payment also.

It is then urged that the mortgage should be upheld to the extent of the consideration conceded or proved. It is contended that the transfer cannot be said to be "voluntary" within section 24 of the Indian Insolvency Act as there was consideration and it must have been made under pressure. But there is no evidence of any claim or demand by the plaintiffs. The evidence shows, on the other hand, that it was the defendants who took the initiative and requested the plaintiffs for the loan. No pressure by the plaintiffs can explain the mortgage for a far larger sum than was really due. If the plaintiffs had only taken a transfer to secure the amount advanced by them and which they undertook to pay to the insolvents' creditors, a different question would have been raised on which it is unnecessary for us to express any opinion. The whole must be treated as one transaction and on the finding that there was no consideration to the extent of Rs. 9,000, the reasonable conclusion is that the mortgage was really granted to secure the property to that extent from the clutches of the creditors. It was in consideration of the plaintiffs' preserving the property for the defendants that the plaintiffs obtained a mortgage for their own debts. The plaintiffs were really trustees for the defendants insolvents with a charge on the property to secure the debts due to them. It was, therefore, voluntary and fraudulent and void against the Official Assignee.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Land Acquisition Act (I of 1894), s. 18 (2) (b)—Collector's award when complete—Application for reference to Court—Limitation.

The actual payment of the compensation awarded under the Land Acquisition Act is not part of the Collector's award, and is not necessary to the completion of it: the award is complete as soon as the Collector apportions the amount of the compensation between the parties concerned.

An application, therefore, to make a reference to Court made more than six months after this latter event is barred by section 18 (2) (b) of the Land Acquisition Act.

First appeal from the order of the Additional Divisional Judge, Lahore, dated the 24th March 1911, dismissing plaintiff's claim.

Lala Gopal Chand, for the Appellant.

Lala Mehar Chand, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—It is not necessary to go into the merits of this case, as the decree of the lower Court can be maintained on the ground of limitation which has been decided by the lower Court against the respondent, Feroze Din. The award by the Collector, as regards the apportionment of the compensation among all the persons known or believed to be interested in the land, which was acquired by Government was made on the 3rd September 1909, and on the 4th September, the appellant, Miran Bakhsh, objected to Rs. 23-2 6 being awarded to Feroze Din in respect of his alleged share in the land. It is unnecessary to refer to the intermediate orders, which were passed by the Collector, until we come to the order of the 4th March 1910, by which money was directed to be actually paid to Feroze Din. On the 21st March 1910, Miran Bakhsh put in an application under section 18 of the Land Acquisition Act asking the Collector to make a reference to the Court. The Divisional Judge is wrong in holding that that application was within time. Under sub-section (2) (b) of section 18, that application should have been made within six months from the date of the Collector's award supposing that the appellant was not present or represented before the Collector at the time when the award was made; and it is quite clear that the application of the 21st March 1910 was not made within that period. The lower Court seems to have thought that the order of the Collector, dated the 4th March 1910, as to actual payment of the money to Feroze Din, was part of the award so far as the apportionment of the compensation between the parties was concerned; but that view is not correct, inasmuch as the award was made by the Collector as soon as he apportioned the amount of compensation among the proprietors of the village, including the parties, according to their respective shares in the land, the actual payment of the money to the parties entitled not being necessary to the completion of the award. I hold, therefore, that the application filed by the appellant on the 21st March 1910 under section 18 of the Land Acquisition Act was barred by limitation and the lower Court should have rejected the claim on that ground. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXIII, r. 1—Withdrawal of suit—Leave to bring fresh suit—Facts set out with no clear conception of nature of rights.

Where, from the plaint and the proceedings in the lower Court, it is apparent that the plaintiff has no clear conception of his rights, the High Court will grant permission to withdraw the suit with leave to bring a fresh suit under Order XXIII, rule 1 of the Civil Procedure Code.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge of North Arcot, in Appeal Suit No. 159 of 1910, presented against that of the Court of the District Munsif of Ranipet, in O. S. No. 1011 of 1909.

FACTS.—This was a suit to declare the plaintiff's right to the joint management of the plaint temple and its properties along with the defendants. Plaintiff's case was that the suit temple was the property of a certain sect of weavers now represented by both the parties. Nos. 1 to 5 defendants were their agents to look after the temple. The village later on broke into two factions, one represented by plaintiffs and the other by defendants Nos. 6 to 15. Plaintiffs alleged that defendants Nos. 1 to 5 joined the defendants and were denying the plaintiffs' title to participate in the control of the temple and its properties. The Munsif gave a decree for the plaintiffs declaring that the right of control for the plaint templed rested with the entire body of the sect of weavers including plaintiffs and defendants and that the actual managers defendants Nos. 1 to 4 are their subordinates. The Sub-Judge on appeal found that the plaint temple was a public temple, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the management of the plaint temple and that the suit was not maintainable under section 42 of the Specific Relief Act as the plaintiffs could have asked for joint possession also. The plaintiffs then appealed to the Hight Court.

Mr. B. Doraiswamy Iyengar, for the Appellants.

Mr. T. Narasima Iyengar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—We are asked by the appellants' Vakil to allow his clients to withdraw their suit with leave to bring a fresh suit with regard to the same matter. The plaint and the proceedings in the lower Courts show that while the facts relating to the right of management of the plaint temple are set out and proved, the plaintiffs had no clear conception of the exact nature of their rights. We think that enough has been shown to justify us in allowing the suit to be withdrawn with leave to bring a fresh suit under Order XXIII, rule 1 of the Civil Procedure Code Act V of 1908. The appellants must pay the respondents' costs in the second appeal.

Practice—Suspicion, decision cannot be founded on—Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 114—Presumption—Burden of proof—Production of document with endorsement of payment.

Suspicion, though a ground for scrutiny, cannot be made the foundation of a decision.

In view of the presumption under section 114 of the Evidence Act, the production of a bond with an endorsement of payment, casts upon the plaintiff the burden of proving that the debt is still outstanding, i.e., that the bond came into defendant's hands by dishonest means, and that the signatures to the endorsement are either forgeries or unauthorised.

Two consolidated appeals from a judgment and decree of the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh, dated the 31st of July 1907, which set aside a decree of the Subordinate Judge of Barabanki in Oudh, dated the 31st of January 1907.

FACTS.—The suit was brought by the plaintiff, Sri Mandir Das, to recover from the defendant Rs. 62,717-2-3 on the basis of a mortgage-bond, dated the 22nd of December 1898. The defendant produced the bond containing the endorsement of payment, and the Subordinate Judge made an interlocutory order as follows:—

"Taking the provisions of section 114, Act I of 1872, into consideration, I am of opinion that the onus lies on the plaintiff to prove that the bond has not been discharged."

In the result, the Subordinate Judge held that the plaintiff failed to discharge the onus that lay on him and dismissed the suit. On appeal, the Court of the Judicial Commissioner dealt with the evidence "on the assumption that the onus of proving payment is on the defendant" and decreed the claim of the plaintiff, but did not award the full amount of interest claimed. Both parties appealed to His Majesty in Council, and their appeals were consolidated.

Mr. G. E. A. Ross, for the Defendant, submitted that the Subordinate Judge was right in holding that the onus was on the plaintiff to prove that the bond had not been discharged. See the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, section 114, Illustration (i). The Court was entitled to presume the fact of the payment unless and until it was disproved: section 4 of the same Act. Both Courts agreed in disbelieving the plaintiff's witnesses and the said appeal should, therefore, be dismissed. Section 34 of the Indian Evidence Act was also referred to.

The plaintiff did not appear.

JUDGMENT.

Mr. Ameer Ali.—These are two consolidated appeals from a judgment and decree of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh, dated the 31st of July 1907, and arise out of a suit brought by the plaintiff in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Barabanki on the basis of a mortgage-bond executed by the defendant, Chowdhri Mehdi Hassan, on the 22nd of December 1898, in favour of one Sukh Dei, since deceased. It appears that Sukh Dei carried on in her life-time a money-lending business, and that the plaintiff has obtained a succession certificate, under Act VII of 1889, to collect the debts due to her estate. The present action was launched on the 16th of February 1906 for the recovery of over Rs. 62,000, principal and interest, by the sale of the mortgaged premises. At the time of the institution of the suit, the plaintiff produced only a copy of the document, alleging that the original had been lost. The defendant in his answer admitted its execution, but alleged that the debt was discharged. In support of his allegation, he produced the original document containing the endorsement of payment by Sukh Dei and her general agent, Bansidhar.

In view of the presumption embodied in section 114 of the Indian Evidence Act, I of 1872, the Subordinate Judge was of opinion that the burden of establishing that the obligation created by the bond was still outstanding lay on the plaintiff. Their Lordships consider this to be the real meaning of the issue framed by him on the 6th of September 1906 after argument. The plaintiff accepted the onus and obtained an adjournment for the production of evidence in rebuttal of the presumption arising from the possession of the document by the defendant. The hearing of the case was resumed in January 1907, and the plaintiff examined a number of witnesses to prove that the defendant had dishonestly obtained possession of the bond after Sukh Dei's death through the instrumentality of Bansidhar. He also attempted to establish that Sukh Dei was not at Barabanki on the date of the alleged payment. The defendant then went into evidence regarding the fact of payment and the delivery of the document to his servants on his behalf. The Subordinate Judge disbelieved the plaintiff's witnesses. With regard to the defendant's evidence, he observed as follows:—

"I would have hesitated in believing the testimony of defendant's witnesses also, had it not been corroborated by the facts that the bond bearing an endorsement of payment was filed from the defendant's custody, and it was stated by plaintiff's own witnesses that the said endorsement was in the handwriting of Sukh Dei's general agent, Bansidhar."

In the result, the Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit with costs.

From this decree, the plaintiff appealed to the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh. The learned Judges who heard the appeal were of opinion that at the trial the onus had been wrongly thrown on the plaintiff. In this view, the learned Judge who delivered the principal judgment proceeded to examine, in the first instance, the evidence produced by the defendant and came to the conclusion that it was not reliable. He then considered the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses and was of opinion that it was false. As regards the fact that the document on which the suit was based was in the possession of the defendant, and produced by him with the admitted endorsement of Sukh Dei's general agent, he held that it must have come into the defendant's hands by some dishonest means. He accordingly reversed the decision of the first Court and decreed the plaintiff's claim; and his learned colleague concurred in this judgment. The defendant has appealed to His Majesty in Council and there is a cross-appeal by the plaintiff on the question of interest disallowed by the learned Judges in the Court below. But he has not appeared either in support of the judgment in his favour or to argue his own appeal.

Their Lordships, after a careful consideration of the case, have come to the conclusion that the judgment and decree of the Judicial Commissioners cannot be sustained.

Assuming that the question of onus remained after the parties had gone into evidence, and that it lay on the defendant to establish the allegation of payment, he appears to have proved facts which strongly support the presumption of law arising from the possession of the bond.

He showed that the endorsement of payment on the document was in the handwriting of Bansidhar, who, it is admitted, was the "recognised" and general agent of Sukh Dei and held a power-of attorney from her, and that it bore his signature. The defendant also produced a letter of demand on behalf of Sukh Dei, dated some seventeen days before the date of the alleged payment, signed by Bansidhar. He proved, further, that this Bansidhar used to give acquittances on Sukh Dei's behalf. Matadin, who, according to the plaintiff's own witnesses, is the defendant's treasurer, states that he and two other fellow servants carried the money to Sukh Dei's house and that she, after payment, signed the document in Hindi in his presence below the endorsement written by Bansidhar, and returned it to him. There is not a trace of cross-examination in the evidence of this witness with regard to genuineness of Sukh Dei's signature. That statement remains uncontradicted, for no attempt, so far as their Lordships can see, was made to re-call the plaintiff's witnesses to say the alleged signature of Sukh Dei was not in her hand.

To meet the case made by the defendant, the plaintiff produced three classes of testimony. He attempted to show that the defendant was heavily involved in debt at or about the time of the alleged payment, and he wished the Court to draw from this circumstance the inference that re-payment was unlikely. The trial Judge very properly, in their Lordships' opinion, observed that the fact of the defendant's indebtedness "in itself would not go to prove that he did not re-pay the debt in question." And he referred to the evidence of one of the plaintiff's witnesses to show that the defendant was in funds in June 1902 and re-paid other debts.

The real and substantial case put forward by the plaintiff was of a two-fold character—first, that the bond was dishonestly and fraudulently made over to the defendant by Bansidhar after Sukh Dei's death; and, secondly, that Sukh Dei was not at Barabanki on the date of the alleged payment. It is to be remarked that, although a book was produced by a Pujari, whom the Subordinate Judge calls "a tutored and untruthful witness," to prove Sukh Dei's absence from Barabanki, no attempt was made by the plaintiff to produce her mahajani books of account regularly kept in the course of business.

The Subordinate Judge disbelieved the story told by the plaintiff's witnesses, and the Appellate Court agreed with him in holding that their testimony was worthless. But it has built up a theory of its own, based, chiefly, on surmises, regarding the manner in which the bond came into the possession of the defendant. The gist of the Appellate Court's judgment is to be found in the following statements, which also show how the learned Judges have looked at the case. Referring to the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses, they say:—

"Worthless as this evidence is, it does not, in any way, make the defendant-respondent's case more probable. In the view that I have taken of the evidence of payment, it is difficult to account for the possession of the bond on the part of the defendant; yet there are documents on the record whence it may be inferred that some person for his own ends laid his hands on the document soon after the death of Musammat Sukh Dei and that through him it came into possession of the defendant."

And after referring to the disputes among Sukh Dei's relations after her death, they go on to say,—

"The plaintiff's inability to account for its disappearance, no doubt, suggested to him the reprehensible course of procuring false evidence, but when the question is considered whether the possession of the endorsed bond on the part of the defendant raises a presumption of payment, due weight should be attached to the possibility during this state of confusion of some person purloining the bond or even of its being lost and afterwards found and coming into the defendant's possession."

Their Lordships cannot help considering this mode of treating a case, where two distinct conflicting sets of facts are opposed to each other, as unsatisfactory. The plaintiff came into Court with a definite story to account for the possession of the document by the defendant. The learned Judges agree with the first Court in holding that story to be false, and yet they proceed to build up a case for the plaintiff on what they call a "possibility." As already observed, the defendant did not rest his case merely on the legal presumption which arose from the possession of the document; he produced positive testimony. which received corroboration from that presumption, and he proved facts which made his statement probable. The learned Judges, having disbelieved the evidence on both sides, have set aside the presumption under section 114 of the Evidence Act, which only embodies the ordinary rule of law, by a possibility, based on surmises. Now, it is a settled principle that suspicion, though a ground for scrutiny, cannot be made the foundation of a decision, and that is exactly what appears to have happened in this case.

With reference to the conflicting views of the two Courts in India regarding the question of onus, in view of the presumption under section 114 of the Indian Evidence Act, their Lordships are of opinion that the Subordinate Judge was right in holding that the production by the defendant of the bond with the endorsement of payment cast on the plaintiff the burden of establishing the affirmative proposition that the debt was still outstanding, in other words, of showing that the bond came in defendant's possession by dishonest means and that the signatures to the endorsement were either forgeries or unauthorised.

On the whole, their Lordships are of opinion that the judgment and decree appealed against should be set aside and the plaintiff's suit dismissed with costs in all the Courts. And they will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly. The plaintiff will pay the costs of these appeals.

Appeal allowed; Cross-appeal dismissed.

Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), s. 22—Contract to sell—Suit for specific performance—When limitation commences to run—Delay in suit, when fatal to suit.

Where, in a suit for specific performance of a contract to sell, no date is fixed for performance, limitation commences to run from the date when performance is demanded by one party to the contract and refused by the other.

Delay in instituting a suit for specific performance is not fatal to the suit, unless it can be shown that the delay has in any way prejudiced the defendant.

Second appeal against the decree of the District Court of Guntur, in A. S. No. 83 of 1910, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif of Guntur, in O. S. No. 461 of 1909.

FACTS.—This was a suit for specific performance of a contract of sale entered into by plaintiff's father with the defendant in September or October 1899. Plaintiff's case was that there was an agreement that the sale-deed must be executed by defendant on demand. The suit was brought in July 1906. It was found by both the Courts that such a condition was not attached to the contract. The lower Courts then considered whether the suit for specific performance was in time. The District Munsif found that the contract of sale was meant to be performed on the very date and held the suit was barred. The Distict Judge was of opinion that as no date was fixed for the performance of the agreement, delay or laches would not operate to the prejudice of the party with whom the contract was made unless and until the contracting party called upon him to perform his part of the contract. Mohendra Nath Mookerjee v. Kali Proshad Johuri (1). where there was no intention to abandon the right under the contract, the plaintiff must have a decree for specific performance notwithstanding the delay in the institution of the suit. The defendant appealed.

Mr. K. Ramanath Shenai, for the Appellant.

Mr. K. Srinivasa Iyengar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—We cannot say that there is any legal objection to the finding that the Exhibit I was not satisfactorily proved. The Subordinate Judge referred to Exhibit C as showing that the plaintiff treated the land as the owner and that Exhibit I could not, therefore, be genuine.

With regard to the question of limitation, the finding is that there was no time fixed for the execution of the conveyance and that time, therefore, ran from the time when demand was made and defendant refused performance The Subordinate Judge's view on the question was right.

It is next argued that the plaintiff was guilty of undue delay in instituting the suit ; but it has not been shown that the delay has in any way prejudiced the defendant. We dismiss the second appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Where a Judge uses his discretion to grant or refuse leave to institute a suit, he does not act illegally or with material irregularity, nor is any question of jurisdiction involved.

Petition, under section 115 of Act V of 1908, praying the Hight Court to revise the order of the District Court of South Canara, dated 19th August 1912, in O. P. No. 148 of 1911.

Petition praying that, in the circumstances stated in the affidavit filed therewith, the High Court will be pleased to direct stay of proceedings in O. P. No. 148 of 1911 on the file of the District Court of South Canara pending disposal of C. R. P. No. 550 of 1912 preferred therefrom to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.—The case in Ramanathan Chettiar v. Ananthanarayana Iyer (1) shows that the District Judge has power to make inquiries before granting sanction under section 18 of the Reglious Endowments Act.

The District Judge has carefully gone into the whole matter on the affidavit filed on both sides and has come to the conclusion (a) that 3rd respondent is himself to blame for not taking up the duties of trustee and that respondents Nos. 2, 4, 5 and 6 against whom alone the application was really directed were not to blame ; (b) that the application is not bona fide and as really set up by 1st respondent (one of the trustees), who could not have his own way in the temple management, and (c) that the respondents Nos. 2, 4, 5 and 6 have not been prima facie proved to be guilty of any misappropritation or of any such misconduct as will justify the granting of the leave to sue.

I am unable to find that in using his discretion to grant or refuse leave to the petitioners to institute the suit, the District Judge has committed any illegality or material irregularity or that any question of jurisdiction is involved.

The revision petition is rejected. The petition for stay of proceedings is also rejected.

Mr. Satya Chandra Mukerji, for the Opposite Party.

ORDER.—This is an application in revision praying that the order of the District Magistrate of Cawnpore, dated the 30th of July 1912, sanctioning the prosecution of the applicant under section 199, Indian Penal Code, be set aside. The circumstances which led to the grant of the sanction are as follows:—On the 19th of February 1912, three complaints were filed in the Court of the City Magistrate of Cawnpore, namely, Musammat Rupiya v. Ram Dial, Ram Dial v. Gauri Shanker and Ram Sahai v. Gauri Shanker. The learned City Magistrate transferred the three complaints to a Bench of Honorary Magistrates composed of Nawab Khakaun Husain and Pandit Kundan Lal for disposal. There were several postponements during the trial of the three cases and on the 21st of May 1912, charge-sheets were framed. On the 31st of May 1912, three applications were filed in the Court of the District Magistrate of Cawnpore by Ram Sahai and Ram Dial for the transfer of the three cases from the Bench of the Honorary Magistrates to some other Court. The applicants for transfer made certain allegations against the Honorary Magistrates. The three applications were accompanied by three declarations, the latter being made by Ram Prasad, Puttan Lal, and Ala Baksh. The three declarations were not sworn to before any officer of a Court. The District Magistrate called upon the Honorary Magistrates for an explanation which was submitted on the 26th of June 1912. On the 29th of June 1912, an order for the transfer of the three cases to the Court of the City Magistrate was made. On the 1st of July 1912, the opposite party, namely, Musammat Rupiya and Gauri Shanker, objected to the order of the transfer on the ground that no notice of the applications for transfer had been given to them. The District Magistrate cancelled his order of 29th June 1912 and fixed the 6th of July 1912 for the hearing and disposal of the transfer applications. On that date, some oral evidence was recorded by the District Magistrate and an order of transfer was made on the 15th of July 1912. Pandit Kundan Lal and Nawab Khakaun Husian, the Honorary Magistrates, addressed a letter to the District Magistrate denying the allegations contained in the three declarations of Ram Prasad, Puttan Lal, and Ala Baksh, and submitting their own affidavits contradicting the said declarations. After hearing the parties concerned, the learned District Magistrate sanctioned the prosecution of Ram Prasad, Puttan Lal, and Ala Baksh under section 199, Indian Penal Code. It is against this order that the applicant, Ram Prasad, has filed the present application. It is contended, by his learned Counsel that the order of the learned District Magistrate is ultra vires, that no valid ground for granting the sanction has been made out, and that no offence under section 199, Indian Penal Code, has been committed by the applicant. I shall take up the last objection first. It is admitted by the applicant, for the purposes of this application, that a declaration was filed by him in the Court of the District Magistrate with his application for transfer. It is, however, argued that the declaration was not one which the District Magistrate was bound or authorised by law to receive in evidence and to act upon it; and indeed he did not consider it evidence for he examined some witnesses on the basis of whose statements an order of transfer was made. Therefore, if the declaration in question contained any false statement, no offence under section 199, Indian Penal Code, has been committed. In support of this contention, thefollowing cases have been cited, In the matter of the petition of Iswar Chander Guho (1); Abdul Majid v. Krishna Lal Nag(2), Chandi Pershad v. Abdur Rahman (3). I think that the contention for the applicant must prevail. A declaration, before it can be made the foundation of a prosecution under section 199, Indian Penal Code, must be one which is admissible in evidence, and which the Court, before which it is filed, is bound or authorised by law to receive in evidence. The suggestion that there is no prohibition against the reception of such declaration in evidence does not render it admissible or the declarant amenable to the provisions of section 199, Indian Ponal Code. It is not pointed out for the opposite party that the declaration filed by Ram Prasad was one which, under the Criminal Procedure Code or any other law, the Court, before which the proceedings were pending, was bound or authorised to receive in evidence. I, therefore, hold that the sanction granted by the learned District Magistrate for the prosecution of the applicant under section 199, Indian Penal Code, cannot be upheld. It is unnecessary to discuss the other objections taken on behalf of the applicant. I, therefore, set aside the order of the learned District Magistrate, dated the 30th of July 1912, as against Ram Prasad.

Order set aside.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 197—Lower Subordinate of Public Works Department, charge against, of bribery—Whether sanction to prosecute necessary.

Inasmuch as a lower Subordinate in the Public Works Department can be appointed and transferred by a Superintending Engineer, without reference to the Local Government, sanction to entertain a complaint of bribery against such lower Subordinate is not necessary.

Petition, under sections 435 and 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, praying the High Court to revise the order of the Code of the Joint Magistrate of Bikkavole, dated 21st June 1912.

FACTS.—The petitioner filed a complaint before the second class Magistrate at Bikkavole in the Godavari District alleging that when he went to the residence of the 1st counter-petitioner, a Sub-Overseer of the Public Works Department, to execute an agreement with reference to the construction of a culvert, as desired by the Public Works Authorities, the 1st counter-petitioner demanded a bribe and that, on the petitioner refusing to pay it, he was assaulted by the 1st and 2nd counter-petitioners.

The second class Magistrate returned the complaint for presentation before the first class Magistrate, saying that a perusal of the petition showed that an offence under section 161, Indian Penal Code, was also alluded to.

The Deputy Magistrate to whom the complaint was then presented took it on his file holding that he had no authority to proceed under section 161, Indian Penal Code, without the previous sanction of the official superior of the accused, and that such sanction had neither been applied for, nor was there an intention of applying for it. He accordingly transferred it to the file of the Sub-Magistrate for trial for the other offences.

The complainant applied to the High Court to revise this order of the Deputy Magistrate.

Mr. T. Prakasam, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.—The Public Prosecutor states that the accused is a Sub-Overseer of the Public Works Department and belongs to the class of lower Subordinates and under rules 54, 293 (s) and 423 of the rules of the Public Works Department, 9th Edition, he can be appointed or removed by the Superintending Eugineer without reference to the Local Government. This being so, the Deputy Magistrate was wrong in refusing to entertain the complaint for want of sanction, under section 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 260, 439—Summary trial—Case involving question of title and documentary evidence—Revision—Power of High Court to set aside order of acquittal.

In the exercise of its revisional powers, the High Court has power to reverse an order of acquittal and to direct that further inquiry be made or that the accused be re-tried or committed for trial.

Queen-Empress v. Basant Lall, 27 C. 320; 4 C. W. N. 311, followed.

But this revisional jurisdiction will be exercised sparingly and generally in those cases only where there is an error of law and procedure patent on the face of the judgment.

A case involving the decision of a question of title and the production of documentary evidence should not be tried summarily.

Mr. Dipchand T. Ojha, for the Opponent.

The Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This is a Reference by the Sessions Judge, Sukkur, as to an order of acquittal made by the City Magistrate, Shikarpur, in a case in which the opponent was acquitted of offences under sections 96 and 122 of the Bombay District Municipal Act.

It is first objected that the application for revision of an order of acquittal will not lie as the procedure contemplated by the Code would be an appeal by the Local Government.

The powers conferred on the High Court in revision are those specified in section 439 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and these include the powers of a Court of Appeal under section 423—subject only to the proviso (4) that a finding of acquittal should not be converted into one of conviction.

Subject to this proviso, therefore, the High Court may exercise all the powers defined in section 423 (a), i.e., it may reverse the order of acquittal and direct that further inquiry be made, or that the accused be re-tried or committed for trial.

This power has been exercised by the Calcutta High Court in Queen-Empress v. Basant Lall (1) and recently by this Court in the case of Emperor v. Allahrakhio Bakhshan (2).

No doubt, this revisional jurisdiction will only be exercised sparingly and generally only in cases where there is an error of law and procedure patent on the face of the judgment.

The present case is, however, a case which does call for the exercise of this power. The case involved the decision of a question of title and the production of documentary evidence. Both parties asked for the case to be tried regularly, but the Magistrate, nevertheless, proceeded to dispose of the case by summary trial. We think the Magistrate erred in adopting a summary procedure which was ill adopted to the complicated nature of the case and which further had the effect of practically preventing either party from prosecuting the case in appeal.

Again, the issue that lay at the root of the whole case was whether the street was public or not. On this, the Magistrate has given no definite finding for, in his concluding remarks, he refers to a ruling that the issue is rather one for a Civil than for a Criminal Court. The reference to this ruling makes it uncertain whether the Magistrate has considered and decided the issue himself.

We, therefore, reverse the order of acquittal and direct that the accused be re-tried by the regular and not by summary procedure.

Re-trial ordered.

The Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

ORDER.—This is an application in revision. The applicants seek to set aside the order of the District Magistrate of Etawah, confirming that of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, directing the two applicants to furnish personal bonds of Rs. 500 each and two sureties each of the like amount to be of good behaviour for one year or in default to undergo one year's rigorous imprisonment. The learned Counsel for the applicants has argued the case at some length. In order to appreciate his contention some facts should first be recited. The two applicants, Sardar Singh and Ganga Singh alias Laloo Singh, are brothers. They are land-holders and carry on a paying business at Auraiya. They live in Rahatpur.

The Sub-Inspector of Auraiya, who has been there since September 1911, laid information against the applicants to the effect that they protected and harboured thieves, associated with notorious bad characters, and received stolen property.

On the basis of that information, a notice under section 112, Criminal Procedure Code, was drawn up against the applicants. They repelled the charges brought against them. The hearing of the case was fixed for 23rd March 1912. On 22nd March 1912, the Police filed a petition to the effect that the prosecution witnesses had been won over by the defence and some others will be produced later. The case was taken up on 26th March 1912, when nine witnesses were examined for the Police and the case was presumably closed for the prosecution. The applicants were called upon to enter on their defence. They denied the charges contained in the Police information and examined twenty witnesses in support of their character and reputation in the neighbourhood. After the close of the evidence for the defence, seven more witnesses were examined by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate for the prosecution. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate accepted the evidence for the Police and his order was upheld by the District Magistrate. Now, it is contended on behalf of the applicants that the procedure of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate as to the recording of evidence was distinctly erroneous and injurious to the defence. Under paragraph 2, of section 117 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the case against the applicants was to be conducted as if it were a warrant-case and the procedure to be observed in the trial of warrant-cases is laid down in sections 251 to 256, Criminal Procedure Code. According to the said sections, an accused cannot be called upon to enter on his defence until the prosecution closes its case. No further evidence can be admitted against the accused except under section 540, for which there must be valid reasons and which reasons must be recorded. In the present case, the witnesses for the prosecution examined after the close of the defence evidence were not examined under section 540, Criminal Procedure Code, and no order appears on the record to show why was additional evidence for the prosecution allowed, after the close of the defence. Such a procedure has obviously placed the applicants at a disadvantage. Further, it is argued that the evidence for the Police relates to general rumour or suspicion, or the statements or conduct of third persons who justified their conduct by reference to the applicants. The Police witnesses with the exception of two men came from distant places and not from the village where the applicants reside or the village where they carry on their business,

GANGA SINGH v. EMPEROR.

For the applicants, exception is also taken to the reasons given by the learned District Magistrate for upholding the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate. It is said that no reflections were cast on the Sub-Inspector or the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, when it was urged for the applicants that unfortunately for the latter, their enemies had put into circulation reports which found credence with the said officers. It is true that it is difficult to get evidence against well-to-do men and the Police would think twice before laying a charge against such persons, but the latter have more enemies than a poor man, and have a right to the consideration of evidence against them on the same principles as would be applied in the consideration of evidence against a poor man. It is also urged that the absence of any report by former Police officers cannot be ignored on the assumption that they were lazy and did not discharge their duties with diligence. The last argument advanced is that the evidence for the defence is just as good as, if not better than, the evidence for the Police. I think that the procedure adopted by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate in admitting the evidence for the prosecution after the close of the defence was erroneous and unauthorised It was also prejudicial to the applicants. But, apart from the defects in the procedure or the criticism of the reasons of the lower Courts, I think that the information laid by the Police has not been established. That evidence is open to several objections. Only two men, viz., Laloo and Kanahya, come from Auriaya and the others come from villages, from two to ten miles of the village of the applicants. Laloo admittedly is an enemy of the applicants. He has given evidence against them before. Kanahya was once convicted of gambling and would like to keep friends with the Police. Another witness, Kalka, has been bound over at the instance of the Police and would, no doubt, be willing to please them, by giving evidence. Many witnesses depose to cases in which the applicants were suspected to have received a share of the stolen property. Such evidence is inadmissible as was held by my learned colleague, Mr. Justice Chamier, in the case of Mulu from Etawah also, vide Revision Case No. 344 of 1911.

One witness deposes to having paid money to Lashkaria and another, who levied the black-mail on him representing that they had been sent by the applicants. Lal Man who makes that statement admits that he made no report at the time and gives no reason for the omission. Lashkaria and his comrades have not been examined. It is easy to make such statements as Lal Man has made and difficult to refute them. It is also doubtful whether such evidence is admissible.

The other witnesses state that there is shohrat-am that the applicants are bad characters. The learned Counsel for the applicants contends that the words shohrat-am mean general rumour and not general repute. I do not think so. I think that the words mean general repute also. The witnesses further say that the applicants associate with Lashkaria and a few others, who are notorious badmashes. This evidence of association, when examined, clearly amounts to this that once or twice the applicants had been seen in the company of Lashkaria and others. The applicants, it is said, are men of business. They receive all sorts of men. Besides, they might have allowed the notorious men in question to talk or walk with them for fear. The allegation that thieves and bad characters are settled by the applicants on their land is not borne out by any reliable evidence. Some of the witnesses say that they have heard so.

The only evidence then against the applicants is of some witnesses, who do not live in the villages where the applicants live or carry on business or in the immediate neighbourhood of the said villages, who say that the applicants by general repute are known to be bad characters. But, even if the whole of the evidence for the Police were to be taken as admissible, it is, I think, sufficiently rebutted by the evidence for the defence. There is a large volume of evidence for the applicants, and that evidence is of men of the villages where the applicants reside and carry on their business or of the immediate neighbourhood. No valid reasons have been given by the lower Courts or by the Assistant Government Advocate for disbelieving the evidence for the defence.

I think that it is just as good as, if not better than, that for the prosecution.

And in a case under section 110, Criminal Procedure Code, where the evidence for the defence is equally good with that for the prosecution, the accused are entitled to an acquittal, vide Rajendra Prasad Sahi v. King-Emprer (1). I, therefore, accept this application and set aside the order of the lower Courts calling upon the applicants to furnish personal bonds and sureties to be of good behaviour for one year.

Application accepted.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 213, sub-s. (2)—"Witnesses for defence," whether expression covers evidence extracted by cross-examination from prosecution witnesses—Charge against accused framed before cross-examination of prosecution witnesses—Subsequent cross-examination—Cancellation of charge, if legal.

A Magistrate, having drawn up a charge against an accused person with a view to his commitment to the Court of Session, can thereafter allow the accused to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution, and, as a result, cancel the charge.

The words "witnesses for the defence" in section 213 sub-section(2) of the Criminal Procedure Code are wide enough to cover evidence extracted by cross-examination from witnesses for the prosecution.

In the matter of Surjya Narain Singh, 5 C. W. N. 110 at p. 112; relied upon.

Rule granted against the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Basirhat, dated April 18th, 1912, acquitting the accused, opposite party, of an offence under section 408, Indian Penal Code, and cancelling the charge under section 477A against him.

Babu Sarat Chandra Roy Chowdhury, for the Petitioner.

Babus Hara Prosad Chatterji and Sajani Kanto Sinha, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—We think that this Rule must be discharged.

The short point raised by it is whether a Magistrate, having drawn up a charge against an accused person with a view to his commitment to the Court of Session, can thereafter allow the accused to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution and, as the result, cancel the charge. We are of opinion that it is open to him to take this course.

Section 213, sub-section(2), of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, provides that, if a Magistrate, after having drawn up a charge, hears witnesses for the defence and is then satisfied that there are not, after all, sufficient grounds for committing the accused, he may cancel the charge and discharge the accused. No doubt, the sub-section refers to "witnesses for the defence"; but in our view, those words are wide enough to cover evidence extracted by cross-examination from witnesses for the prosecution. The course taken by the Magistrate seems to us to be clearly within the spirit of the provision, and we consider that it is not unduly straining the words used to put this construction upon them. We find, moreover, that our view is in accordance with that expressed by this Court in In the matter of Surjya Narain Singh (1).

Rule discharged.

Revision—Criminal cases—Concurrent findings of facts—Material error as to facts.

Where a lower Appellate Court has fallen into a material error as to facts, the Chief Court will interfere in revision.

Petition for revision, under section 439 of the Criminal Procedure Code, of the order of the Sessions Judge, Delhi, dated the 11th March 1912, affirming the sentence passed by the first Court.

Mr. Gokal Chand Naurang, for Lala Dwarka Das, for the Petitioner.

Lala Balwant Rai, for the Respondent.

PRABHU DIAL v. EMPEROR.

JUDGMENT.—In this case, one Pirbhu Dyal, munim of a firm in Delhi, was convicted under section 439 of having embezzled a sum of rupees eighty three and some odd annas from the firm of Nadha Mal-Niadar Mal by which he was employed.

On the 29th September 1910, certain iron goods had been received by the firm from another firm of Prem Sukh Das-Jawahar Lal. It is alleged that on the 5th October 1910, the accused asked Dhian Chand, cashier of the firm, who is a relation of the partners, for Rs. 83 9-0 said to be due to the firm of Prem Sukh Das-Jawahar Lal, which he (Pirbhu Dyal) said had been demanded by them. Dhian Chand, upon whose evidence alone the conviction is based, says that he gave this money to Pirbhu Dyal, accused, after looking at the original parcha which had accompanied the goods but without taking any parcha from Pirbhu Dyal, on account of the firm said to be asking for their money, or any signature from Pirbhu Dyal for the money. It is clear from the evidence of the principal of the firm, Miri Mal, that in all cases where money was paid in this manner, the signature of the person to whom it was paid should have been taken, but it is stated that the munim in this connection did not always carry out their orders.

There is no doubt, and it is admitted fully by the accused, that on the 8th November 1910, a claim was submitted by the firm of Prem Sukh Das-Jawahar Lal through Pirbhu Dyal and that the money was paid to him by Nihal Chand, who had succeeded Dhian Chand as cashier. This parcha was duly taken from Pirbhu Dyal though it does not appear in that case to have been correctly entered in the parcha bahi or bill book which was kept by the firm and in which there was no entry at all on the 5th October. On the 5th October, no doubt, an entry was made by the said Dhian Chand in the rokar bahi and also in a bahi called the jama bahi. Dhian Chand stated in his evidence that the payment on the 5th October to Pirbhu Dyal had been made in the presence of one Ram Saran but when Ram Saran was examined, he denied all knowledge of the occurence and it must be remembered that, however much a Court may be convinced that the witness is lying or has been suborned, no such impression or belief can take the form of the affirmative evidence which is necessay before an accused person can be properly convicted. The case against Pirbhu Dyal is reduced to this. It is alleged that he saw his way to get the money re-paid a second time when he discovered that the cashier had been changed after the previous payment. This is a theory which would not hold water for a moment, as it is quite clear that if the prosecution story is true that he embezzled the money on the 5th October, he must then have been perfectly well aware that some time or other a proper bill would be submitted, the money would be paid to the firm of Prem Sukh, and the previous payment would be discovered. The evidence, therefore, against Pirbhu Dyal reduced itself to this. The statement of Dhian Chand is that he paid the money to Pirbhu Dyal without taking from him any parcha or any signature and the entry in the books was made by Dhian Chand himself.

The firm of Prem Sukh stated that it was never their habit to draw money except upon parchas and it is difficult to believe that it was a custom of the accused's firm to pay out the money for the discharge of a bill due to a third party without taking any signature either of the munim himself or any parcha on behalf of the firm supposed to be claiming the money. Indeed, the evidence of Miri Mal shows that, however the orders may be neglected, the standing orders of the firm were to take such signature or parcha.

It appears to me, without saying for a moment that Dhian Chand is the culprit, though this is a possibility which we are bound to remember in considering whether or not the crime can be brought home to the accused, that it is impossible upon such evidence properly to base a conviction. No doubt, this is only an application for revision and not an appeal, and in such cases I very rarely interfere on the facts; nor should I do so even in this case, were it not that the Appellate Court has fallen into an error as to the facts in its judgment which is of very material importance. He says:—

Some iron goods were supplied by another firm on 29th September 1910, and on October 5th, 1910, the appellant is said to have presented the cashier with a bill for the amount due to this firm which sum, Rs. 83-9-0, was duly paid him by the cashier, Dhiani Mal. "It is precisely in the absence of any such bill or any receipt on behalf either of Pirbhu Dyal or of the firm that I think that the conviction cannot be sustained. Had there been a bill supported by the signature of Pirbhu Dyal, the case would have been clear and this is what we should naturally expect to find in a case of such payments being made and we do find in the case a second payment which is fully admitted by the accused.

In my opinion, it must be held that the statement of Dhian Chand alone, unsupported by any other evidence except the entries in the books made with his own hands, is insufficient to justify the maintenance of the conviction. I accordingly accept the application for revision, set aside the conviction and sentence, and direct that Pirbhu Dyal be set at liberty forthwith.

Application accepted.

KHAMISO valad JUMO—APPELLANT.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 149—Unlawful assembly—Offence in pursuance of common object—Knowledge of individual members.

The word "knew" in section 149 of the Penal Code indicates a state of mind at the time of the commission of the offence and not knowledge acquired in the light of subsequent events.

The offence, for which members of an unlawful assembly can be convicted as being in pursuance of the common object of the assembly, must so probably flow from the prosecution of the common object that each member might antecedently expect it to happen.

Mr. L. P. Ferro, for the Appellant.

The Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The accused has been, I think, satisfactorily identified by the soldier Sumner. This soldier could hardly have helped recognizing the accused for he had headed a party of coolies, who tried to intercept the soldiers in their flight and actually struck a blow at Sumner. The accused is described to be an unusually tall man and I am disposed to believe also in the identification of him by Viie, although the Magistrate does not rely on this witness. As a member of the unlawful assembly (the object of which was to beat Hilton and the other soldiers), the accused is guilty of the offence of grievous hurt for that was committed in prosecution of the common object. But the Magistrate has also convicted the accused of the theft from Hilton though he admits that the theft was no part of the common object. The Magistrate relies on the second part of section 149 and considers that the members of the unlawful assembly must have known that theft was likely to be committed. This, however, is mere speculation. As said by the Calcutta High Court in the old case of Queen v. Sabed Ali (1), the offence "must so probably flow from the prosecution of the common object that each member might antecedently expect it to happen". I lay stress on the word antecedently, for the section uses the word "knew", which indicates a state of mind at the time of the commission of the offence and not knowledge acquired in the light of subsequent events. Here the probability is that no member of the unlawful assembly, except those that actually beat Sumner, had any idea that he was even carrying a purse. Apart from this, however, theft is not a probable consequence or concomitant of beating, which is the only common object alleged in the charge.

I, therefore, confirm the conviction and sentence under sections 147, 325, but reverse the conviction and sentence under section 379.

Conviction partly confirmed.

Petition, under sections 435 and 439 of the Criminal Procedure Code, praying the High Court to revise the judgment of the first class Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Negapatam, in Calendar Case No. 37 of 1911, dated the 8th day of April 1911.

Mr. K. R. Subramania Sastri for Mr. V. Ryru Nambiar, for the Petitioner.

The Public Prosecutor, on behalf of the Government.

ORDER.—Technically, the petitioner committed an affence under section 19 (c) of the Arms Act as soon as he landed in British India with a revolver which he was not lawfully entitled to possess in this country. It is not necessary that there should be any particular intention in the mind of an offender to complete the offence punishable under this section. In this case, the facts, as found and admitted, are that between the landing stage and the Customs Shed, the petitioner was detected by the Customs Officer in the act of handing to a third person a parcel rolled in cloth which, when opened, was found to contain a revolver and 36 cartridges. The conduct of a traveller, who honestly intended to comply with the rules, would have been to leave the weapon in the bag where it was, till the luggage had been conveyed to the Customs Officer and then, before the examination of luggage, to make a declaration about the fire arm and at once to deposit it with the Customs officials. When the petitioner acted as he did, it cannot be said for certain that he would not have smuggled the revolver, though unnoticed, if the Customs Officer had not chanced to come up at the critical moment.

He has been fairly treated and I decline to interfere with the conviction or sentence.

Application for revision against an order of the Joint Magistrate of Allahabad.

Mr. Satya Chandra Mukerji, for the Appellant.

The Assistant Government Advocate, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application in revision contesting an order of the learned Joint Magistrate of Allahabad, which purports to have been passed under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code. The relevant facts of the case are as follows:—One Shah Haji Jan and some others are the owners of a Mandi in the town of Allahabad known as Khalifa Ki Mandi. The applicant, Pitamber Lal, was the lessee of that Mandi, and his lease, which is said to have been given in 1902, was to expire on the 21st of June 1912. Prior to the expiry of his lease, another lease was given to Sardha Prasad and Bhola Ram as long ago as 1908, which was to take effect on the expiry of the lease of Pitamber Lal, i. e., after the 21st of June 1912. On the 26th of June 1912, the Police submitted a report that there was a likelihood of the breach of the peace between the two lessees over the collection of the Mandi dues. The Magistrate acted on that report and issued notices to the applicant and the opposite parties on the 27th of June 1912 to show cause. On the 9th of July 1912, the learned Magistrate made an order referring two issues to the Tahsildar for a report. The order of the Magistrate must be quoted here in order to appreciate the contention of the applicant. The order is as follows: "Parties appear before me to-day and put in their written statements. The matter is obviously one for local inquiry such as is provided for in section 148, Criminal Procedure Code. The Tahsildar will conduct this local inquiry and make a full report to me on the result. The papers forming the record of this case, including the written statements of the parties, will be sent to him to aid him in his inquiry. The main facts at which he must strive to arrive are;—(1) Were any, and if so, which, of the parties in possession of the share of the Mandi at the time when this trouble first arose, i.e., the 26th and 27th of June? (2) Had any party within two months next before that date been forcibly and wrongfully dispossessed? The Tahsildar will have no concern with the merits of the claims of the parties to possess the share of the Mandi. He must devote his attention to the points I have mentioned above, and there will be no need for him to go into a long discussion about title-deeds and the like. His report should be submitted within ten days' time. Case to be put up after ten days". The Tahsildar submitted his report on the two issues. No evidence was recorded by the Magistrate on behalf of Sardha Prasad and Bhola Ram. Some evidence was recorded on behalf of Pitamber Lal. On the 9th of August 1912, the learned Magistrate accepted the report and the conclusions of the Tahsildar and passed an order in favour of Sardha Prasad and Bhola Ram. Pitamber Lal is dissatisfied with that order and has come up in revision to this Court. He has taken three legal objections to the proceedings in the lower Court. He says that the learned Magistrate did not write an order stating the reasons which made him believe that there was a likelihood of the breach of the peace between Pitamber Lal and his opposite parties. Further, it is said that no copy of such an order was served on the applicant. The last and the most important objection is that the order of the lower Court proceeds practically upon the report of the Tahsildar. The learned Magistrate could not under the law, it is said, refer the inquiry into the issues raised in the case to the Tahsildar. I think that this last objection is sound and must prevail. A perusal of the order of the learned Magistrate dated the 9th July 1912, shows that the issues involved in the case were remitted by him to the Tahsildar, for inquiry and trial. The learned Magistrate did not hear all the evidence himself in the case, and his order clearly shows that he accepted the report of the Tahsildar in its entirety. According to the admitted facts in the case, Pitambar Lal was in possession up to the 21st of June 1912. He could not have given up possession willingly and then turned round in five days, i.e., on 26th June 1912 (the date on which the Police made a report) and contested the possession of Sardha Prasad and Bhola Ram. The learned Magistrate, it is said, would have come to a different conclusion had he taken all the evidence himself without expressing any opinion as to the merits of the case. I think that the proceedings of the lower Court are open to objection. The order of 9th July 1912 purports to have been made under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, which does not enable a Court to have the trial of the issues raised in a case determined by a Court subordinate to itself. The case of In re Baikunt Kumar(1) is in point. I, therefore, think that the proceedings of the lower Court were not held according to law. I, therefore, set aside the order of the learned Magistrate, dated the 9th of August 1912.

Application allowed.

CRIMINAL MISCELLANEOUS PETITION No. 305 OF 1912.

September 18, 1912.

Present:—Sir Ralph Benson, Kt., Offg. Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Sankaran Nair.

THE SESSIONS JUDGE OF COIMBATORE —PETITIONER

IMMUDI KUMARA KANGAYA AND OTHERS—ACCUSED.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 208, 210, 212, 213, 347—Magistrate's discretion to summon and examine witnesses for defence before or after framing charge—"Stop further proceedings", meaning of,

SESSIONS JUDGE OF COIMBATORE v. IMMUDI KUMARA KANGAYA.

Section 210, in requiring "the evidence referred to in section 208 sub-sections (1) and (2)" to be recorded before a charge is drawn up, does not require a Magistrate to record the evidence of witnesses whom, in the exercise of the discretion given by sub-section (3), he has deemed it unnecessary to summon. Therefore, the accused is not entitled to delay asking the Magistrate to summon his witnesses until the last moment before the charge is drawn up and then require him to summon and examine his witnesses, as such a procedure would lead to undue delay in the commitment of cases and the evils which such delay would entail.

Though it is left to the discretion of a Magistrate (section 212) to examine witnesses for the defence after the charge is drawn up and then to cancel the charge and discharge the accused (section 213), the Criminal Procedure Code does not compel a Magistrate to summon and examine witnesses for the defence after a charge has been drawn up or even before the charge has been drawn up if, for reasons to be recorded, the Magistrate deems it unnecessary to do so.

Obiter.—The expression "stop further proceedings," in section 347 of the Criminal Procedure Code, means, to stop proceeding with the case as a trial and instead to commit the case to the Sessions for trial by that Court.

Reference, under section 438 of the Criminal Procedure Code, praying that, in the circumstances stated therein, the High Court will be pleased to quash the commitment of the accused in Sessions Case No. 60 of 1912 and Register Case No. 8 of 1912 on the file of the Sub-Magistrate of Kangayam.

Mr. B. N. Sarma, for the Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

Mr. M. O. Parthasarathi Aiyangar, for the Accused.

ORDER.—In this case, the Sessions Judge moves us to quash a commitment made to his Court on the ground that the Committing Magistrate refused to summon certain witnesses whom the accused desired to be examined by the Magistrate under section 208 of the Criminal Procedure Code prior to his making the commitment. It appears that examination and cross-examination of the witnesses for the prosecution was closed on the 5th June last, and accused were examined on the same day and stated that their Vakil would file written statements on their behalf. The case was, therefore, adjourned to the 8th June when the written statements were put in and the Vakil of the accused argued that there was no sufficient evidence for the prosecution to justify a commitment. Owing to the absence of one of the accused (who was on bail), the case was adjourned to the 11th June, and then again to the 20th June, and then the present application was, for the first time, made to summon and examine some sixteen witnesses for the defence. The Magistrate refused to do so, as he held that the application was made too late, and he drew up a charge and committed the accused to the Sessions on the same day. For the accused, it is argued that sections 208, 209, 210 of the Criminal Procedure Code rendered it compulsory on the Magistrate to issue the summonses and examine the witnesses as requested by the accused, and reliance is placed on two unreported decisions of this Court and on the decisions of Queen Empress v. Ahmadi (1), and Emperor v. Muhammad Hadi (2). We do not think that the contention of the accused can be supported. Section 208 (1) of the Criminal Procedure Code, no doubt, requires the Magistrate to record "all such evidence as may be produced in support of the prosecution or on behalf of the accused or as may be called for by the Magistrate," and sub-section (3) of the same section enacts that "If the complainant, or the officer conducting the prosecution, or the accused, applies to the Magistrate to issue process to compel the attendance of any witness * * * * * the Magistrate shall issue such process unless, for reasons to be recorded, he deems it unnecessary to do so." It will be observed that sub section (1) contemplates the production of evidence by the prosecution or by the accused, without the aid of the Magistrate: sub-section 3 contemplates the intervention of the Magistrate to secure the attendance of witnesses and in regard to this evidence, the Magistrate has a discretion, for reasons to be recorded by him, to refuse to issue process, if he deems it unnecessary to do so. When, therefore, section 210 requires "the evidence referred to in section 208 sub-sections (1) and (3)" to be recorded before a charge is drawn up, it does not require the Magistrate to record the evidence of witnesses whom, in the exercise of the discretion given by subsection (3), he has deemed it unnecessary to summon. This procedure appears to be convenient and reasonable, whereas the procedure contended for by the accused, viz., that he may delay asking the Magistrate to summon his witnesses until the last minute before the charge is drawn up and then require him to summon and examine his witnesses, would lead to undue delay in the commitment of cases and the evils which such delay would entail. The proceeding before the Magistrate is only an inquiry preliminary to the trial and, while the law in order to avoid unnecessary commitments, is careful to require the Magistrate to examine any witness produced before him by the accused, and provides for the Magistrate also summoning and examining witnesses for the defence before a charge is drawn up and even gives the Magistrate a discretion (section 212) to examine witnesses for the defence after the charge is drawn up and to then cancel the charge and discharge the accused (section 213), it does not compel a Magistrate to summon and examine witnesses for the defence after a charge had been drawn up or even before the charge had been drawn up, if the Magistrate, for reasons to be recorded, deems it unnecessary to do so.

This distinction between the duty of a Magistrate in regard to evidence produced before him by the accused and evidence not produced before him, but which the accused desires him to obtain by the issue of process, has not always, we think, been borne in mind by the Courts and the omission seems to have led the learned Chief Justice of the Allahabad High Court, Emperor v. Muhamad Hadi (2), to state the rule in terms wider than those of the Code and wider also than those used in Queen-Empress v. Ahmadi (1), which he refers to in support of his statement of the rule. (See also the unreported decision of this Court, Criminal Miscellaneous Petition No. 298 of 1911). Mr. Sarma for the Public Prosecutor has drawn our attention to the case of Phanindranath Mitra v. Emperor (3), in which it is held that section 347 of the Criminal Procedure Code lays down that when a Magistrete has made up his mind to commit an accused for trial, 'he shall stop further proceedings' and commit the accused for trial, and that this section is not to be read as subject to the provisions in sections 203 to 210, to which we have referred. We are unable to accept this view or to rely on section 347 in support of the Magistrate's action.

Having regard to the subject-matter of section 346 and section 347 and to the corresponding section in the Code of 1872 [see section 221 of that Code and Empress v. Ilahi Baksh (4)], we think that the directions in section 347 to "stop further proceedings" does not justify a Magistrate in disregarding the directions in sections 208 to 210, but only requires him to stop proceeding with the case as a trial and instead to commit the case to the Sessions for trial by that Court "under the provisions hereinbefore contained" i. e., under the provisions of sections 208 to 210 and the other provisions in Chapter XVIII of the Code. In the present case, we agree with the Magistrate that the applition by the accused to summon and examine their witnesses was so long delayed that the Magistrate was justified in refusing to accede to it at that stage. We, therefore, see no reason to quash the commitment.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 260—Practice—Summary trial—Cattle-lifting.

Cattle-lifting is a serious offence and should not be tried summarily.

Report made by the District Magistrate, Sukkur, under the provisions of section 438, Criminal Procedure Code, for enhancement of sentence in a case of theft of cattle summarily tried by the Resident Magistrate, Rohri.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 110—Meaning and object of section—Security demanded from person not "resident" within jurisdiction.

The expression "any person within the local limits" in section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code, means any person who is within the local limits at the time the Magistrate takes action under the section.

The object of the section is to prevent crime and that object would be defeated if its scope were restricted to persons residing within the jurisdiction of the Magistrate.

Ketaboi v. Queen-Empress, 27 C. 993, dissented from.

Consequently, a Magistrate has jurisdiction to take security from a person who resides outside the jurisdiction of the Magistrate but is found within the local limits of his jurisdiction.

Petition, under sections 435 and 439 of the Criminal Procedure Code, praying the High Court to revise the judgment of the Sessions Judge of Chingleput, in Criminal Miscellaneous Case No. 12 of 1904, referred under section 123 (2), Criminal Procedure Code, by the Joint Magistrate of Chingleput, Criminal Miscellaneous Case No. 30 of 1904, on the file of the Joint Magistrate of Chingleput.

Messrs. E. R. Osborne, Counsel, and K. Kuppusami Aiyar, for the Petitioners.

The Public Prosecutor, Contra.

ORDER.—It is urged by Counsel for the petitioners that some of the persons, who have been required to give security for good behaviour, reside outside the jurisdiction of the Magistrate who took action under section 110, Criminal Procedure Code, and our attention is drawn to the case of Ketaboi v. Queen-Empress (1).

(1) 27 C. 993.

In that case, it was held that, according to the true construction of section 110, the Magistrate would have no jurisdiction to deal with the case unless the person proceeded against was "residing within the local jurisdiction of the Magistrate".

With all respect to the learned Judges who decided that case, we are not prepared to follow their decision. The words of the section are,—"Whenever.....a Magistrate receives information that any person within the local limits of his jurisdiction.....is by habit a robber" and so forth, he may proceed under the section. Had the Legislature intended to restrict the jurisdiction of the Magistrate to persons residing within the local jurisdiction, nothing would have been easier than to have said so; but the Legislature has refrained from imposing this limitation, and we are not justified in importing it into law. The law simply says "any person within the local limits", and this we understand to mean any person who is within the local limits at the time when the Magistrate takes action under the section. The object of the section is the prevention of crime, and its object would, in our opinion, be liable to be defeated if its scope were restricted to persons residing within the Magistrate's jurisdiction. As the Sessions Judge points out, if that were so, we should have this absurdity that the Magistrates in British India would have no power to proceed under the section against bad characters, no matter how desperate and dangerous they might be, who reside in French or other Foreign Territory, though they might infest in villages in British India and be well known to the authorities as habitual thieves; nor would any Magistrate have power to proceed against those gangs of criminals who have no residence anywhere but wander from district to district throughout the year.

We dismiss the petition.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 528—Order of transfer made by Sub-Divisional Magistrate—Appeal to District magistrate not maintainable—Jurisdiction.

A District Magistrate cannot set aside an order of transfer passed by a Sub-Divisional Magistrate.

Raghunatha Pandaram v. Emperor, 26 M. 130 relied upon.

Application for revision against an order of the District Magistrate of Badaun.

Mr. G. W. Dillon, for the Applicant.

The Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application on revision, contesting the order of the learned District Magistrate of Badaun, dated the 1st of July 1912. That order was made under the following circumstances:—Azhar Husain filed a complaint against Iltfat Husain alias Altaf Husain, under section 323, Indian Penal Code, in the Court of the Tahsildar of Sahsawan. Azhar Husain and the person accused by him live in Sahsawan. Altaf Husain filed a counter-complaint against Azhar Husain and others in the Court of Munshi Sharafat Ullah Khan, Deputy Magistrate. The Tahsildar recorded the evidence for Azhar Husain and framed a charge sheet against Altaf Husain. No evidence has yet been recorded in connection with the counter-complaint of the latter. Altaf Husain moved the Sub-Divisional Officer to transfer the case pending in the Court of the Tahsildar to the Court of Munshi Sharfat Ullah Khan. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate, without calling upon Azhar Husain to show cause, granted the application of Altaf Husain and transferred the case to the Court of Munshi Sharafat Ullah Khan. Thereupon, Azhar Husain filed a petition before the District Magistrate objecting to the transfer of his case from the Court of the Tahsildar. The learned District Magistrate cancelled the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate and transferred both the cases from the Court of Munshi Sharafat Ullah Khan to that of the Tahsildar. Altaf Husain has come up to this Court in revision. It is contended on his behalf that the District Magistrate and the Sub-Divisional Magistrate have co-ordinate powers of transfer under section 523, Criminal Procedure Code, and that the District Magistrate could not sit in appeal on an order of transfer passed by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate. This contention is supported by Raghunatha Pandaram v. Emperor (1). The order of the District Magistrate, dated the 1st of July 1912, was, no doubt, illegal. But the effect of the setting aside of that order would be that the case, which was instituted in the Court of the Tahsildar, would remain on the file of Munshi Sharafat Ullah Khan and the other case which was instituted in the Court of the latter would remain on the file of the Tahsildar. For the order of the learned District Magistrate, which related to the transfer of the case which was originally instituted in the Court of Munshi Sharafat Ullah Khan, cannot be questioned on any ground. However, as the order of the learned District Magistrate is illegal, it cannot be upheld and it is set aside. But I think that the two cases should be tried in one Court and as the Court of the Tahsildar is situate in Sahsawan where the parties reside, I direct that both the cases be transferred to his Court for disposal.

Revision allowed.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 300, Exception 2—Culpable homicide—Firing at person mistaken for thief—Fatal injury—Offence.

The accused fired at a person a gun loaded with a slug, one inch long, in the mistaken belief that he was a thief: the shot was fired in order to protect certain fruit from being stolen. The shot resulted in the death of the person fired at. It was found that the accused had no reason to apprehend anything more serious than the theft of certain fruit, and that he must have known that the shot was likely to cause death:

MEAJAN v. SHARAFATULLAH KHAN.

Held, that the accused was not entitled to the benefit of the second exception to section 300 of the Penal Code.

Appeal against the order of the Court of Session of South Malabar, in Case No. 24 of the Calendar for 1912.

Mr. L. A. Govindaragava Iyer, Acting Public Prosecutor, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The evidence leaves no doubt that the accused fired at the deceased, who was one of his own watchmen, mistaking him for a thief and inflicted a fatal wound in the chest, from which deceased died almost immediately. The real question is, whether the accused may be given the benefit of exception 2 to section 300, Indian Penal Code; and, after careful consideration, we must agree with the Sessions Judge in holding that he cannot.

From the evidence of prosecution 2nd witness, it is clear that the accused had no reason to apprehend any thing more serious than the advent of thief or thieves intending to steal his cocoanuts or jack fruit; and it cannot be contended that it was necessary to shoot such a thief in order to defend his property, especially as accused had assembled no less than five men to help him in guarding his tope. That accused in firing at deceased must have known himself to be likely to cause the man's death, admits of no doubt; the gun is a handy, serviceable weapon, and it was loaded not with a small shot, but with a slug, an inch long. There was moonlight and deceased was struck full in the chest from a distance of about 25 yards. It is possible that the learned Sessions Judge puts it somewhat too strongly in saying that the object of the shot was expressly to kill the thief, but it seems clear that accused fired, knowing that he was likely to cause a fatal wound and not caring whether he did so or not.

The concluding words of exception 2 to section 300, Indian Penal Code, prevent his being given the benefit of that provision of law.

We must, therefore, confirm the conviction and sentence and dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

The placing of haystacks and manure on another man's land need not necessarily amount to annoyance. It is not annoyance in law. It may be annoyance in fact. To convict an accused of criminal trespass, it must be clearly found that he intended to cause annoyance.

The distinction between civil and criminal trespass should not be lost sight of.

JUDGMENT.—This Rule must be made absolute on the ground on which it was issued. The explanation of the Magistrate admits that there is no finding that the accused's claim was in the nature of a sham or pretext. It may have been or it may not have been so, the only finding is that the land was in the possession of the complainant. The placing of haystacks and manure in another man's land need not necessarily be annoyance. It is not annoyance in law. It may be annoyance in fact. If it is annoyance in fact, then it must be clearly found in the judgment not only that it is annoyance but that it was intended by the accused to be annoyance. There is no such finding in this judgment and there is no other possible ground upon which a purely civil trespass can be treated as criminal trespass. The distinction between civil trespass and criminal trespass is one which is lost sight of by too many of the Subordinate Magistrates.

The conviction and sentence are set aside and the fine, if paid, wil be refunded.

Security—Good behaviour—Habitual offender—Notice to show cause—"By habit" a thief—Notice stating, "by general repute" a thief, whether bad—Person not misled or prejudiced by terms of order—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 110, 112, 117, 118.

In an order drawn up under section 112 of the Criminal Procedure Code, it was stated that as it appeared to the Magistrate that the opposite party was "by general repute" (instead of "by habit" as required by section 110) a thief, he was called upon to show cause why he should not give security. The evidence was directed mainly to show that he was a habitual thief and his cross-examination was directed to refute the evidence to that effect:

Held, that the inquiry provided for by sections 117 and 118 of the Criminal Procedure Code was not strictly limited by the precise terms of the order drawn up under section 112, and that as the opposite party was not misled or prejudiced by the terms of the order, no ground existed for granting him any relief.

Rule against the order of the Sessions Judge of Midnapore, dated March 19th, 1912, setting aside, under section 123 of the Criminal Procedure Code, that of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Tamluk, dated February 10th, 1912, by which he bound down the Opposite Party under section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Babu Srish Chandra Chowdhury, Junior Government Pleader, for the Petitioner.

Babu Khirod Lal Sen, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—One Kadir Mirza was ordered by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Tamluk, under section 118 of the Criminal Procedure Code, to give security for his good behaviour for a period of two years. The case was referred in due course, under section 123 of the Code, to the Sessions Judge who, while holding that there was good evidence for binding the man down, set aside the order on the ground that, "unfortunately the proceedings were very defective." The defect in them seems to consist of this, that it is stated in the order drawn up under section 112 of the Code that, as it appeared to the Magistrate that Kadir was "by general repute" a thief and burglar, he was called upon as such to show cause why he should not give security. The point is that he ought to have been called upon to show cause as being "by habit" a thief and burglar, and that, as he was not so addressed, he could not be bound down under that description.

We find that the evidence was directed mainly to show that Kadir Mirza was a habitual thief and burglar, and that his cross-examination was directed to refute the evidence to that effect. Moreover, we are not prepared to hold that the inquiry provided for by sections 117 and 118 of the Code is strictly limited by the precise terms of the order drawn up under section 112. Section 117 provides that after an order under section 112 has been read or explained to the person concerned, "the Magistrate shall proceed to inquire into the truth of the information upon which he has acted, and to take such further evidence as may appear necessary;" and section 118 provides in general terms that "if, upon such inquiry, it is proved that it is necessary for maintaining good behaviour that the person, in respect of whom the inquiry is made, should execute a bond, with or without sureties, the Magistrate shall make an order accordingly." No doubt, if the person eventually bound down could show that he was misled or prejudiced by the terms of the order drawn up under section 112, there would be a clear case for granting him relief, but as we have already shown, there can be no question here of the petitioner having been misled or in any way prejudiced.

The Rule is, therefore, made absolute; and we direct that the order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate be restored, that Kadir Mirza be required to execute a bond for rupees two hundred for his good behaviour for a term of two years, with two sureties each in the sum of rupees one hundred, and that in default he be committed to Jail.

Rule made absolute.

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), s. 130—Pro-note executed by managing member of Hindu family—Endorsee of such pro-note, whether can sue members other than maker of pro-note—Endorsement whether assignment of actionable claim.

The endorsee of a pro-note executed by the managing member of an undivided Hindu family, cannot sue the other members of the family: he can only sue the maker of the note or, his legal representatives, after his death, inasmuch as the mere endorsement is not anassignment of an actionable claim under section 130 of the Transfer of Property Act.

Appeal against the decree of the City Civil Court, Madras, in O. S. No. 2 of 1910.

FACTS.—The plaintiff brought this suit as endorsee of a promissory-note executed by one P. Ponniah Chetty, deceased, the brother of defendants Nos. 1 and 2 and the husband of the third defendant, payable to M. Ethirajammal and M. Seethammal or order. The plaintiff alleged that Ponniah Chetty, the maker of the note, and defendants Nos. 1 and 2 were members of an undivided family and the debt in question having been borrowed for a family trade was binding on them. The plaint also prayed in the alternative that a decree might be passed as against the assets of the deceased in the hands of the defendants.

The following issue was raised in the case: "Is plaintiff, as endorsee, entitled to sue the 1st and 2nd defendants" assuming the pro-note was executed on behalf of the family? Under this issue, the question for consideration was, "whether the plaintiff by the endorsement of the pro-note in his favour has not only become the holder of the note but also the assignee of the actionable claim which the person from whom he obtained the note had against Ponniah Chetty and his undivided brothers, the 1st and 2nd defendants." The City Judge answered this question in the negative and held that, as far as defendants Nos. 1 and 2, impleaded as undeceased co-parceners, were concerned, he suit, in so far as it was based on the pro-note itself as the cause of action, could not be maintained and that it could only be maintained on the independent cause of action founded on the debt alleged to be contracted by Ponniah Chetty for a family purpose. The City Civil Judge held that only by an assignment in the manner prescribed by section 130, Transfer of Property Act, could such right to proceed against defendants Nos. 1 and 2 be acquired and that the endorsement could not operate both as a negotiation of the note in so far as the maker of the note was concerned, entitling the endorsee to enforce it according to its tenor against the maker as well as the endorser and even conferring a better title on him than the endorser had, and also as a mere assignment of the debt subject to all liabilities and equities which the transferor of the debt was subject to, so far as the maker's undivided brothers were concerned against whom it could not be enforced according to the tenor of the note. In the result, the Judge gave a decree to the plaintiffs for the plaint amount against the assets of the deceased in the hands of his widow the 3rd defendant and the properties belonging to the deceased exclusively and taken possession of by defendants Nos. 1 and 2. It was also ordered that Nos. 1 and 2 defendants were not liable either personally or to the extent of their joint property.

The plaintiff preferred this appeal to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.—There is no transfer to the plaintiff of the claims of Ethirajammal and Seethammal against the members of the family under section 130 of the Transfer of Property Act. The endorsement of the promissory-note entitles the plaintiff to sue only Ponniah and after his death his legal representatives. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 152—Amendment of decree—Costs assessed on wrong principle—Proper remedy—Review—Appeal—Revision.

A decree can only be amended if one of the reasons specified in the Civil Procedure Code as justifying amendment is established.

The revisional powers of the High Court cannot be exercised ultra vires and without authority.

An application was made to have an arbitration award, made out of Court filed, but it was dismissed with costs on 18th June 1904. A decree was drawn up in which Pleader's fee was assessed ad valorem on the value of the suit for purposes of jurisdiction. On the 12th August 1911, an application was made to amend the decree by substituting a smaller sum as Pleader's fee:

Held, (1) that there was no reason for amendment as the decree was not at variance with the judgment and there was no clerical or arithmetical error nor any error arising from any accidental slip or omission,

(2) that the applicant's proper remedy was by review or by appeal on the ground that a matter of principle was involved and that costs had been assessed on an erroneous principle;

(3) that the applicant could not ask for amendment several years after his proper remedy had been barred by limitation.

Petition, under section 70 (a) (b) of Act XVIII of 1884, as amended by Act XXV of 1899, for revision of the order of the District Judge, Lahore, dated 25th October 1911, rejecting petitioner's application for amendment of the decree passed by the District Judge, Lahore, dated 18th June 1904.

Lala Nihal Chand, for the Petitioner

Mr Brij Lal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application for revision, under section 70 (1) (a) of the Courts Act, of an order refusing to amend a decree under section 206 of the Code of late Civil Procedure, as amended, i.e., under section 152 of the Code now in force. The applicant applied to the Court below on the 9th February 1904 that an award made out of Court be filed in Court and that a decree with costs be passed in his favour in terms of the award. The application was registered as Suit No. 13 of 1904 and it was recorded that the plaint was presented on the 9th February 1904. The suit was valued at Rs. 20,000 by the applicant. On the 18th June 1906, the Court delivered judgment that "the plaintiff's application, therefore, that a decree be passed in accordance with the terms of the award will stand dismissed with costs," and a decree assessing Pleader's fee at Rs. 550, the ad volorem fee on Rs. 20,000, was framed.

On the 12th August 1911, the applicant filed a "petition under section 206, Civil Procedure Code as amended by Act V of 1908," for amendment of the decree by substituting Rs. 10 or Rs. 11 as Pleader's fee on the ground that no Pleader's fee was fixed in the judgment and it was "further prayed that the value of the suit for purposes of jurisdiction is Rs. 20,000," etc.

The Court below rejected this application on the ground that it did not see any good reason for amendment.

This order cannot, in my opinion, be reversed under section 206 of the late, or section 152 of the present, Code. Assuming that the assessment of Pleader's fee was opposed to Chapter I, No. 12, Rule X of Rules and Orders of this Court, at page 84 of Volume III, Edition of 1911, and of this I am by no means satisfied—the decree was not at variance with the judgment and there was no clerical or arithmetical error in the decree, and no error arising from any accidental slip or omission.

The Court below obviously treated the application under section 525 as a suit, valued at Rs. 20,000 and assessed the Pleader's fee on that valuation and the applicant, subsequently, applied for transfer of execution proceedings from the Subordinate Judge's Court on the ground that the value of the suit was Rs. 20,000. The applicant's remedy was by application for review or by appeal, on the ground that a matter of principle was involved and that costs had been assessed on an erroneous principle.

Having failed to adopt either of these remedies, the applicant was not entitled to come into Court several years after both remedies had become barred by limitation, and the order rejecting the application for amendment of decree was fully justified.

Khoda Bakhsh v. Mowla Bakhsh (1), Kalu v. Litu (2) and Muhammad Sulaiman Khan v. Muhammad Yar Khan (3), cited for the applicant, do not help him.

The revisional powers of this Court cannot be exercised ultra vires and without authority, merely because the fee allowed may seem excessive, and a decree cannot be amended unless one of the reasons specified in the Code as justifying amendment has been established. No refusal to exercise jurisdiction and no material irregularity has been established in this case. There has been a strict compliance with the provisions of the Code. For these reasons, the application is dismissed with costs.

Counsel's fee thirty-two rupees.

Petition dismissed.

Limitation—Suit against Railway Company for compensation for loss of goods—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Arts. 30, 31—Burden of proof of time of loss—Sufficiency of notice of claim—Railways Act (IX of 1890), s. 75—Modes prescribed by rules.

In a suit for compensation for the loss of goods against a Railway Company, the burden of proving when the goods were lost is on the Company.

Where it is not proved that the goods were lost more than one year before the institution of the suit, neither Article 30 nor Article 31 bars such a suit if it is brought within one year from the date of refusal to deliver.

The modes of service of notice prescribed by the Railways Act are not exhaustive.

Where a mode of service of notice of a claim for compensation is prescribed by the rules of a Railway Company, and such rules are complied with, the Company cannot plead insufficiency of notice. Notice to the Traffic Manager is good notice when allowed by the rules of the Railway Company.

Section 75 of the Railways Act does not apply where the value of a package entrusted to a Railway Company is not more than Rs. 100.

Appeal from the decree of the City Civil Court at Madras, in O. S. No. 148 of 1909.

Mr. D. Chamier, instructed by Messrs. David and Brightwell, for the Appellants.

Messrs. K. Narain Rau and K. Balakrishna Rau, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—We agree with the Judge that the plaintiffs' claim is not barred by limitation. The burden of proving when the goods were lost is on the Railway Company and they have not proved when they were lost. There is nothing in the evidence to show that they were lost more than one year before the institution of the suit. Article 30 of the Limitation Act does not, therefore, bar the suit; nor is the suit barred by Article 31. No time has been fixed for the delivery of the goods and the correspondence between the parties shows that the matter was being inquired into and the suit was brought within one year from the date of refusal to deliver. We are unable to say that the plaintiffs delayed more than one year from the expiry of a reasonable time within which, in the circumstances of the case, the goods should have been delivered.

The next question is whether the notice of the plaintiffs' claim for compensation was given within the period of six months allowed by the Railways Act. It is conceded that notice of such claim was given to the Traffic Manager. But it is contended that such notice is insufficient and that notice should have been given to the Agent or, at any rate, the notice, though given only to the Traffic Manager, should have reached the Agent within six months of the delivery of the goods to the Railway Company. We have held that the modes of service prescribed by the Railways Act are not exhaustive and we see no reason to differ from that judgment: Periannan Chetti v. South Indian Railway Co. (1). In the case before us, a rule has been made by the Company that all applications for loss should be made to the nearest Station Master and Traffic Manager, Dharwar. This rule has been complied with in this case. Mr. Chamier argues that this rule is confined to specific property lost. But looking to the rules that precede it, we see no reason to restrict the rule to such cases. If a mode of service is prescribed and such rule is complied with, it is not open to the Company to plead that the notice is insufficient.

It is also argued before us that the packages contained trinkets of the value of more than one hundred rupees. A few of the articles are apparently trinkets but their value is not more than one hundred rupees. Therefore, section 75 of the Railways Act does not apply. Lastly, it is contended that there is no reliable evidence of the value of goods despatched. The evidence is, no doubt, meagre and there are some suspicious circumstances. But we are unable to say that the Judge who heard the witnesses was wrong in believing that evidence.

We dismiss the appeal with costs.

Held, (1) that the attachment was an execution of process for enforcing the judgment which set time running under Article 164 of Act XV of 1877;

(2) that the money attached being moveable property not in possession of the judgment-debtor, it was only necessary to give notice to the person in possession of the same.

Application for revision against an order of the District Judge, Lucknow, dated 7th August 1911, upholding that of the Subordinate Judge, Lucknow, dated 8th May 1911.

Mr. Shahid Husain, for the Applicant.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application for revision of an order of the District Judge of Lucknow, upholding an order of Pandit Sitla Prasad, Subordinate Judge, refusing to admit an application to set aside an ex parte decree on the ground that it was time-barred. The facts are simple. An ex parte decree was passed against the applicant on the 31st May 1907, and on the 6th August 1907, the decree-holder applied for execution of the decree by attachment of certain money held in deposit by the decree-holder on behalf of the judgment-debtor. The money in question was attached on the 6th August 1907. Limitation was then governed by Article 164 of Act XV of 1877 and the time, in which an application could be filed for an order to set aside the ex parte judgment, was 30 days from the date of executing a process for enforcing the judgment. The attachment of the money in question was an execution of a process for enforcing a judgment. It is argued by the learned Counsel for the applicant that the attachment was of a debt not secured by a negotiable instrument and that as the money in question was owed by the decree-holder to the judgment-debtor and that as no notice had been issued to the judgment-debtor according to the provisions of section 268 of Act XIV of 1882, there has been no legal execution of a process for enforcing the judgment. I find against the applicant on this point. In my opinion, the money attached was moveable property not in possession of the judgment-debtor, and thus it was only necessary to give notice to the person in possession of the same. As the decree-holder was in possession of the money, no notice was necessary. For the above reasons, I find that this application was time-barred in 1907 and that, therefore, the Courts below were right in rejecting it. I dismiss this application accordingly.

Application dismissed.

Where the assignee of a decree has realised the decretal amount from the judgment-debtor in execution, the judgment-debtor, in the event of the decree being reversed on appeal, is entitled to recover back the money, even though the assignee was not brought on the record on appeal.

Tangi Joghi v. Hall, 23 M. 203, followed.

Latta Prasad v. Sadiq Hussain, 24 A. 288, dissented from.

A judgment-debtor wishing to appeal against the decree is not bound to make the assignee of the decree a party to his appeal. In the absence of fraud, the assignee of the decree is bound by the order of the Appellate Court.

The doctrine of lis pendens applies to an intermediate assignment of the original decree. The fact that the assignment was made before the appeal was filed cannot make any difference in this respect nor the fact that the judgment-debtor had knowledge of the assignment before he lodged his appeal.

A party cannot be heard to say that a procedure, to which he himself successfully objected in a former proceeding between himself and his adversary, was the proper procedure to be adopted by the latter.

Second appeal from the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Bellary, in A. S. No. 73 of 1908, presented against that of the Court of the District Munsif of Hospet, in O. S. No. 32 of 1908.

JUDGMENT.

ABDUR RAHIM, J.—This second appeal raises the question whether a judgment-debtor, from whom the assignee of a money-decree has realized the decretal amount in execution, is entitled to recover it back from him when the decree is afterwards reversed in appeal, if the assignee of the original decree was not brought on record in the appeal. I may mention that it is not necessary to consider the question whether the plaintiff could and should have sought his remedy for restitution by an application made to the Court which executed the decree, for he did make such application and it was on the objection of the defendant that he was driven to institute the present suit and the defendant cannot now be heard to say that the procedure to which he himself successfully objected was the proper procedure.

Upon the merits, what is urged in support of the judgment of the Subordinate Judge, who has decided against the plaintiff's claim, is that he not having impleaded the present defendant, who had obtained an assignment of the decree of the first Court, as a respondent in the appeal against the decree, the decree of the Appellate Court cannot bind him because it might be that the decision of the Appellate Court was the result of collusion between the present appellant and the original decree-holder, the assignor of the defendant. Now, no such fraud was ever pleaded and it is possible that if it was pleaded and proved that would be a sufficient answer to the suit. But, in the absence of fraud, it is difficult to see why the decree of the Appellate Court should not bind a person who has chosen to obtain an assignment of the decree of the first Court. It is not contended that a judgment-debtor wishing to appeal against the decree is bound to make the assignee of the decree a party to his appeal though it might be open to him to apply for an order to that effect. The judgment-debtor's right of appeal is in no way affected by any intermediate assignment of the first Court's decree. The assignee himself might apply to be brought on record in the appeal, and if he chose to leave the conduct of the appeal to the decree-holder, it does not stand to reason that it should be open to him to question the decree that may be passed by the Appellate Tribunal. It is the decree of the latter Court that is the final decree in the case being in substitution of the original decree and the doctrine of lis pendens clearly applies to an intermediate assignment of the original decree. The fact that the assignment was made before the appeal was filed cannot make any difference in this respect; [See Settappa Goundan v. Muthai Goundan (1)], nor, for reasons already stated, the fact that the judgment-debtor had knowledge of the assignment before he lodged his appeal.

On behalf of the respondent, much reliance is placed on Latta Prasad v. Sadiq Hussain (2), which is certainly a decision directly in his favour. On the other hand, the appellant cites, in support of his contention, the authority of Tangi Joghi v. Hall (3). With all respect to the learned Judges who decided the former case, we are unable to accept their view of the law. The main reasoning on which that ruling is based seems to be that, because in case the judgment-creditor himself had executed the decree of the first Court and made over the money realized to a third person, the judgment-debtor who succeeded in appeal could not follow the money in the hands of the third person, it must be held that where the assignee of the decree himself realized the decree in execution, the judgment-debtor would have no cause of action against him, when the original decree is reversed in appeal. In my opinion, the two cases are not based on the same legal considerations. Money is not ear-marked property and, therefore, in the first case, there is no principle of law according to which it can be followed in the hands of a third person. But the other case is quite different. Here, one person by a compulsory process of Court obtained money from another and it is afterwards declared by a superior tribunal that the original process was not justified. It seems to me that money so obtained under an invalid process of Court must be treated as money had and received to the use of the person from whom it was received. That is the principle, on which the doctrine of restitution, which underlies section 583 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882, rests. The decision in Tangi Joghi v. Hall (3), in my opinion, supports the distinction which we have drawn between a case where the act complained of and in respect of which restitution is sought was done by the agency of the Court and a case where such act was independent of any process of Court. There is no doubt that the property of which restitution was sought in the Madras case was immoveable property but the principle of the decision is, to my mind, equally applicable in a case like the present. That principle is well expressed in the observations of an American Court cited by the learned Judges in Doraisami Ayyar v. Annasami Ayyar (4):—"But the cases have no application where the party seeking to be restored to the possession has been wrongfully dispossessed by the agency of the Court. He does not stand in the position of the actor in a suit who seeks the aid of a Court to re-gain any possession lost by his own negligence or misfortune. On the contrary, he is out of possession only because the Court has wrongfully made room for him to get in .....". The plaintiff, in my opinion, is entitled to restitution. The decree of the lower Court must, therefore, be reversed and that of the District Munsif restored with costs in this Court and in the lower Appellate Court.

(3) 23 M. 203.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—I concur with my learned brother and I cannot usefully add anything to what he has said.

Hindu Law—Adoption—Dancing girl—Prostitute—Invalid adoption.

The adoption of a girl by a Hindu married woman is invalid, even though that woman was once a dancing girl. A dancing girl when married and leading a family life cannot be treated as a dancing girl.

Per Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—It is illegal for a prostitute to adopt a minor girl, and the illegality is, if possible, enhanced very much by a woman of the prostitute class, who has followed the practices of a moral family Hindu woman, trying to follow the practices of a prostitute herself and adopt a girl for herself. Such an adoption is a criminal act and on this ground also is illegal.

Prostitution is as repugnant to the Hindu religion as it is to the Christian or Muhammadan religion or laws.

Mr. V. C. Seshachariar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

SUNDARA AIYAR, J.—The argument in second appeal is that the 2nd defendant was adopted by Chinna Rangamma and that the adoption is valid as one made by a dancing girl. But the finding is that Chinna Rangamma was a married woman. It is not explained how she can be treated as a dancing girl. It is stated that as she belonged to the Bogum caste she could adopt a girl, whether she was a married woman or not. But no such custom is found to be established by either of the two Courts. I dismiss the second appeal with costs. I am not to be understood as conceding that an adoption made by a woman of the prostitute class would be valid at all.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—I should like to add that I dissent with the greatest respect from the case in Vengu v. Mahalinga (1). I approve of the decision of the Bombay High Court in Mathura Naiken v. Esu Naicken (2). I am also clearly of opinion that it is not only illegal to adopt girls by prostitutes but the illegality is, if posible, very much enhanced by a woman of the prostitute class, who has followed the practices of a moral family Hindu woman, trying to follow the practices of a prostitute herself and adopt a girl for herself. The adoption in the case of Vengu v. Mahalinga (1), seems to have taken place before the Indian Penal Code was enacted in 1860. The validity of the adoption in that case might be, therefore, supported on that ground as it was sought to be so supported in Kamalakshi v. Ramaswami Chetti (3); but I wish to dissent from Vengu v. Mahalinga (1) on the broad ground that an adoption of a minor girl by a prostitute belonging to a caste, which notoriously follows prostitution as a profession after the Penal Code came into force, is a criminal act and is on that ground also clearly illegal. I am also clearly of opinion that the authority of Vengu v. Mahalinga (1) has been reduced to a minimum by observations of the Privy Council in the case in Ghasiti v. Umrao Jan (4). Lord Hobhouse at page 156 of the report clearly expresses his approval of the case of Mathura Naicken v. Esu Naicken (2), though, of course, it might be said that His Lordship does not express any definite opinion as it was unnecessary to do so for the purposes of that case which related to Muhammadan prostitutes. His Lordship says 'that whatever may be the case as regards Hindus, as regards Muhammadans, prostitution is not looked upon by their religion or their laws with any more favourable eye than by the Christian religion and laws." As a Hindu, I wish to express respectfully but emphatically my opinion that prostitution is not looked on by the Hindu religion or its laws with any more favourable eye than by the Christian or Muhammadan religion or the Christian or Muhammadan Laws. When I was a Judicial Officer in Madura, I have had occasion to take evidence of old dancing girl witnesses in connection with dancing offices in temples and such witnesses have admitted that the so-called adopted girls are usually called 'Sirais' or captives, and that many such girls of different castes were purchased by old dancing girls during the famine of 1876. Prostitutes are, by the nature of their calling, frequently sterile and it is the countenance given to adoption by the Courts which has been recruiting the ranks of the caste of prostitutes instead of letting the caste gradually die a natural death.

Even if a prostitute belonging to the so-called dancing girl caste be allowed to adopt a girl on the ground that the caste custom allows it even as against the Shastras, it seems to me to go too far to allow plurality of adoptions as has been allowed by some decisions. Again, it is clear that in some castes, such as a section of the Kaikkalar castes and in the Bogum caste, a girl can be married as a Hindu and lead a family life though born a prostitute. In the present case, the 2nd defendant's foster-mother was so married and led a family life. The ordinary Hindu Law ought to be applied to such persons and not the law applying to the prostitutes. She and her husband were, therefore, clearly not legally entitled to adopt a girl and they ought to have adopted only a boy according to the ordinary Hindu Law. It is not alleged that 2nd defendant's foster-mother was a prostitute when she made the alleged adoption. Rather, it is alleged that both she and her husband adopted the 2nd defendant while they were leading a family life. Even if the foster-mother turned a prostitute (during her husband's life-time or after his death), she could not be allowed to adopt a girl having once adopted the ordinary Hindu Law. In some cases, ingenious theories have been propounded that the adoption by a prostitute must be considered to have been intended for her own spiritual benefit and not to continue the line of the prostitute profession. Why Courts should have been astute to bolster up evil customs thus by fancying or presuming the existence of high spiritual motive has been somewhat of a surprise to me. As far as I know, no spiritual benefit can accrue to a prostitute mother by the spiritual ministrations of her prostitute adopted daughter and even adopted sons are very poor substitutes for legitimate sons according to Hindu Law. With these observations, I agree in holding that this second appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Mr. J. P. C. Bhattacharji and Babu Aditya Prasad for Pandit Gokaran Nath Misra, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case are as follows:—The defendant Musammat Bhikhan and Khairat Ali mortgaged by a registered deed of mortgage, dated 17th May 1908, in lieu of Rs. 4,000, two houses situated in Lucknow City to Musammat Mahadei. The mortgage-deed bore interest at 9 per cent. that is Rs. 360 a year. On the same date, Musammat Mahadei gave to Musammat Bhikhan and Khairat Ali possession of the two houses for Rs. 30 a month, that is to say, for Rs. 360 a year, an amount equivalent to the amount reserved for the interest on the deed of mortgage. Musammat Mahadei has instituted the suit in question for arrears of rent of the said houses against Musammat Bhikhan and Khairat Ali in the Small Cause Court, Lucknow. The learned Judge of the Small Cause Court considers that the suit does not lie within his jurisdiction as he is of opinion that the amount secured by way of rent is really a portion of the interest due on the mortgage and that the suit must be brought upon the deed of mortgage. I express no opinion at the present stage on the merits of the case. I do not wish to come to a finding as to the interpretation of the terms of the deed of mortgage, as to the validity of the alleged deed of mortgage, as to the possibility of Musammat Mahadei being able to prove her claim for arrears of rent apart from the deed of lease set up. But, upon the general principle that a mortgagee can give a lease of mortgaged property to the mortgagor and can sue for the rent of such mortgaged property in the Court that would ordinarily hear suits for arrears of rent, I do not arrive at the same conclusion as the learned Judge of the Small Cause Court. In Mahmud-un-nisa v. Fakhr-ud-din Ahmad (1), Mr. Chamier has decided these points very clearly. After considering all the previous rulings on the subject, he came to the following conclusions:—"I know of no case in which a Court has held that a mortgagee cannot sue upon such a lease. It appears to me quite clear that a mortgagee can sue upon such a lease and I do not understand the argument that because the two persons stand in relation of mortgagor and mortgagee, they cannot at the same time occupy the position of lessee and lessor. Usually, an arrangement such as the parties made in this case is intended to provide the mortgagee with an alternative remedy for the non-payment of the interest due on the mortgage, and I can see no reason why the intention of the parties should not be given effect to.....I have no doubt that the proper view to take of transactions of this nature is that the relation of landlord and tenant is created for the benefit of the mortgagee, that the latter is not bound to avail himself of the remedies which accrue to him therefrom and that if he does not choose to avail himself of them, he may still recover all that he is entitled to in a suit upon the mortgage." The principle, which commended itself to Mr. Chamier, and which commends itself to me, is that if the mortgagee chooses to put the mortgagor in possession of the mortgaged premises on payment of rent, the mortgagee is at perfect liberty to recover the arrears of such rent as arrears of rent through the Court from which such arrears are ordinarily recoverable and that it is not necessary for the mortgagee to include these sums in a suit upon the deed of mortgage. I accordingly allow this application and direct that the plaint be returned to the learned Judge of the Small Cause Court with directions to re-admit it under its original number and to hear the suit upon its merits. Costs will follow the result.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 24 (4)—Provincial Small Cause Courts Act (IX of 1887), s. 33—Court invested with Small Cause Court powers, whether a Small Cause Court—Transfer from such Court to Court not invested with Small Cause Court powers—Further transfer to another similar Court—Decree of latter, whether appealable—Direction by transferring Court to try as original suit, effect of.

In section 24 (4), Civil Procedure Code, the expression "a Court of Small Causes" means not only a Court constituted as a Small Cause Court under Act IX of 1887 but also a Court invested with Small Cause jurisdiction. The mere investiture of a Court with Small Cause powers makes it a Small Cause Court for the purposes of the section. Therefore, as soon as a case is transferred from a Court invested with Small Cause Court powers to a Court not so invested, the latter becomes a Small Cause Court for the purposes of the suit, and if the suit is further transfered to another Court, this third Court also is a Small Cause Court for the purposes of the suit and no appeal would lie against its decree in the suit.

Per Sundara Aiyar, J.—If a District Court in transferring a Small Cause suit from a Court invested with Small Cause Court powers, to a Court not so invested, directs the latter to try the suit as an original suit, the direction is invalid, though it does not affect the validity of the order of transfer itself.

Petition, under section 115 of Act V of 1908, praying the High Court to revise the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Tuticorin, in A. S. No. 156 of 1908, preferred against that of the Court of the Additional District Munsif of Tinnevelly, in O. S. No. 132 of 1907.

Mr. Krishna Aiyer, for the Petitioner.

Mr. S. Srinivasa Aiyar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

SUNDARA AIYAR, J.—The question for decision in this civil revision petition is whether an appeal lay to the District Court of Tinnevelly from the judgment of the Additional District Munsif of Tinnevelly in Original Suit No. 132 of 1907. The Subordinate Judge, to whom the appeal was transferred for disposal, states that the suit was originally in the Subordinate Judge's Court of Tuticorin as Small Cause No. 1484 of 1906; from that Court it, was transferred to the District Munsif's Court of Srivaikuntam. The order of transfer contained a direction that the suit should be tried as an original suit along with another suit. It was again transferred from the latter Court to the Additional District Munsif's Court of Tinnevelly. The Additional District Munsif dismissed the suit and the plaintiff preferred an appeal to the District Court. A preliminary objection was taken before the Subordinate Judge that the appeal did not lie, as the decision of the Additional District Munsif must be taken to have been that of a Small Cause Court. The Subordinate Judge overruled this objection. Now, section 24 clause (4) of the Civil Procedure Code lays down:—"The Court trying any suit transferred or withdrawn under this section from a Court of Small Causes shall, for the purposes of such suit, be deemed to be a Court of Small Causes. The first clause of the section authorises the District Court to transfer the suit to any Court subordinate to it and competent to try or dispose of the same. That the District Munsif's Court of Srivaikuntam and the Additional Munsif's Court of Tinnevelly were both Courts competent to dispose of the suit cannot be doubted. The argument of the appellant is that by virtue of clause (4) of the section, the decision of the Tinnevelly Additional Munsif was the decision of a Court of Small Causes, and, consequently, under section 27 of the Small Cause Courts Act, no appeal lay from his decision. It is first argued for the respondent that the transfer to the Tinnevelly Additional District Munsif's Court was from the Srivaikuntam Court and that that Court was not a Court of Small Causes within the meaning of section 24 of the Civil Procedure Code and that the Tinnevelly Additional Munsif's Court could not, therefore, be said to have tried a suit transferred from a Court of Small Causes. It is, no doubt, the fact that the Srivaikuntam Munsif had not been invested with jurisdiction to try Small Cause suits of the value of this suit. But there are two answers to the respondent's argument. One is, that under clause 4 of section 24 of the Civil Procedure Code, the Srivaikuntam Court was a Small Cause Court with respect to this suit when it was transferred to it from the Subordinate Judge's Court of Tuticorin. The argument that it would become a Small Cause Court only at, and for the purpose of, the trial cannot be upheld. If this contention be sound, in what capacity could the Srivaikuntam Court pass orders in the suit before the trial? It cannot be said that it could do so except as the Court trying the suit. The other answer is that the clause does not say that the transfer should be immediately from a Court of Small Causes and the suit while pending in the Additional Munsif's Court of Tinnevelly may be said to have been one transferred from the Subordinate Judge's Court of Tuticorin. The construction contended for for the respondent would hardly be in accordance with the object of clause (4), which is to provide for the trial as a Small Cause Court of suits which are transferred from Courts of Small Causes. All this is, of course, on the assumption that the Subordinate Court of Tinnevelly which was invested with the powers of a Small Cause Court was a Court of Small Causes within the meaning of section 24 of the Civil Procedure Code. The most important contention of the respondent is that the Subordinate Judge's Court of Tinnevelly cannot be regarded as a Court of Small Causes. It is, of course, not disputed that the Court was not a Small Cause Court constituted under the provisions of Act IX of 1887 by the authority competent to constitute Small Cause Courts under that Act. It was invested with Small Cause jurisdiction by the Government of Madras under section 28 of the Madras Civil Courts Act. The respondent argues that clause (4) directs to be deemed as Courts of Small Causes only Courts trying suits transferred from what are strictly Small Cause Courts and not from Courts invested with Small Cause jurisdiction. The point for decision is, can the Subordinate Judge's Court of Tuticorin be regarded as a Small Cause Court within the meaning of section 24 of the Civil Procedure Code? Mr. S. Srinivasa Aiyar, who has argued the case ably and very fully for the respondent, has drawn our attention to section 7 of the Civil Procedure Code and to Order L where the Code speaks specifically of Courts invested with Small Cause jurisdiction along with Small Cause Courts and he argues that, therefore, section 24, when it speaks of Small Cause Courts, cannot be taken to include Courts invested with Small Cause jurisdiction but not constituted as Small Cause Courts. Now, there can be no doubt that one object of providing in section 24, clause (4), that a Court trying a suit transferred from a Small Cause Court shall be deemed a Small Cause Court is to make the decision of the Court final in the same manner as the decision of the Court from which the suit was transferred would be. The finality of the decision of a Small Cause Court is enacted by section 27 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act. Section 24, Civil Procedure Code, must clearly be read with the provisions of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act. Now, turning to the latter Act, section 32 extends to Courts invested with Small Cause jurisdiction various provisions applicable to Small Causes, viz., the class of suits over which jurisdiction is to be exercised, the exclusion of the jurisdiction of other Courts in those suits, the practice and procedure applicable to Small Cause Courts and the finality of the decrees and orders passed by those Courts, etc. Section 35 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, like section 7 of the Civil Procedure Code, refers to cases where a Court of Small Causes or a Court invested with the jurisdiction of a Court of Small Causes, has, from any cause ceased to have jurisdiction with respect to a case, and it makes provision as to which Court is to have jurisdiction in such cases. If the matter had stood here, there would be very much force in the respondent's objection that the mere investiture of a Court with Small Cause powers would not make it a Small Cause Court. But section 33 provides that "a Court invested with the jurisdiction of a Court, of Small Causes with respect to the exercise of that jurisdiction and the same Court with respect to it he exercise of its jurisdiction in suits of a civil nature which are not cognizable by a Court of Small Causes, shall, for the purposes of this Act, and the Code of Civil Procedure be deemed to be different Courts." It is difficult to give a proper meaning to this section except by interpreting it as laying down that a Court invested with Small Cause jurisdiction becomes for the purpose of its cognizance of suits, which it is competent to try as Small Cause suits, a Small Cause Court. This is clear from the expression "for the purposes of this Act and the Code of Civil Procedure." What can be the meaning for saying that a Court invested with Small Cause jurisdiction is different from itself trying regular suits for the purposes of the Small Cause Courts Act except that it is to be regarded as a Small Cause Court? The Civil Procedure Code makes certain sections of the Code not applicable to Small Cause Courts. The reference to the Civil Procedure Code is evidently to make the excepted sections of the Civil Procedure Code applicable to Courts invested with Small Cause jurisdiction. The respondent's Vakil was invited to mention any object that this section could have in view if it was not to make Courts invested with Small Cause jurisdiction, Small Cause Courts. He was not able to make any suggestion that we could accept. It is true that section 32 would, strictly speaking, be unnecessary on this interpretation of section 33 and that the reference to Courts invested with Small Cause jurisdiction in section 35 might also be said to be unnecessary. But apparently the Legislature considered it better to mention specifically Courts invested with Small Cause jurisdiction in section 35 and to provide expressly in section 32 for the rules of procedure and finality of decisions and the other provisions of that section applying to Courts invested with Small Cause jurisdiction. At any rate, it seems to be impossible to give due effect to section 33, unless it is regarded as making Courts invested with Small Cause jurisdiction Small Cause Courts. On this construction of section 33, there can be no doubt that the Subordinate Judge's Court of Tuticorin in exercising Small Cause jurisdiction must be regarded as a Small Cause Court. So far as the reason for the rule laid down in section 24 is concerned, there is no ground for distinction between a transfer from a Court of Small Causes and a Court invested with Small Cause jurisdiction. The decisions of both classes of Courts are final. The object of clause 4 of section 24 is to give finality also to the decision of the Court to which the suit is transferred. Section 24 admittedly has the effect of giving the finality of a Small Cause Court's judgment to decisions of Courts not constituted Small Cause Courts. If this could be done with respect to suits transferred from Small Cause Courts, it is difficult to see why it should not be done also with respect to those transferred from Courts invested with Small Cause powers. It may be, as pointed out in Dulal Chandra Deb v. Ram Narain Deb (1), a grave thing to take away the right of appeal where the Legislature has not considered the desirability of investing any particular Court with Small Cause jurisdiction, but the gravity applies equally to cases where the transfer is from Small Cause Courts. Rightly or wrongly, the Legislature has thought it proper to give finality to the decisions not only of Small Cause jurisdiction but to the decisions of a third class of Courts, viz., of Courts to which a suit of Small Cause nature is transferred in certain cases. The exact scope of such cases is immaterial in considering the gravity of what is done by the Legislature. The case of Dulal Chandra Deb v. Ram Narain Deb (1), no doubt, contains a strong dictum in respondent's favour. The exact point in the case was whether when a Munsif having Small Cause jurisdiction was succeeded by one having no jurisdiction, an appeal would lie from the decision of the latter who tried the suit on the regular side. There can be no doubt that section 24 would have application to such a case and an appeal would lie. Ramchandra v. Ganesh (2), undoubtedly, is in respondent's favour. But, although sections 32 and 35 are commented on in that judgment, no reference is made to section 33. It may be observed that Dulal Chandra Deb v. Ram Narain Deb (1) also makes no reference to that section. Mangal Sen v. Rup Chand (3), which followed an earlier Allahabad decision, is, on the other hand, in appellant's favour. These are really the only decisions in point. In Bhagvan Dayalji v. Balu (4), Mr. Justice West observed that a Court exercising Small Cause jurisdiction by special investiture of powers and the same Court exercising its ordinary original jurisdiction may be regarded as two different Courts. Akshay Kumar Shaha v. Hira Ram Dosad (5), cited for the appellant, is not really in point as the learned Judges there decided the case on a consideration of section 32 of the Act. The view adopted by the Allahabad High Court appears to be the right one.

Another question arises for decision in consequence of the District Court transferring the suit from the Subordinate Judge's Court of Tuticorin to the Srivaikuntam Court, directing the latter Court to try it as an original suit.

Having regard to section 24 of the Civil Procedure Code, it had apparently no power to do so. It was suggested during the arguments that the order of transfer should, therefore, be regarded as wholly void. But this does not appear to be the correct view to be taken. The District Judge in making the direction must be taken to have acted in excess of jurisdiction. He had power to transfer the suit, but he had no jurisdiction in doing so to order that the suit should be tried on the regular side contrary to the provision in section 24 of the Civil Procedure Code that the Court trying a suit transferred from the Small Cause Court shall be deemed to be a Small Cause Court. The direction to try it as a regular suit must be regarded as invalid but it does not affect the order of transfer itself. See Bayley on Jurisdiction, Vol. I, section 29. The decision of the Munsif was, therefore, that of a Small Cause Court under section 24 of the Civil Procedure Code and no appeal lay to the Subordinate Judge's Court. The decree of the Subordinate Judge, therefore, must be reversed and that of the District Munsif restored with costs here and in the Appellate Court.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—Mr. Srinivasa Aiyar, who argued the respondent's case with great learning, acuteness and fairness, has brought forward, all the available arguments and the two propositions enunciated by him are:—(a) that a Court trying a suit transferred not from a Court of Small Causes in the technical sense but from a Subordinate Judge's Court merely invested with Small Cause powers is not itself a Small Cause Court whose decision is not subject to appeal; (b) that even if the District Munsif's Court of Srivaikuntam, to which the suit was transferred, be a Small Cause Court, the Tinnevelly District Munsif's Court, to which there was a further transfer and which actually tried the suit, was not a Court of Small Causes. I am clear, after hearing the whole matter elaborately discussed, that the Legislature intended to take care that a suit originally and properly instituted as a Small Cause suit should not lose that nature even if it be tried by another Court afterwards by reason of transfer of proceedings. When section 33 of the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act says that a Court invested with Small Cause jurisdiction shall be a different Court from itself when it is exercising its ordinary Civil jurisdiction it could only mean that such Court shall be deemed to be a Small Cause Court different from an ordinary Civil Court. The observations in Dulal Chandra Deb v. Ram Narain Deb (1) and the case in Ramchandra v. Ganesh (2) ignored this section 33 and the effect of these decisions is rather to criticise the policy of the Legislature found in section 24, clause (4), Civil Procedure Code, than to follow its plain provisions as is done in Mangal Sen v. Rupchand (3). As regards the argument that the trying Court did not get its jurisdiction by an immediate transfer from the Court in which the suit was originally instituted as a Small Cause suit, section 24, clause (4), does not say that the Court trying any suit transferred or withdrawn from a Court of Small Causes and which shall be deemed, therefore, to be a Small Cause Court should also be a Court to which the transfer had been immediately from the Small Cause Court in which the suit was originally instituted. This contention, therefore, also fails. The appeal was, therefore, heard by the Subordinate Judge without jurisdiction and his decree must be reversed and that of the District Munsif restored with costs.

Decree reversed.

PANIKKARATH UKKAYITHAM-TAVITA PUTHIA PURAJIL MIRTHUR—RESPONDENT.

*Succession (Property Protection) Act (XIX of 1841), ss. 3, 4—Malabar Law and Usage—*Tarwad property—Self-acquisition of karnavan*—Survivorship—Notice—Order to make inventory—Jurisdictinn—Direction of deceased.*

The provisions of Act XIX of 1841 do not apply to cases where property lapses by survivorship, as in the case of the property held by the karnavan of a Malabar tarwad, whether the property is the tarwad property or the self-acquisition of the karnavan.

Before issuing any notice under the Act, the Judge must be satisfied that there are strong reasons for believing that the party in possession has no lawful title. The Judge cannot, without making an inquiry and without having such strong ground of belief, appoint an officer to make an inventory of the property.

Obiter dictum:—The Act pre-supposes a case of succession; if there are directions as to the disposal of the property, the Judge should give effect to them in this summary proceeding without considering their validity.

Petitions, under section 115 of Act V of 1908, to revise the orders of the District Court of North Malabar, in O. P. No. 435 of 1912 and I. P. No. 437 of 1912 and O. P. No. 435 of 1912 respectively.

Mr. C. Madhavan Nair, for the Petitioners.

Mr. C. V. Anantakrishna Aiyar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—One Aramullan, who was the karnavan of his tarwad, died on the 18th July 1912. He is alleged to have died in the house of his wife and children.

On the 27th July, Modieen, who became the karnavan of the tarwad on the death of Aramullan, applied to the District Judge under Act XIX of 1841 for the appointment of a Commissioner to take an inventory of the properties which were in the possession of the late Aramullan and for the delivery of the same to him.

On the same day, without any inquiry the Judge appointed a Commissioner to take an inventory.

A Commissioner was accordingly appointed; upon this Abdulla with two others objected to the order. The Judge confirmed the first order. The first ground of objection was that there is no question of succession at all and, therefore, the Act, does not apply. With reference to this objection, the Judge holds that it has not been finally settled that the tarwad takes by survivorship from a deceased karnavan. I do not think there ever was any doubt on this point. The present karnavan, the petitioner Moideen, does not admit that the properties were the separate or self-acquired properties of the deceased karnavan. His case, as I understand it, is that they were tarwad properties in the possession of the deceased. He does not set up the right of the tarwad to take them by succession. The interest of the deceased, therefore, lapsed by survivorship to the tarwad.

Assuming, however, that is not the petitioner's, Moideen's case, if it was the separate property of the deceased, I think it must now be taken to be finally settled by the Full Bench decision that Mr. Justice Holloway correctly laid down the law when he decided that self-acquisitions lapse to the tarwad and they do not descend to his own heirs who would take if he was not a member of any tarwad. I am, therefore, of opinion that the Act does not apply.

MUHAMMAD HUSAIN v. LALTU.

It is also contended that the Judge was wrong in issuing any order without holding any inquiry. It has now been settled by a series of decisions that the Judge must be satisfied that there are strong reasons for believing that the party in possession has no lawful title before issuing any notice. Abdul Rahiman v. Kutti Ahmed (1), Papamma v. The Collector of Godavari (2), Krishnaswami Pannikonder v. Muthukrishna Panikondar (3). This is not denied by Mr. Anantakrishna Aiyar but he contends that under the proviso to section 4, the Judge may even, without any inquiry, direct an inventory to be taken and he is not precluded from doing so by the decisions above cited.

I cannot accept this contention. Section (3) is imperative that the Judge "shall in the first place inquire," whether there are strong reasons for believing that the party in possession has no title. Then section 4 prescribes the issue of a notice after the Judge is satisfied of the existence of "such strong ground of belief." The proviso that is relied upon by Mr. Anantakrishna Aiyar is a proviso to this section and not to section 3 which requires the Judge to commence the inquiry therein referred to at once. In the course of that inquiry, if it is necessary for citing the party complained against, the Judge may direct the inventory to be taken though he may not have concluded the inquiry. In this case, the order was not issued in the course of the inquiry which the Judge should have commenced on receiving the petition.

It is also contended that the deceased Arumallan left the property to the petitioners before this Court and that the Judge was, therefore, wrong in passing his second order confirming the first order. The Judge, as I understand him, disagrees with the opinion of the learned Judges in Papamma v. The Collector of Godavari (2), that he is bound to give effect to any lawful directions that may have been given by the deceased. He is of opinion that those directions must be legal and as apparently he acts on the assumption that the properties belong to the tarwad and cannot be disposed of by Will, he holds the directions are not legal. The Act pre-supposes cases of succession and if there are directions as to the disposal of the property, the Judge should give effect to them in this summary proceeding without considering their validity. Mr. Anantakrishna Aiyar, however, urges, on the stregth of the case above cited, that this is a matter to be gone into at the final inquiry and not at this stage. But the section seems to imply that when the person complained against offers to prove that there are directions given by the deceased, he should inquire into such allegation before any further order. I do not, however, rest my order on this ground.

I reverse the order of the lower Courts and dismiss the application with costs throughout.

Applications dismissed.

Application against an order of the Munsif of Hardoi, dated 9th November 1911, exercising Small Cause Court powers.

Mr. M. A. Khan, for the Applicant.

Pandit Makhan Lal Misra, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—Applications Nos. 175 and 176 may be taken together. Both of these arise out of suits decided by the Munsif of Hardoi on arbitration awards. In both cases, the learned Munsif failed to give notice to the applicant, who was plaintiff in the suit, of the filing of the award as provided in rule 10, Schedule II of Act V of 1908. The provisions of that rule are mandatory. Notice of the filing of the award has to be given to the parties and the Court has no discretion in the matter. Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Sch. II, para. 16—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Art. 158—Passing decree in terms of award before expiry of 10 days from date of submission of award—Material irregularity—Appeal—Revision—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 115.

A decree passed in terms of an award immediately the award is submitted, without waiting for the expiry of the ten days within which an application, under Schedule II, paragraph 16 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to set aside the award may be made, is invalid.

It is doubtful whether there is an appeal in such a case, but as the decree has been passed notwithstanding the express provision of Schedule II, paragraph 16 of the Code, the Court acts without jurisdiction or with material irregularity in the exercise of its jurisdiction, so as to call for interference by the High Court under section 115 of the Code.

Mouji Premji Sett v. Maliyakel Koyassan Koya Haji, 3 M. 59; Najm-ud-din Ahmed v. Albert Puech, 29 A. 584; 4 A. L. J. 450; A. W. N. (1907) 184; Gulam Jilani v. Muhammad Hussain, 29 C. 167; 12 M. L. J. 77; 6 C. W. N. 226; 4 Bom. L. R. 161; 29 I. A. 51, (P. C.); 25 P. R. 1902, referred to.

Petition, under section 115 of Act V of 1908, praying the High Court to revise the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Ellore, in O. S. No. 23 of 1906.

This was filed as Appeal No. 49 of 1909 and was afterwards treated as a Civil Revision Petition No. 668 of 1912 under section 115, Civil Procedure Code.

Mr. P. Narayanamurti, for the Appellant.

Messrs. V. Ramesam, J. Ramachandra Rau and B. Sitarama Rau, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—It is conceded that, in this case, the Subordinate Judge passed his decree on the same day on which the award of the arbitrators was submitted to him. But, under Article 158 of the Schedule to the Limitation Act IX of 1908, the parties had ten days from that day within which to make applications under rule 16 of Schedule II of the Code of Civil Procedure (section 522 of the old Code of Civil Procedure, 1882) to set aside the award.

The appellant appeals against the decree on the ground that the Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to make a decree before the expiry of the ten days allowed for making an application to set aside the award.

The respondents contend that no appeal lies, and refer to the case reported in Mouji Premji Sett v. Maliyakel Koyassan Koya Haji (1). The contrary view, however, has been taken in the case reported as Najm-ud-din Ahmed v. Albert Puech (2). In view of these conflicting decisions and of the decision of the Punjab Chief Court reported as Ghulam Jilani v. Muhammad Hussain (3), it may be doubted whether an appeal lies, but, if no appeal lies, it is clear from the remarks of the Privy Council at pages 185 and 186 of that case that the present case is one in which the High Court may interfere under section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure (old section 622). We have no doubt that the Subordinate Judge, in passing his judgment and decree before the expiry of the time allowed by law for application to set aside the award, notwithstanding the express provision of rule 16 of Schedule II of the Code of Civil Procedure that the judgment and decree are to be passed after the time for such application has expired, acted without jurisdiction or with material irregularity in the exercise of his jurisdiction so as to call for our interference under section 622 (now section 115) of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Order XXXIV, rule 1, of the new Civil Procedure Code, requires that not only a person having an interest in the mortgage security, but also a person having an interest in the right of redemption shall be joined as a party to any suit relating to the mortgage. But section 85 of the Transfer of Property Act, which is repealed by Order XXXIV, rule 1, required that a person having an interest in the mortgage security only should be made a party to such a a suit.

A creditor of the mortgagor who attaches the mortgaged property in execution of a money decree, does not obtain by his attachment any charge or lien upon the attached property; he only has the right to redeem. He is, therefore, not a necessary party in a suit upon the mortgage brought before the new Civil Procedure Code came into operation, although he would be a necessary party after the Code was passed.

Babu Dwarka Nath Chakravarti, Dr. Sarat Chandra Basak and Babu Basanta Kumar Bose, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Two points arise or have been taken in this second appeal, the first point arises out of the contention that the attaching creditor in a money suit, the attachment taking place on the 13th May 1895, was a necessary party to the mortgage suit which was instituted on the 16th July 1896. That he had the right to redeem as long as he was the attaching creditor is clear from section 91 of the Transfer of Property Act, and that he would be a necessary party under the new Code of Civil Procedure is clear from Order XXXIV, rule 1. But that is not sufficient to decide the case.

The learned Vakil for the appellants has urged, on the authority of the judgment of Mr. Justice Banerjee in the case of Ghulam Husain v. Dina Nath (1), that the benefit of the charge acquired by the attachment enures in favour of the person who purchased the property at a Court sale under a money-decree. Mr. Justice Banerjee says that in a case of ordinary mortgage, this is beyond doubt and in his Court no suggestion was made why the same rule should not be applied in the case of a charge of this description. Mr. Justice Aikman, who was sitting with him, did not support this view, but preferred to base his decision on the short ground that the respondent in that appeal had transgressed the law, had rushed the mortgage through and had not given the attaching creditor an opportunity to redeem, to which he was entitled while he was an attaching creditor. Now, in this case, there can be no doubt that had the attaching creditor offered to redeem while he was an attaching creditor, he could have done so. But the authority of this Court in the case of Frederick Peacock v. Madan Gopal (2), decided by a Full Bench and following the Judicial Committee in the case of Moti Lal v. Karrab-ul din (3), is perfectly clear that the attachment only prevents alienation; it does not confer any title. The Full Bench, therefore, held that it must be taken that the attaching creditor did not obtain by his attachment any charge or lien upon the attached property, and, therefore, a fortiori he cannot hand on any such charge to the purchaser at auction. This distinction does not appear to have been put before the learned Judges of the Allahabad Court, and we are bound to follow the decision of the Full Bench and it entirely accords with our own view of what the law was prior to the passing of the new Code of Civil Procedure. We, therefore, think that this ground of appeal fails. We may further point out that the respondents in the appeal purchased only one of the mortgaged properties and the appellant wants to redeem this one piecemeal having never offered to redeem the whole.

The second point that was argued was, that certain shares were sold without defining the amounts of the shares. The first Court, therefore, gave a decree for joint possession on the ground that these shares were unascertainable; but the lower Appellate Court held that there was sufficient evidence of what these shares were and, therefore, gave a specific decree for a particular share. This is obviously a question of fact, and it is concluded by the findings of the lower Appellate Court. If the first Court thought the evidence was not sufficient and the Appellate Court thought it was, the finding of fact of the lower Appellate Court must prevail. This is not a point which can be taken in second appeal.

The result is, that the appeal fails on all the grounds taken and must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Malabar Compensation for Tenants Improvements Act (Mad. Act I of 1900), s. 5—Compensation to tenant—Improvements effected by third party.

In order to entitle a tenant to compensation under section 5 of the Malabar Compensation for Tenants Improvements Act, it is not necessary that the improvements should be effected by the tenant himself. It is quite sufficient that, at the time of ejectment, the improvements are on the land, even if they were made by some previous occupant.

Appeal, under section 15 of the Letters Patent, against the order of the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Krishnaswamy Aiyar, in S. A. No 1015 of 1910.

Mr. K. P. M. Menon, for the Appellant.

Mr. A. Sundram, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—We agree with the learned Judge that the question whether the alienation by Tulsu was for family necessity was not raised in the lower Courts. We must, however, hold that he was wrong in not allowing to 2nd defendant compensation for the improvements on the lands in 2nd defendant's possession. According to section 5 of the Malabar Compensation for Tenants Improvements Act, "every tenant shall, on ejectment, be entitled to compensation for improvements which have been made by him, his predecessor-in-interest, or by any person not in occupation at the time of the ejectment who derived title from either of them, and for which compensation has not already been paid." Both the lower Courts have found that the 2nd defendant was in possession under the lease, Exhibit B. It is immaterial whether the improvements were made by the 2nd defendant himself or by any other person in possession before him. It is quite sufficient that the improvements are on the land even if they were made by some previous occupant, and it was not the case of either party that any body except the 2nd defendant was in occupation at the time of the suit. Exhibit B shows that the lands were waste at the time of the lease, so that it is clear that the improvements came into existence after the plaintiff gave the lease to the 1st defendant. We must, therefore, modify the order of the learned Judge and the decrees of the Courts below by awarding to the 2nd defendant Rs. 458-15-6, the amount which the Commissioner found to be the value of the improvements. The decree for ejectment will be conditional on the payment of this amount.

The parties will bear their own costs throughout.

Order modified.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908*)*, ss. 11, 66, O. II, r. 2—Res judicata—Compromise decree—Parties different.

Section 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure which deals with the rule of res judicata is not strictly applicable to compromise suits. Its provisions apply in terms to what has been heard and finally decided by a Court.

Section 43 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882 (Order II, rule 2 of the Code of 1908) has no application where the parties to the two suits are not the same.

Section 317 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1882,(section 66 of the Code of 1908), has no application to cases where the manager of a Hindu family or a tenant-in-common makes a purchase with funds belonging to himself and the other members of the family or other tenants-in-common.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Kumbakonam, in Appeals Suits Nos. 457 and 489 of 1908, presented against that of the Court of the District Munsif of Mannargudy, in Original Suit No. 229 of 1906.

Mr. T. R. Ramachandra Iyer, for the Appellant.

Mr. K. Srinivasa Iyengar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This second appeal arises out of a suit for partition instituted by the plaintiff against his brother, the 1st defendant, for a partition of the properties alleged to belong jointly to both. The 2nd defendant is the son of the 1st defendant, and the other defendants are tenants and alienees of some of the properties claiming under the 1st defendant, the 6th defendant being the purchaser of items Nos. 4 to 8 in Schedule A-I, attached to the plaint, and the 14th defendant being the purchaser of a house in Schedule B-II.

The appeal relates only to three sets of items out of the properties claimed in the suit, namely, item No. 1 in A-I Schedule, items Nos. 4 to 8 in the same Schedule and the house in B-II Schedule.

The plaintiff had previously instituted a suit (Original Suit No. 35 of 1893) in the Subordinate Court of Tanjore, for a partition of the family properties, while he was a minor, through his mother as his next friend. The suit ended in a compromise (Exhibit I), dated the 20th July 1894, which was duly presented to the Court and sanctioned by it by its order—Exhibit XIII. The Court directed a decree to be drawn up in terms of the compromise. But, as a matter of fact, no decree was actually drawn up. It was stated to us at the hearing that, subsequent to the passing of the decree of the lower Appellate Court in this case, such a decree has been passed in accordance with the terms of the compromise, and the case has proceeded in this Court on the footing that the compromise between the parties has passed into a decree. Of the items which form the subject-matter of this second appeal, items Nos. 4 to 8 in Schedule A-I were not included in Original Suit No. 35. They had been sold to the 6th defendant by the 1st defendant previous to the suit, and the sale was not questioned by the next friend. The house in Schedule B-II was not then in existence but was purchased by the 1st defendant, subsequently, under circumstances which will be referred to hereafter.

Item No. 1 in Schedule A-I, was included in the suit. But, although both parties intended to divide all the immoveable properties into equal shares between them, it was omitted in the compromise by inadvertence and the Court disposed of the suit without taking notice of the omission.

In this suit, the 1st defendant tried to show that the omission was not due to inadvertence, and that it was intended that the item should go to him exclusively.

Both Courts have found against this contention.

We accept that finding and have no hesitation in holding that the 1st defendant's plea is a dishonest one as shown by his own admission contained in Exhibit B.

The plaintiff in his plaint entirely ignored the previous suit and the compromise, treating it apparently as absolutely void as against him.

The defendants contended that the compromise was binding on the plaintiff and that this suit was barred by it.

The Munsif held, on various grounds, that the razee was void as against the plaintiff, but the Subordinate Judge disagreed with the Munsif and found that none of the grounds, on which the Munsif held it to be void, could be sustained. He was of opinion that the compromise was fairly and honestly entered into in the interests of the minor and that there was no fraud on the part of the 1st defendant in bringing it about. This finding of the Subordinate Judge has not been impeached before us.

We now proceed to deal separately with the three sets of items which form the subject-matter of the appeal.

Item No. 1 in Schedule A-I.

The District Munsif allowed the plaintiff's claim with respect to this item. The Subordinate Judge disallowed it on the ground that the claim was barred by the rule of res judicata under section 13 of the Civil Procedure Code. Mr. T. R. Ramachandra Aiyar for the appellant contends that the Subordinate Judge's view is wrong, on the grounds that the Court in the previous suit did not pass any adjudication with respect to this item; that it could not, in the circumstances, be taken to have refused the plaintiff's claim with respect to it, and that his client is entitled to re-open the compromise on the ground of mutual mistake of the parties in omitting this item. He relies strongly on the decision of Mookerjee and Casperz, JJ., in Jogendra Nath Rai v. Baldeo Das (1), in support of his contention that, there having been no adjudication by the Court with respect to the item and the coparcenary rights of the parties not having been put an end to with respect to it, the plaintiff is entitled to enforce partition.

Mr. K. Srinivasa Aiyangar for the respondents contends that Explanation IV to section 13 of the repealed Code of Civil Procedure (section 11 of the present Code) is conclusive in his favour, that the plaintiff's claim to item No. 1 must be taken to have been refused in the previous suit, as it lays down that "any relief claimed in the plaint which is not expressly granted by the decree, shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to have been refused." The Calcutta case, apparently, does support the appellant's contention, although Explanation IV was not referred to in the judgment.

We do not, however, consider it necessary to pronounce any opinion as to the soundness of that decision, as it is not, in our opinion, applicable in the circumstances of the present case, inasmuch as the judgment there did not proceed upon a compromise between the parties. It was held, in Kumara Venkata Perumal Raja v. Thatha Ramasami Chetty (2), by this Court that section 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which deals with the rule of res judicata, is not strictly applicable to compromise decrees, as it applies in terms only to what has been heard and finally decided by a Court. The same opinion was expressed by Scott, J., in Minalal Shadiram v. Kharsetji (3). We agree with the view held in those cases, and we do not think that the principle of Explanation IV, which is an extension of the doctrine of res judicata, though embodied in the Civil Procedure Code by way of explanation in the section dealing with that doctrine, is applicable to a judgment which merely carries out and enforces an agreement between the parties. There is no reason why, when parties omit to include a certain item of their common properties in an agreement of division, one of them who may happen to be in actual possession of it should afterwards be entitled to refuse to the other his lawful share of it.

On this ground, we hold that the plaintiff's claim to a half share of item 1 in Schedule A-I is not barred by the compromise, and award to him one-half of the item. In the view we have taken, it is unnecessary to deal with the appellant's further contention that a compromise decree may be re-opened on the ground of mistake, in support of which a dictum of Garth, C. J., in Bibee Solomon v. Abdool Azeez, (4) has been relied upon.

GOPALASAWMI VASTAD v. GOVINDASAWMY VASTAD.

Items Nos. 4 to 8 of Schedule A-I.

These items, as already stated, had been sold to the 6th defendant prior to the institution of Original Suit No. 35, and were not included in that suit. But the proceeds of the sale were taken into account in the compromise which has been found to be binding on the plaintiff and the plaintiff obtained his share in them. The money realised by the sale was then in the hands of two maternal relations of the plaintiff. It was provided that the 1st defendant should realise the sum from those relations and give the plaintiff his share of it. The 1st defendant afterwards instituted a suit, Original Suit No. 336 of 1897, for the recovery of the money and in execution of the decree purchased certain properties at Court-sale.

The plaintiff claims a share in those properties and has actually entered into a compromise with respect to one of them with the 19th defendant to whom it was subsequently sold by the 1st defendant; see paragraph 9 of the District Munsif's final judgment. In these circumstances, the plaintiff's claim to these items cannot be sustained. It is unnecessary to consider whether the Subordinate Judge's finding regarding the propriety of the sale of these items to the 6th defendant is correct or not. We may observe that we do not agree with his view that the claim to this item is barred by section 43 of the Civil Procedure Code (Order II, rule 2 of the present Code). The present suit to recover them is substantially against the alienee, the 6th defendant. The 1st defendant has no subsisting right to these items. The section has no application where the parties to the two suits are not the same: See Iburamsa Rowthan v. Thiruvenkatasami Naik (5).

The house in Schedule B-II.

This was one of the items purchased by the 1st defendant in execution of the decree in Original Suit No. 336 of 1897, against the plaintiff's maternal relations who were in possession of the money realised by the sale of items Nos. 4 to 8. The Subordinate Judge has dismissed the plaintiff's claim on the ground that the 1st defendant is not proved to have purchased the item as manager of the family. He says: "The first defendant's liability to account to the plaintiff for his share of the family debt collected by him did not make him the manager of the family or co-owner of the property. There is nothing to show that the 1st defendant purchased the property for himself and plaintiff." He was also of opinion that the claim was barred by section 317 of the Civil Procedure Code (section 66 of the new Code) which prevents a person from suing to recover property sold at Court-sale, on the ground that the purchase was made by him on behalf of some other person. But the section has no application to cases where the manager of a Hindu family or a tenant-in-common makes the purchase with funds belonging to himself and to the other members of his family or the other tenants-in-common: See Minakshi Ammal v. Kalianrama Rayer (6) and Krishna Aiyan v. Raghava Aiyan (7). It is admitted that no money was actually paid by the 1st defendant for this item, and that the consideration for the purchase came out of the decree debt in Original Suit No. 336 which belonged to him and the plaintiff jointly. The plaintiff is, then, entitled to the benefit of the purchase.

The question, then, is, what relief the plaintiff is entitled to with respect to this item? Mr. Srinivasa Aiyangar contends that the plaintiff is not entitled to a half share, as the purchase-money came out of a joint debt belonging in common to the plaintiff and the 1st defendant, and the plaintiff had not, under Exhibit I, the compromise in Original Suit No. 35, a right to one-half of the debt.

This contention appears to us to be sound. According to Exhibit I, out of Rs. 1,143 which was the total amount of the debt, the plaintiff was to be debited with Rs. 305 for certain reasons and the remainder was to be equally divided between him and the 1st defendant. The plaintiff was entitled, roughly speaking, to $\frac{3}{8}$ths of the total amount. He and the 1st defendant were joint owners of the amount in the proportion of 3 to 5, and we, therefore, hold that the plaintiff is entitled to recover $\frac{3}{8}$ths of this item.

The decree of the lower Appellate Court will be modified in the manner indicated above. The 1st defendant will pay half the plaintiff's costs in all the Courts on item No. 1 in Schedule A-I and the house in Schedule B-II. He must pay the 6th defendant's costs in this Court. The Subordinate Judge is requested to hold an inquiry as to the amount of mesne profits from the date of Exhibit I up to this date of item No. 1 Schedule A-I and submit his finding to this Court within 2 months. Seven days will be allowed for filing objections.

[In compliance with the order contained in the above judgment, the Subordinate Judge of Kumbakonam submitted the following

FINDING:—This Court "is requested to hold an inquiry as to the amount of mesne profits from the date of Exhibit I up to this date, of item 1, Schedule A-1."

The gross income from date of Exhibit I (20th July 1894) at 90 kalams a year till date of order of the High Court (2nd August 1911) is 1,330 kalams. The money value thereof is Rs. 1,772. The kist is about Rs. 27 per annum [vide Schedule A-1, Rs. 92-7-0 for about 16 acres nunja] and amounts to Rs. 359 for the period in question. The net income is Rs. 1,413. Plaintiff's share thereof is Rs. 706 8 0. But defendant is content to have Rs. 406 4 0 for 13 years—vide paragraph 25, page 38 of the printed pleadings, and memo. of second appeal. Defendant's figure for 17 years comes to Rs. 531-4 0. I see no reason to assess mesne profits at a higher figure. The figures arrived at above are only estimates and not actuals and do not allow for bad seasons. They show that the defendant's figures are reasonable. I, therefore, find that the mesne profits on item I Schedule A-1 of the plaint from Exhibit I to date of the order of the High Court amount to Rs. 531-4-0.

JUDGMENT.—We accept the finding arrived at by the present Subordinate Judge on the question of mesne profits due for item No. 1 in Schedule A-I. It is agreed between the parties that the plaintiff should have interest at 6 per cent. on Rs. 406 4-0 from the date of the plaint till the 2nd August 1911 and on the total amount of Rs. 531-4-0 from the latter date to the date of realisation.

Decree modified.

Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), s. 315—Auction-purchaser's right to recover purchase money—Substantive right—Civil Procedure Code(Act V of 1908) O. XXI, r. 93, effect of—Limitation Act (IX of 1908) Sch. I, Arts. 62 and 120.

Per Ayling, J.- Under section 315 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882, a suit lies by an auction-purchaser to recover the sale price from the decree-holder when it is found on a third party's suit that the judgment-debtor had no title whatever to the property sold by the Court.

Gurshidawa v. Gangaya, 22 B. 783; Munna Singh v. Gajadar Singh, 5 A. 577; Pachayappan v. Narayana, 11 M. 269; Nilakanta v. Imamsahib, 16 M. 361, referred to.

There is nothing in the present Code (Act V of 1908) which would have the effect of taking away the right of suit which had accrued before it came into force.

Quære:—Whether a similar right of suit exists under the present Code.

Per Napier, J.—Section 315 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882, gave a substantive right to recover money paid to a judgment-creditor and that right could be exercised either by suit or by petition in execution proceedings.

Dorab Ally Khan v. The Executors of Khajaji Moheeood-deen, 3 C. 806; Chapman v. Spiller, 14 Q. B. 621; 19 L. J. Q. B. 239; 14 Jur. 652; Sowdamini Chowdrain v. Krishen Kishore Poddar, 12 W. N. 1080; 10 C. L. J. 558, referred to.

Under the present Code (Act V of 1908), the right is no longer a substantive right entitling the auction-purchaser to recover his money, but he has a right to get an order in execution proceedings for re-payment if he discovers the absence of interest before the confirmation of the sale.

Per Ayling and Napier, JJ.—The claim for recovery of sale-money is governed by Article 120 of Schedule I of the Limitation Act and not by Article 62.

Mr. G. S. Ramachandra Iyer, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

AYLING, J.—The facts of the case are sufficiently set forth in the judgment of the Subordinate Judge: and his decision appears to me to be correct. Two points are argued on behalf of the petitioner, (1) that the present suit is not maintainable, and (2) that it is barred by Article 62 of Schedule I of the Limitation Act.

As regards the first point, the Court auction, under which plaintiff (respondent) purchased the property, the filing of Original Suit No. 341 of 1905 to declare the title of a third person other than the judgment-debtor, and the final decision of that suit, all took place while the old Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882) was in force. It has been repeatedly held that under section 315 of that Act, a suit by a Court auction-purchaser to recover the sale price from the decree-holder would lie where it was found on a suit brought by a third party that the judgment-debtor had no title whatever to the property sold in Court auction. [Vide Gurshidawa v. Gangaya (1), following Munna Sinyh v. Gajadar Singh (2), Pachayappan v. Narayana (3) and Nilakanta v. Imamsahib (4)]. Plaintiff's right of suit accrued on 21st January 1907, when the decree in Original Suit No. 341 of 1905 was confirmed on appeal, for it does not appear that he ever obtained possession of the property purchased. Whether a similar right of suit exists under the present Code is a point on which it is unnecessary to express an opinion, though I should be loth to hold that it did not. But I certainly do not find anything in the present Code which would have the effect of taking away the right of suit which had accrued to plaintiff before it came into force. I, therefore, hold the present suit to be maintainable.

As regards the question of limitation; Nilakanta v. Imam Saheb (4), is authority for holding that Article 120 applies to suits brought under section 315 of the old Code. The petitioner relies on the cases reported in Ram Kumar Shaha v. Ram Gour Shaha (5) and Kovvuri Basavareddi. v. Tallapragada Naganna (6). The latter of these was a case of private sale, and, though the Calcutta case was one of Court-sale, the decision followed that in an earlier case of private sale, Hanuman Kamat v. Hanuman Mandur (7); and the question of whether a suit under section 315 should be distinguished was not considered. I hold that the suit is not time-barred.

The petition must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

NAPIER, J.—This is a suit to recover from the defendant money paid on the purchase at a Court auction in execution proceedings of certain property. The defendant was the decree-holder in Small Cause Suit No. 219 of 1894. In execution of his decree, he brought certain lands to sale as belonging to his judgment-debtor and the plaintiff purchased them. Subsequently, a third party brought a suit to establish his title to the land making the plaintiff and the defendant in this suit parties and his title was upheld. The plaintiff then applied in execution proceedings for refund of his money, but the Court held that his remedy was by a suit. He accordingly instituted Small Cause Suit No. 156 of 1910 against the judgment-creditor and the Subordinate Judge gave him a decree.

It is contended in this Court that no suit lies. It is admitted that under section 315 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882, the purchaser would be entitled to receive back his purchase-money; but it is argued that under the present Code, no such right exists and that his rights are governed by this Code.

It is necessary to examine the history of this claim.

It has been laid down by the Privy Council in Dorab Ally Khan v. The Executors of MOHIDEEN IBRAHIM v. MAHAMED MEERA LEVVAI.

Khajaji Mohecooddeen (8), that as in India moveable and immoveable property are alike capable of being seized and sold under a writ of fieri facias, the responsibility of the Sheriff in respect of sales here is governed by the law relating to chattels rather than by that relating to the sale of real property. It is clear that where the property seized was personal estate and it was sold by the Sheriff, no suit lay either against the Sheriff or the judgment-creditor who had received the purchase-money to recover it when the property had been recovered from the purchaser by a person claiming title, the principle being that a sale by the Sheriff was not a sale in market overt, the purchaser acquiring thereby only what the judgment-creditor had a right to sell, namely, the precise interest and no more, which the judgment-debtor possessed in the goods, and that there was no warranty of title implied in a sale by the Sheriff (Vide Halsbury's Laws of England, Volume 14, paragraph 113). This is on the authority of Chapman v. Speller (9), which was a claim for money had and received by the purchaser at a Sheriff's sale against the vendor of the goods. The Court held that the true consideration was not the property sold but the assignment of the right of the judgment-debtor, whatever it was and that, therefore, there had not been a failure of consideration and accordingly the auction-purchaser could not recover. It is clear from the decision of the Privy Council that this law applies in India apart from statute. An attempt was made, in Sowdamini Chowdrain v. Krishna Kishore Poddar (10), to recover money paid in the like circumstances under the provisions of Regulation VII of 1825, but the Court negatived the right, and in so doing considered also the language of Act VIII of 1859, the first Civil Procedure Code. Section 249 of that Act provided that the proclamation should declare that the sale extended only to the right, title and interest of the defendant in the property. Sections 256 and 257 provided for circumstances under which sales might be set aside on the ground of material irregularity in the conduct of the sale. Section 258 provided that where the sale of immoveable property was set aside, the purchaser should be entitled to receive back his purchase-money and it was argued that this section applied where the property was recovered by a third party. The Full Bench negatived this view and held that it only applied where the sale of the immoveable property was set aside for irregularity under the previous sections. The Court laid down that a purchaser at a sale in execution knows that no one guarantees him that the judgment-debtor had a good title, that he purchases the property with his eyes open and regulates the price which he bids with reference to the risk. The law was materially altered by Act X of 1877, the provisions of which are re-produced in this respect in Act XIV of 1882. The proclamation under section 237 of that Act does not state that all that is sold was the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor. Further, it purports to give a great deal of information about the property and specifically requires to be stated the encumbrances to which the property is liable and every other thing which the Court considers material for the purchaser to know in order to judge of the nature and value of the property. Section 311 corresponds with section 256 of the Code of 1859 and allows an application to the Court to set aside the sale on the ground of material irregularity. Section 312 corresponds with section 257 and is the procedure section with reference to the above. Then comes an entirely new section 313 entitling the purchaser to apply to the Court to set aside the sale on the ground that the person whose property purported to be sold had no saleable interest therein; and section 315, which embodies section 208 of the Code of 1859, includes among the circumstances, under which the purchaser was entitled to receive back his purchase-money, this new circumstance, "When it is found that the judgment debtor had no saleable interest in the property which purported to be sold and the purchaser is for that reason deprived of it." It is to be noted that the procedure by which the money is to be recovered is not stated in this section and it has accordingly been held that these sections give a substantive right to recover money paid to a judgment-creditor which may be exercised either by suit or by petition in execution proceedings. This was expressly decided in Pachayappan v. Narayana (3), where a suit to recover the money was held to be proper procedure, followed in Nilakanta v. Imam Sahib (4) and has been lately re-affirmed in Ram Kumar Shaha v. Ram Gour Shaha (5), where the procedure was likewise by a suit.

We now come to the new Civil Procedure Code. Execution is dealt with in Part II of the Code, sections 36 to 74, and in Order XXI. The sections of the Code contain no provision dealing with this question. Order XXI, rule 36, in like manner as section 287 of the Code of 1882 does not contain the provision embodied in section 249 of the Code of 1859 that the proclamation should specifically state that only the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor shall be sold and is practically in the same terms as section 287 of the Code of 1882. Order XXI, rule 90 embodies section 311 of the old Code but gives the power to apply to the Court to set aside the sale on the ground of fraud in publishing and conducting it as well as on the ground of material irregularity. Rule 91 corresponds with section 313 and empowers the purchaser to apply to the Court to have the sale set aside on the ground that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest in the property sold and rule 92 provides that where an application is made under rule 91 and is allowed, the Court shall make an order setting aside the sale and unless such an application is made and allowed or an application to set aside on the ground of irregularity or fraud, the Court shall make an order confirming the sale and thereupon the sale shall become absolute. Then, rule 93 provides that where the sale is set aside for any of the above reasons, the purchaser shall be entitled to an order for re-payment of his purchase-money against any person to whom it has been paid. Now, this language differs very considerably from section 315 of the old Code. Section 315 provided that where the sale was set aside under the corresponding sections, the purchaser should be "entitled to receive back" his purchase-money and also "where it is found that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest in the property". This last provision is entirely omitted in Order XXI, rule 93 and the words "the purchaser shall be entitled to receive back his purchase-money" are altered into the words "the purchaser shall be entitled to an order for re-payment of his purchase-money." The omitted words in section 315 were the basis of the decisions in the cases above referred to, that a substantive right to receive back the purchase-money was conferred on the purchaser. This second substituted and limited right must be exercised before the sale is confirmed and where no such application is made, the sale becomes absolute on the order of confirmation. It cannot, of course, be contended that these words can pass to an auction-purchaser property to which the judgment-debtor had no title. It necessarily follows, therefore, that what is confirmed on the sale becoming absolute is only the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor, even though the notice to that effect is not inserted in the proclamation as it was under the Code of 1859. It is contended that this procedure works with great hardship on an auction-purchaser for he may have knowledge of the want of title in the judgment-debtor and may, therefore, not apply under Order XXI, rule 91, and that the real owner of the property may not bring his suit either for declaration or to recover possession until some time after the confirmation of the sale in which circumstances the auction-purchaser has no remedy. This is so, but the Legislature must be assumed to have had knowledge of the decisions that those words created a substantive right and of the results of the alteration made in the law. The right is no longer a substantive right entitling the auction-purchaser to recover his money, but a right to get an order in execution proceedings for re-payment, if he discovers the absence of interest before the confirmation of the sale.

This being the law on the subject, it remains to ascertain the appellant's position. He purchased the property in August 1905. The suit by the stranger was brought in the same year, decreed on 13th March 1906 and confirmed on appeal on 21st January 1907. The Code of 1882 was in force then and accordingly there and then accrued to the auction-purchaser a right to recover the money by suit. By virtue of section 6, clause (c), of the General Clauses Act, X of 1897, the repeal of the Code of 1882 by the new Code, Act V of 1908, which came into force on January 1st, 1909, did not affect the right acquired under that enactment and it continued in him, though his right to exercise it would in time become barred by limitation. He brought his suit to enforce this right in January in 1910 and it is next contended that this suit is one for money had and received by the defendant for plaintiff's use, in which case limitation begins to run from the date when the money is received, i.e., August 1905, under Article 62 of both the old and the new Limitation Acts, and that, therefore, his suit is barred. Reliance is placed on Kowuri Basavareddi v. Tallapragada (6) Ram Kumar Shaha v. Ram Gour Shaha (5). Apart from the cases, there is one answer which must on principle be fatal to this contention which is this, that no Article can apply which would make the right to sue liable to be barred before it has come into existence; and, if this contention were correct, that could easily occur in a suit of this nature. The substantive right comes into existence under section 315 when it is found that the judgment-debtor has no saleable interest. The true owner of the land might conceivably not bring his suit for ten years after the auction-purchase and the cause of action would not arise till then. How could the suit on this cause of action have been barred seven years before it came into existence? A further answer is that this is not a suit at common law for money had and received to the plaintiff's use but a suit on a statutory right. In the case of a suit to recover purchase-money paid for property bought at a private sale, the case of Hanuman Kamat v. Hanuman Mandir (7), decided by Privy Council is an authority for the proposition that Article 62 or Article 97 would apply according as whether the consideration failed originally or subsequently, that is to say, the starting point is the time at which the cause of action accrued and this case has been followed in Kowuri Basavareddi v. Tallapragada (6). As pointed out above, the cause of action in the present case did not arise when the money was actually paid as in the case of a sale by private contract, when the title is warranted, but on the date when it was found that the judgment-debtor had no saleable interest. This distinction has not been noted by the learned Judges who decided the case of Ram Kumar Shaha v. Ram Gour Shaha(5), and I am unable to agree with the view they took. There is clear authority of this Court for the view that Article 62 does not apply in Nilakanta v. Imamsahib (4), a case on all fours with this. The Court held that Article 120 was the appropriate Article and, undoubtedly, the language is most apt with regard to the starting point—"When the right to sue accrues." I agree with the view of the learned Judges in that case and it follows that this suit is in time and, therefore, the petition must be dismissed with costs.

Petition dismissed.

APPEAL FROM THE HIGH COURT OF JUDICATURE AT BOMBAY.

May 2, 1912.

SEVAK KIRPA SHANKAR DAJI AND OTHERS—APPELLANTS

versus

GOPAL RAO MANOHAR TAMBEKAR AND OTHERS—RESPONDENTS.

Religious institution—Hindu temple—Scheme for future management—Practice—Exercise of discretion.

The High Court has a large discretion in the matter of sanctioning a scheme for the management of a temple and of its funds, and unless it can be shown that that discretion has been improperly exercised, or that the High Court has not given due consideration to matters which they were directed by the Privy Council to take into consideration, its decision ought not to be interfered with.

Appeal against a decree of the High Court at Bombay, dated the 12th of September 1906, which partly varied, and partly confirmed, that of the District Court of Ahmedabad, dated the 14th of February 1903.

FACTS.—The question for determination was whether a scheme of management relating to the Temple of Shri Ranchhod Raiji situated at Dakore and the funds thereof, sanctioned by the High Court, was open to the objections taken to it by the appellants.

On the 3rd of May 1880, a suit was brought in the District Court of Ahmedabad by the respondents or their representatives, under section 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act X of 1877) against the appellants or their representatives known as shewaks, or hereditary priests, of the idol in the temple above mentioned. The prayer of the plaint was for an account of all sums of money and moveable and immovaeble property received by the defendants as shewaks, and for other consequential relief, and for the settlement of a scheme by the Court for the future management of the temple and its funds.

On the 28th of November 1882, the District Judge dismissed the suit on technical grounds, but on appeal by the plaintiffs, the High Court at Bombay, on the 3rd of May 1887, reversed the decree of the first Court, and directed an account to be taken of the trust property from the year 1872, and a scheme to be prepared for the future management of the temple and its funds and for the disposal of the surplus revenues, if any. For a report of the case, see Manohar Ganesh Tambekar v. Lakhmiram (1).

The defendants appealed to Her late Majesty in Council, but, on the 28th of April 1899, their appeal was dismissed with costs, see Chotalal Lakhmiram v. Manohar Ganesh Tambekar (2).

The case then went back to the District Judge for the taking of accounts and the preparation of a scheme, as directed by the said decision of the High Court, dated the 3rd of May 1887. On the 14th of February 1903, the District Judge delivered his judgment, whereby he ordered the sum of Rs. 1,196-9-6 to be recovered from the shewaks and sanctioned a scheme of management of the temple. On appeal and cross-appeal, the High Court set aside the scheme sanctioned by the District Judge and sanctioned another in its place. With this variation, the decree of the Court below was confirmed. The appellants thereupon appealed to His Majesty in Council.

Messrs. De Gruyther, K. C., and J. M. Parikh, for the Appellants, referred to Maharaja Jagadindra Nath Roy Bahadur v. Rani Hemanta Kumari Debi (3) and submitted that the scheme ought to be varied.

Sir Erle Richards, K. C., and Mr. G. E. A. Ross, for the Respondents, agreed that there should be certain modifications, but submitted that the appeal must be dismissed, as the High Court had properly exercised their discretion.

JUDGMENT.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—Subject to the modifications which their Lordships have suggested and which have been assented to by Counsel for the respondents, their Lordships will affirm the scheme. It is very largely a matter of discretion, and the appellants have not satisfied their Lordships that that discretion has been improperly exercised or that the High Court have not given due consideration to matters which they were directed to take into consideration. Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that, subject to the modifications referred to, this appeal ought to be dismissed.

With regard to the costs of this appeal, their Lordships think that they should all come out of the temple funds. In the first instance, the appellants must, of course, pay the costs of the respondents, and they will have the right to recoup themselves as regards those costs and their own costs out of the temple funds.

Appeal dismissed.

Court-fee—Redemption suit—Court Fees Act (VII of 1870), s. 7 cl. 9—Amount claimed by mortgagor.

A suit merely to redeem a mortgage without praying for any additional relief against the mortgagee must be held to fall under section 7, clause 9 of the Court Fees Act.

KODI VENKATAPPA ROW v. BARNALA SURYANARAYANA.

Where a mortgagor also prays for the payment to him of the amount found due to him on taking accounts, after the discharge of the mortgage debt, he should state the amount so claimed and pay additional Court-fees thereon.

Appeal against the order of the Court of the Temporary Subordinate Judge of Vizagapatam in Appeal Suit No. 530 of 1909, dated the 8th April 1911, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif of Parvatipur, in Original Suit No. 225 of 1909.

Mr. V. Ramesam, for the Appellant.

Messrs. P. Narayanamurthi and B. Narasimhaswara Sarma, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

SUNDARA AIYAR, J.—This is an appeal against the order of the Subordinate Judge of Vizagapatam, returning a plaint for presentation to the proper Court. The suit was for recovery of immoveable property held on the mortgage by defendants Nos. 1 to 8. The plaintiff also alleged in his plaint that he believed that the mortgage-debt had been discharged by the usufruct of mortgaged property a few years before the date of the plaint. He stated also what he believed to be the annual income from the property. In the prayer in the plaint, he asks for the recovery of possession and for an account being taken of the income of the property and for payment of whatever might be found to be due on the taking of the account. The plaintiff did not value his prayer for the recovery of money. He apparently proceeded on the view that no extra stamp duty was payable for recovering any surplus that might be found due from the mortgagees. The District Munsif passed a decree for redemption and found that a sum of Rs. 1,207 and odd was due to the mortgagees by the plaintiff. The defendants appealed claiming a much larger amount as due to them on the mortgage. After the appeal was presented, the plaintiff is alleged to have transferred his right in the property to the appellant before us. Subsequent to the date of the transfer, he entered into a compromise with the mortgagees agreeing that a sum of Rs. 4,000 was due on the mortgage. The appellant sought to be made a party to the appeal as transferee of the plaintiff's rights. This application was opposed by both the plaintiff and the mortgagees but it was granted by the Appellate Court. The plaintiff and the mortgagees sought to have a decree passed in terms of the compromise entered into between them. The Subordinate Judge refused to accede to this prayer on the ground that the plaintiff who entered into the compromise was, prior to it, alleged to have parted with his rights in the property. When the appeal came on for hearing, he held that the Munsif had no jurisdiction to try the suit. He proceeded on the allegation in the plaint as to the probable income of the property every year. We do not think he was justified in doing so. The plaintiff did not tie himself down to that allegation and he was, of course, not in a position to state what income was really realised during years when the mortgagees were in possession. He merely asked for an account to be taken and for payment of whatever might be found to be due. If separate Court-fee was payable on any amount which the plaintiff may claim from the defendants, then the proper course for the Subordinate Judge to pursue was to call upon the plaintiff to state what amount he claimed as due. It was, of course, open to the plaintiff to say that he could not determine what the amount would be, and to state what he believed to be an approximate figure. The figure so stated would determine the Court-fee payable and the question of jurisdiction. On the calculation made by the Subordinate Judge, he held that the suit would be beyond the jurisdiction of the District Munsif and followed the somewhat extraordinary course of returning the plaint to the plaintiff when it was alleged that he had no longer any rights in the property. The result is, the plaint is not before us now. In appeal before us, it is argued by Mr. Ramesam that in a suit for redemption, the mortgagor-plaintiff is not bound to pay Court-fees separately on any amount which he might claim as payable to him as the result of the accounts between the parties and he relies on Husaini Khanam v. Husain Khan (1). This case seems to be in support of his contention. Section 7, clause 9, of the Court Fees Act, according to its language, applies to suits to recover immoveable property mortgaged. Recovery of possession is the only description contained in the clause. It is, therefore, doubtful whether it would be right to hold that if there is any prayer for payment of money in addition to recovery of possession, that prayer need not be separately valued and Court-fee paid on the value put. The cases of Konna Paniker v. Karunakara (2) and Rama Varma Raja v. Kadar (3), relied on for the respondent, are not directly in point. In those cases, it was held that a jenmi in Malabar suing a Kanomdar for redemption should pay Court-fees on any rent that he might claim. In the judgments in the cases, it is stated that the plaintiff prayed not only for redemption but also for the recovery of rent. It has been held by the Court that a kanom mortgage in Malabar is not purely a mortgage but also a lease. It might, therefore, be said that redemption of a kanom mortgage does not include any claim for rent based on the transaction as a lease; while with regard to bare usufructuary mortgages, the plaintiff is entitled in a suit for redemption to have an account taken between him and the mortgagee and the payment by the mortgagee of whatever might be found to be due to him on the taking of accounts. The language of the clause is, perhaps, more in favour of the respondent's contention. It is, however, unnecessary to pronounce a definite opinion on this point. We have asked Mr. Ramesam, who appears for the transferee, to state whether he would claim more than Rs. 1,500 as the approximate amount which will be found due on account being taken. He says "No." The suit may, therefore, be held to be within the jurisdiction of the District Munsif. If the assignment is found to be valid, then Mr. Ramesam's client is prepared to state the amount which he claims from the mortgagees and to pay Court-fees on that amount. If the assignment is found to be not valid, it would be impossible for the plaintiff, after admitting that a sum of Rs. 4,000 was due by him to the mortgagees, to make any claim for money due by the mortgagees to him. We reverse the order of the Subordinate Judge and remand the appeal for disposal according to law. If he finds the assignment valid, he will call upon the appellant before us to state the amount which he claims as due from the defendants and levy Court-fees on that amount in the Court of first instance.

The costs in this Court will abide the result.

(2) 16 M. 328. (3) 16 M. 415.

SADASIVA IYER, J.—So far as section 7, clause 9, of the Court Fees Act is concerned it is worded thus: "In suits against the mortgagee for recovery of the property mortgaged, according to the principal money expressed to be secured by the instrument of the mortgage." It does not use the words "for the recovery of the possession of the property mortgaged" but merely "for the recovery of the property mortgaged." The marginal note in the Government of India Edition is "to redeem." In a suit by the mortgagor to redeem a simple mortgage, I think, it might be taken that the expression "recovery of the property mortgaged" means the re-conveyance to the mortgagor of the interest which was vested in the mortgagee. In this view, all suits merely to redeem mortgages, without praying for any additional relief against the mortgagee, must be held to come under section 7, clause 9 of the Court Fees Act. With these observations, I agree with my learned brother in the decree and order proposed by him.

Order reversed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act of 1908), ss. 85, 87—Sovereign Prince or Ruling Chief, suit against—Consent of Governor-General in Council—Private International Law—Suit against Foreign State.

A suit will not lie against a Sovereign Prince or Ruling Chief without the consent of the Governor-General in Council.

G. sued the Travancore State or its Dewan as representing the State, for damages for wrongful dismissal from service:

Held, that no such suit would lie, as the Civil Procedure Code made no provision for suits against a State apart from its Prince or Chief. Such a suit would also contravene the well established rules of Private International Law.

Beer Chunder Manikya v. Raj Coomar Nobodeep Chunder Deb Burmono, 9 C. 535; 12 C. L. R. 465; Strousberg v. Republic Costa Rica, 44 L. T. (N. S.) 199; 29 W. R. 125, relied upon.

Appeal from the order of the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Wallis, dated 10th August 1910, in the Ordinary Original Civil Jurisdiction of this Court in Suit No. 142 of 1910.

Mr. K. Naraina Rao, for the Appellant.

Mr. C. P. Ramasami Aiyar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal against the order of Wallis, J., on the original side dismissing the plaintiff's suit under rule 57, of the Original Side Rules, which provides that when the plaint discloses no reasonable cause of action or is vexatious, the Judge may strike out the plaint and dismiss the suit.

The claim is to recover the sum of Rs. 94,000 from the State of Travancore, or Dewan of Travancore, as damages for wrongful dismissal from the service of that State.

His Highness the Maharajah of Travancore is a "Sovereign Prince or Ruling Chief" within the meaning of sections 85 to 87 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and may not be sued in our Courts without the consent of the Governor-General in Council, which admittedly has not been given in this case.

It is contended that the present suit is not against the Maharajah, but against the State of Travancore, or the Dewan as representing the State.

We do not think that any such distinction can be drawn.

The Code of Civil Procedure makes no provision for suits against such a State apart from its Prince or Chief, and we have not been referred to any precedent for such a suit.

We are of opinion that no such suit will lie under the Code of Civil Procedure. Apart from its provisions, it is clear that under the well established rules of International Law, no such suit will lie. It is only necessary to refer to the cases of Beer Chunder Manikya v. Raj Coomar Nobodeep Chunder Deb Burmono (1) and Strousberg v. Republic Costa Rica (2).

We dismiss the appeal with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 11—Landlord and tenant—Suit for rent for a certain fasli—Issue as to propriety of patta tendered—Adjudication —Subsequent suit for rent for another fasli—Issue as to extent of holding—Res judicata—Madras Rent Recovery Act (VIII of 1865).

In a suit by a landlord against a tenant for rent for a certain fasli under the Madras Rent Recovery Act, the defendant pleaded that the patta tendered was not proper and that the extent of defendant's jeroyati land had been very much overstated. The Court found that the terms of the patta did not contain any objectionable matter and that the patta was a proper one. In a suit for rent by the same plaintiff against the defendant for a subsequent fasli, the defendant pleaded that the extent of the land referred to in the patta was incorrect:

Held, that the question of the extent of defendant's holding was res judicata by reason of the decision in the previous suit as to the propriety of the patta, as it was an available ground of attack in the previous suit, and the judgment in the previous suit must be taken to be an adjudication that the terms of the patta were correct in every respect.

Scope of section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, and the doctrine of res judicata discussed.

Case-law on the subject commented upon.

See 10 Ind. Cas. 75.

The Hon'ble Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Aiyar, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.

WALLIS, J.—I agree with Munro, J., that the extent of the defendant's holding under the plaintiff is res judicata by reason of the decision in Original Suit No. 430 of 1906. In that case, the present plaintiff who held a five years' lease of the village from the registered landholders, sued the present defendant to recover rent for Faslis 1314 and 1315, in the shape of rajabagam or landholder's share of the produce, of certain jeroyati lands in the village in the occupation of the defendant. To enable the plaintiff to succeed, it was necessary for him to show, under section 7 of the Rent Recovery Act, 1865, that he had tendered a proper patta to the defendant for each fasli, or that it had been agreed to dispense with the tender. Under section 4, the patta had to contain the local description and extent of the land. The plaintiff pleaded that he has tendered a proper patta for each fasli. The defendant denied the tenders and pleaded further that the pattas alleged to have been tendered were not proper, instancing certain payments claimed. He pleaded further that "the extent of the defendant's jeroyati land (that is, of the land in respect of which the plaintiff claimed rent) has been very much overstated." I think that must be taken as referring to the extent in patta as well as to the extent in the plaint, which would merely reproduce it, and I think that the District Munsif who tried the case so understood it, as in his careful summary of the written statement he makes no express mention of the plea as to the extent of the land and evidently treats it as part of the plea that the pattas tendered were improper, and I think it was also covered by the issue "whether the pattas so tendered are proper" and by the terms of the judgment in that issue, which is as follows: "The terms of the pattas, Exhibit F, do not contain any objectionable matter." If this view of the pleadings is correct, there is an end of the case, because the question of the extent of the defendant's jeroyati holding was directly and substantially in issue in the previous suit and must be taken to have been heard and finally decided in the plaintiff's favour, as such a decision is necessarily involved in the decree passed in the plaintiff's favour, seeing that if the decision had been the other way, it would, under the Rent Recovery Act, have been fatal to his suit which must have been dismissed on the ground that the patta was not a proper one.

In his judgment, Sankaran Nair, J., observes that a decree for rent does not necessarily involve the decision that a proper patta has been tendered, as the parties may dispense with them, but whereas here tender of a proper patta is alleged on the one side and denied on the other and there is no suggestion that tender has been dispensed with, it seems to me that the decree for rent does involve the decision that a proper patta has been tendered.

Apart from any question as to the terms of the patta, it seems to me that the extent of the defendant's holding of jeroyati land in the village was a matter directly and substantially in issue in the suit, as it was in respect of this extent that the plaintiff was claiming rajabagam, or landholder's share of the produce, from the defendant; and that it was necessary for him to prove this extent to enable a decree to be given in his favour, even if there had been no plea in the written statement, as there was, that the extent had been over-estimated. In these circumstances, I think the decision on the 6th issue that the plaintiff was entitled to the rajabagam claimed in the plaint necessarily involved a decision that the extent of the defendant's jeroyati land in the village was as alleged in the plaint, because what he claimed was the rajabagam of this extent, and that this point must be taken to have been decided in the plaintiff's favour.

In either view, the question of the extent of the defendant's holding of jeroyati land in the village having been directly and substantially in issue and having been, as we must take it, heard and determined because essential to the decision of the suit, cannot be raised again in the present suit for the rent of Fasli 1316 by the defendant's setting up that he was all along in occupation of only 5 acres of jeroyati land in the village and not of the extent all along claimed by the plaintiff.

But, even assuming that the propriety of the patta was not questioned in the former suit on the ground that the extent of the lands was wrongly shown and that the extent was not otherwise questioned by the defendant, I think that these being good grounds of defence to the suit might and ought to have been raised, and must be deemed to have been matters expressly and substantially in issue in the former suit by virtue of Explanation IV to section 11 of the the Civil Proceedure Code. It seems to me that any ground of attack or defence which by virtue of the Explanation is deemed to have been directly and substantially in issue in a suit must also be deemed to have been heard and finally decided adversely to the party who failed to raise it. The proposition that failure to raise grounds of attack or defence, which might and ought to have been raised, does not make such grounds res judicata unless there is an express decision by the Court upon them, appears to me to be wholly untenable. Courts of Justice are not in the habit of deciding points not raised before them; and to say that the Explanation only takes effect when they happen to do so appears to me to defeat the policy of the section and to render the Explanation senseless, as held by the Allahabad High Court in Sri Gopal v. Pirthi Singh (1), a decision confirmed on appeal in Sri Gopal v. Pirthi Singh (2) by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee, who thought it sufficient to say that the judgment of the High Court was clearly right and that the appeal on this point was unarguable. I do not, therefore, consider it necessary to refer to the earlier decisions of the Calcutta High Court on which Sankaran Nair, J., relied, and it is the more unnecessary to do so as they are very fully examined in the judgment of Sundara Aiyar, J. The appeal must be allowed, the decrees of this Court and the lower Appellate Court reversed, and the case remanded to the District Judge for disposal according to law. Costs will abide the event.

SUNDARA AIYAR, J.—This is an appeal under section 15 of the Letters Patent arising out of Second Appeal No. 640 of 1909.* The original suit which led to the second appeal was instituted by a landlord for the recovery of rent from the defendants, his ryots, for the Fasli year 1316. According to the plaintiff's case, the defendants were in possession of about 14 acres of jeroyati lands under him liable to pay waram or rent in kind. The 1st defendant, the undivided father of the 2nd defendant, contended that he held only 5 acres of jeroyati lands and that he held in addition 10 acres of inam and 3 acres of cash rent paying lands and denied that any patta was tendered to him for the fasli in question as alleged by the plaintiff. The correctness of the patta alleged to have been tendered was also denied. The 7th issue framed by the Munsif raised the question "whether the alleged tendered patta was valid and binding on the defendant." The 8th issue was "whether the whole of the 14 acres of land mentioned in the plaint is defendant's jeroyati as alleged by the plaintiff, or only 5 acres jeroyati and the rest inam and cash rent paying land as alleged by the defendants." At the hearing, a further question was raised whether the question of the propriety of the patta tendered was res judicata in consequence of the decision of the Court in Original Suit No. 430 of 1906, which related to a suit for rent instituted by the plaintiff against the defendants for Fasli 1314. The District Munsif held that the matter was not res judicata because the points in dispute were not raised in the previous suit, these points being the inclusion of inams and of money rent paying lands as waram paying lands, and the erroneous description of the lands for which the plaintiff is entitled to claim rent. On the merits he held that the patta tendered was not a proper one. He was of opinion that part of the lands included in the patta was inam and was wrongly claimed by the plaintiff as jeroyati. He did not decide the question whether cash rent and not rent in kind was payable for part of the land. He apparently thought that the patta must be held to be incorrect in stating that waram was payable while cash rent was received till the end of Fasli 1313. The mistake complained of with regard to the description of the land was that the eastern boundary was described as the service inam of the defendant, while in the patta for Faslis 1313, 1314, it was described merely as defendants' inam. This was held by the Munsif to be improper although he did not decide the question whether the description of the boundary of the defendants' land as service inam was in fact correct or not. He dismissed the plaintiff's suit. His judgment was confirmed on appeal by the District Judge, who upheld the Munsif's view on the question of res judicata. The Judge observed on the question of the correctness of the patta as follows:—"Appellant does not seriously argue that the patta was a proper one." The plaintiff preferred a second appeal to this Court. The question argued in second appeal was that the propriety of the patta was res judicata by the judgment in Original Suit No. 430 of 1906. The appeal came on for hearing before Munro and Sankaran Nair, JJ. The learned Judges differed in their views; Munro, J., being of opinion that the plea of res judicata must be upheld, while Sankaran Nair, J., agreed with the opinion of the lower Courts that it should not be maintained. In the result, the second appeal was dismissed in accordance with the provisions of section 98 (2) of the Civil Procedure Code. The present appeal is, therefore, substantially against the judgment of Sankaran Nair, J. In the previous suit, Original Suit No. 430 of 1906, the 1st issue was:—"Whether the plaintiff tendered pattas to the 1st defendant for Faslis 1314 and 1315 and whether the pattas tendered are proper." The tender of patta was held to be proved. The finding on the question of its propriety was in these terms:—"The terms of the pattas, Exhibits E and F, do not contain any objectionable matter. I accordingly find the 1st issue in the affirmative." In the written statement in that suit, marked as Exhibit C in the present suit, paragraphs 8 and 9 took objections to the correctness of the patta. Paragraph 8 stated:—"The pattas alleged to have been tendered are not proper. The terms in paragraph 3 of the plaint are not mamool terms." The terms referred to related apparently to the giving of firewood, the payment of interest and the amount of road cess payable by the ryot. Paragraph 9 stated: "The extent of defendants' jeroyati land has been very much over-estimated by the plaintiff." So far as the written statement was concerned the details of the over-statement of the extent of the jeroyati land were not stated and no specific objection was taken to the statement that some portion of the lands was wrongly mentioned as liable to pay waram instead of cash rent. The objection in the present suit with regard to the description of the eastern boundary may be left out of account as it cannot be held to affect the plaintiff's right to the land in question. It is immaterial whether the defendants' land which forms the eastern boundary was his service inam or an inam of a different character so far as the relations between the plaintiff and the defendants with regard to the plaint land are concerned. The District Munsif did not find that the description of it as service inam was incorrect. It does not appear to what points the evidence let in by the parties in the previous suit related with respect to the correctness of the patta, and the Munsif's finding throws no further light as it is expressed in general words: "The terms do not contain any objectionable matter." The appellant's contention is that the defendants, who set up that a proper patta had not been tendered were, bound to raise all objections that they could to the propriety of the patta and that the judgment in the previous suit must be taken to be an adjudication that the terms of the patta were correct in every respect and that, therefore, they cannot raise any objection to the propriety of the patta in this suit which they might have failed to urge in the previous suit. Except in the matter of the difference in the description of the eastern boundary which, in my opinion, may be neglected, it is not stated that the terms of the patta tendered for Fasli 1316 were not similar to the patta for Fasli 1314, which was held to be a proper one in the previous suit. The District Munsif observes that the patta in question was virtually the same as that which was tendered for Fasli 1314. The correctness of this statement is not seriously disputed. Munro, J, observes,—"Had the issue in the previous suit relating to the correctness of the patta been found in the negative, the plaintiff's suit must have been dismissed. The finding in the previous suit that the pattas were proper, i.e., that they were such as the defendants were bound to accept, was a finding that the relationship of landlord and tenant subsisted between the plaintiff and the defendants in respect of the land entered in the pattas and I do not think that the defendants can again be allowed to put the plaintiff to proof of his title". Sankaran Nair, J., held, having regard to the general language of the District Munsif's finding in the previous suit, that there was no explicit adjudication there of the questions now raised, viz., whether a portion of the lands was inam or jeroyati and whether another portion was liable to pay cash rent or waram. The learned Judge was further of opinion that as the suit related only to the rent for a particular year (Fasli 1316), it did not necessarily require a decision as to the terms of the patta or the extent of the land for which rent was payable, and that these questions are, therefore, not res judicata.

The decision of the question depends on the interpretation to be placed on section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code which embodies the rule of res judicata. According to the section, the Court is forbidden to try "any suit or issue in which the matter directly and substantially in issue has been directly and substantially in issue in a former suit between the same parties". The rule applies subject to the other provisions of the section not only to a suit tried before but to an issue decided in a previous suit provided the matter directly and substantially in issue in the latter suit was raised in the previous suit or in a substantial and direct issue in the previous suit. Explanation III lays down,—"The matter above referred to must in the former suit have been alleged by one party and either denied or admitted expressly or impliedly by the other". An implied denial is as effective as an express one. Explanation IV says:—"Any matter which might and ought to have been made ground of defence or attack in such former suit shall be deemed to have been a matter directly and substantially in issue in such suit".

The appellant contends that with respect to any issue in the former suit, the parties were bound to put forward all grounds of attack or defence material for the decision of the issue and will be deemed to have done so even if they failed to do so in fact; that the propriety of the patta was directly and substantially in issue in the previous suit, and that both the plaintiff and the defendants were bound to put forward every matter involved in the question of the correctness of the patta and that the decision that the patta was a proper one must be taken to be a decision that there was no valid objection of any sort to it; and that the defendant cannot now be permitted to raise any matter relating to the propriety of the patta which he might have failed to raise before. I am of opinion that these contentions must be upheld. The learned Counsel for the respondent rested himself on the arguments contained in the judgment of Sankaran Nair, J., and did not elucidate the points any further. It becomes, therefore, necessary to examine the arguments contained in the judgment of that learned Judge. He lays down the following propositions, as I understand his judgment:—

(1) The scope of the rule of res judicata, as limited by the word 'directly and substantially in issue' is not confined to the relief granted by the former suit or to the property which was the subject-matter therein.

(2) The decision on a matter not essential for the relief finally granted in the former case, or which did not form one of the grounds for the decision itself, cannot be said to have been directly and substantially in issue; but, where the decision on a question was essential to the relief granted or the decree passed, or where it formed the ground-work of the decision, then the matter must be deemed to have been directly and substantially in issue in the suit.

The difference between issues 'collateral' and 'direct' depends upon whether it was possible to pass the decree without any finding upon the particular issue.

(3) With regard to the relief granted in a suit, the decree may render it necessary to imply a decision on a question not expressly decided, but with regard to issues, no implication is necessary, but we ought to have a clear decision to create a bar. (The application of the latter part of the rule would, of course, be to cases where the subject-matter of the two suits is different.)

(4) Explanation IV does not dispense with the necessity of finding upon a matter which might and ought to have been made a ground of defence or attack in the former suit unless that matter must be taken to have been involved in the actual decree passed in the case.

(5) It is not enough to make the matter of an issue res judicata that the decision of it in a different manner would be inconsistent with the decree in the previous case as such determination would not affect the actual decree passed in that case for the rent for Fasli 1314.

(6) A decree for rent does not necessarily involve the decision that a proper patta has been tendered.

If, therefore, as a fact, that question was not decided in the previous suit, we are not bound to imply that it was so decided.

Now, section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code requires that the matter or issue should have been heard and finally decided by such Court. It does not say that it should have been decided in explicit terms. It cannot be doubted that if an adjudication on a matter is necessarily involved in the decision in a prior suit, the section must be understood to lay down that it must be taken to have been heard and finally decided. Sankaran Nair, J., admits that the principle of an implied decision must be adopted so far as whatever is required by decree in the previous suit is concerned. But he lays down that it is not applicable with regard to issues. He does not say how then the judgment in a suit is to be understood. No such distinction is warranted by the language of the section. The suit and an issue put forward for trial in the second suit are treated on exactly the same footing in the section, and the test of res judicata with regard to each is whether the matter directly and substantially in issue in the latter suit was the matter directly and substantially in issue in the suit or in an issue in the earlier suit. The word "issue" in the expression "suit or issue" must be distinguished from the use of the words "in issue" in the expression "the matter directly and substantially in issue." The latter expression, as already stated, is made applicable to both the latter suit and an issue raised in it. "Directly and substantially in issue" obviously means "directly and substantially in question, which would include everything necessarily involved," whether that expression is applied to the suit itself or an issue in it. This has to be borne in mind in interpreting Explanation IV also. It speaks of "any matter which might and ought to have been made ground of defence or attack in the former suit." The phrase "matter directly and substantially in issue" in the principal clause of the section is spoken of with reference to both suit and issue. Clearly, therefore, what ought to have been made ground of defence or attack with respect to any issue in the earlier suit must be taken to have been a matter directly and substantially in issue therein when the question is whether an issue in the earlier suit can be tried again in the latter suit. Again, in deciding whether any matter is res judicata, the question is, what is necessarily involved in the actual judgment of the Court in the earlier suit, not what relief was granted by the decree, because it is the matter decided (expressly or by necessary implication) that becomes res judicata. It is desirable to illustrate by a concrete example. Suppose a suit is instituted for one of the instalments payable according to the terms of a bond. The defendant denies its genuineness and pleads also absence of consideration, and issues are framed on both points. The Court passes a decree for the instalment but records no explicit finding on either of the issues. A suit is subsequently instituted in the same Court for a second instalment and the defendant raises the same pleas as in the earlier suit. The subject-matter of the two suits is not the same and the dismissal of the second suit would not affect the actual decree passed in the earlier suit. Can it be contended that the issues may be tried again in the second suit? According to the learned Judge, apparently, they should be tried again. The executant of the bond, according to him, though he cannot seek to recover back the amount decreed against him in the earlier suit, may resist the second suit for the later instalment. The difference between issues 'collateral' and 'direct,' according to the learned Judge, depends upon "whether it was possible to pass the decree without any finding upon the particular issue." I am unable to accept his position that though a finding might be necessary to pass the judgment in the previous suit, the issues should not be taken to have been decided (unless explicitly decided) if the result of the second suit would not be to re-open the actual decree in the previous suit. The result of such a position would be that the same issues may be re-opened again and again in the same Court though such re-opening would be inconsistent with the decree and judgment in every one of the previous suits. According to the learned Judge, such inconsistency is immaterial. The decision of the Privy Council in Amanat Bibi v. Imdad Hosain (3) is referred to in support of this position. There were two earlier proceedings; one a suit to establish a sub-proprietary right as against a taluqdar, the other, a proceeding to recover the same property from the taluqdar under the terms of a certain Revenue Circular on re-paying to the taluqdar the arrears of revenue which he had paid to the Government. The third proceeding, in which the plea of res judicata was raised, was a suit to redeem a mortgage granted by the person who was plaintiff in the earlier proceeding. The Privy Council held that the third suit was not barred as res judicata because the cause of action was different. Their Lordships held that the cause of action to establish a sub-proprietary right was obviously different from that in a suit for redemption, though the property sought to be recovered was the same. The question in issue, said their Lordships, was quite different in the two suits; and they interpreted the provisions in section 7 of Act VIII of 1859, which enacted that "every suit shall include the whole of the claim arising out of the cause of action," as not requiring that "every suit shall include every cause of action or every claim which the party has, but only that every suit should include the whole of the claim arising out of the action on which the suit is brought." It is now a well established proposition that, though the subject-matter of the litigation and the relief claimed may be the same, different suits may be maintained by a plaintiff if the cause of action in each suit be different. There were two stages in the second of the earlier proceedings. The first originated in an application by the plaintiff under a Revenue Circular to recover the property. The Settlement Officer who made the inquiry found that the plaintiff had conveyed the property to the taluqdar by a conditional sale which had become absolute in 1853, and that the plaintiff was further not entitled to recover the property as he had not re-paid to the taluqdar certain arrears of revenue paid by the latter which he was bound to re-pay before claiming to recover the property. Their Lordships held that this order under the Special Circular could not be treated as judicial proceedings at all. The plaintiff then had recourse to fresh proceedings on the ground that the payment of arrears by the taluqdar must be treated as having been made on his account. The Settlement Officer then again decided that the property had been transferred to the taluqdar by a conditional sale of the year 1853 which had become absolute. Their Lordships held that the question in those fresh proceedings must be taken to have been merely "whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover the property which had been transferred by the Government to the taluqdar on re-paying to the taluqdar the arrears of revenue which he had paid to Government," that being, according to their Lordships, the cause of action on which the plaintiff then claimed to recover. The matter in issue in the suit before their Lordships, they said, was "the respondent's right to redemption under the mortgage deed of 1854." Their Lordships then observed: "It may be difficult to reconcile the position of the taluqdar as mortgagee in 1854 with his position as absolute owner in 1853 under purchase from the mortgagor. But, if it be established that the respondent was a mortgagor in 1854 with the right of redemption, why should he be barred merely because at an earlier date he may have had no right to the property at all?" This is the passage relied on by the learned Judge for the proposition that the decision of an issue in the earlier suit inconsistent with an issue in the later suit will not make the suit or issue in the later suit res judicata. I can find no such proposition laid down by the Privy Council. They did not regard the later suit as inconsistent with the decision in the former suit that there was a conditional mortgage of 1853 which, if it was in operation, had become absolute in 1853. Proceeding on the basis that the conditional mortgage had been established to be true, if the taluqdar chose to take a mortgage in 1854 from the plaintiff and his subsequent holding was under that mortgage, their Lordships held that the mortgage of 1854 would furnish the plaintiff with a fresh cause of action, and a plaintiff need not combine in the same suit all his causes of action, though both suits might be for the recovery of the same property. They did not say that in the later suit the execution of the conditional sale of 1853 or its having become absolute could be denied. The observation that it may be difficult to reconcile the position of the talukdar as mortgagee in 1854 with his position as absolute owner in 1853 under a purchase from the mortgagor, meant no more than that it might appear to be improbable that a person who was absolute owner in 1853 would take a mortgage in 1854; but a mortgagee cannot deny the title of his mortgagor, and if the talukdar chose to take a mortgage from the plaintiff in 1854, he could not say that the plaintiff did not obtain a fresh cause of action for redemption of that mortgage. On the other hand, in Pahalwan Singh v. Maharaja Maheshur Buksh Singh Bahadur (4), the Privy Council applied the rule of an implied decision of an issue by a former adjudication although the property in the two suits was different. The learned Judge seems to have been under the impression that in that case the decree in the later suit would re-open the decree in the earlier suit, but that was not the case, as the property in dispute in the two suits was different. It is, of course, necessary that in order that an issue may be res judicata, the decision in the former suit must necessarily involve an adjudication in a particular way on the issue raised in the later suit and its adjudication in a contrary way in the later suit must be inconsistent with the adjudication which must be implied in the earlier suit. In one part of his judgment, the learned Judge observes that where the decision on a question was essential to the relief granted, or where it formed the ground-work of the decision, then the matter must be deemed to have been directly and substantially in issue in the suit, but he afterwards restricts the scope of the second test to cases where the question was explicitly decided. For this restriction, I can find no warrant either in principle or in the language of the section.

The statement that a decision on a matter not essential for the relief finally granted cannot be said to have been directly and substantially in issue is unworkable in practice, where a suit is dismissed without any relief being granted. The test should really be whether the matter was essential for the decision in the earlier suit, not for the relief granted. The decision of a Court proceeds on the matters put in contest by the parties and its adjudication cannot be understood without regard to the actual contest. It is impossible to understand it merely with regard to the decree. Suppose a suit for an instalment on a bond is dismissed, the defendant's plea being that the bond is not genuine and that it is not supported by any consideration. The Court does not record any explicit findings on these points, either of which would lead to the dismissal of the suit. Suppose the plaintiff afterwards institutes a suit for another instalment and the defendant raises the same pleas. Can the plaintiff be permitted to say that the points should be tried again and he should be given a decree if both points are found in his favour? Sankaran Nair, J., concedes that the granting of the relief may be taken to involve the decision of whatever point is necessary to support the decree. But what points are to be taken as involved in the decree in the instance just put? How is it possible to decide a question of res judicata by a consideration of the relief alone which is granted and without a consideration of the judgment in the case, and how is it possible to understand what the Court decides in the judgment without seeing what the contest between the parties was? The result of doing so would be to confine the doctrine of res judicata to the scope of the rule transit in rem judicatum (except where a matter directly and substantially in issue has been explicitly decided by the judgment in a former suit). Suppose, in the illustration already put of a defendant denying both the genuineness and consideration of an instalment-bond, the defendant in the second case admits the genuineness of the bond, but denies only the passing of consideration for it. If it is open to the Court in the later suit to proceed on the footing of the genuineness of the bond, the question would arise whether the matter as to consideration is res judicata by the former judgment As no explicit findings on the points in contest were recorded in the judgment, the decision might have proceeded either on the ground that the bond was not genuine or that it was not supported by consideration, or on both grounds. It might be proper in such a case to hold that the previous judgment did not necessarily imply a decision on the question of consideration. Certainty is essential for the application of the rule of res judicata, and the Court would not prevent the re-agitation of a matter where it is not certain that the previous decision proceeded on a particular ground. See Vythilinga Mudaliar v. Ramachendra Naicker (5). If a suit for an instalment is dismissed for default, no matter would be res judicata in a claim for another instalment. If it is decreed ex parte, the genuineness of the bond and all questions as to its enforceability, so far as to justify a decree for the instalment, would be res judicata in a suit for another instalment. The learned Judge apparently proceeds on the view that for some reason the scope of the rule of res judicata with regard to issues should be resticted as far as possible and refers to the opinion of Stuart, C. J., in Babulal v. Ishri Parsad Narain Singh (6) and Muhammad Ismail v. Chattar Singh (7), who regretted the application in this country of the principle of res judicata to the trial of issues, and not merely to the subject-matter in previous suits. It is necessary to consider whether there are good grounds for such regret. The rule was well established by the decisions of the Privy Council. See Krishna Behari Roy v. Bunwaree Lall Roy (8); Pahlwan Singh v. Maharaja Muheshur Buksh Singh Bahadur (4); Soorjomonee Dayee v. Suddanund Mohapatter (9); Pittapur Raja v. Buchi Sitayya (10). Section 13 of Act X of 1877 and section 11 of the present Code made the expression "matter directly and substantially in issue" applicable both to 'suit' and 'an issue in a suit.'

The learned Judge holds that the proper terms of the patta to be tendered by the landholder to the ryot could not be regarded as having necessarily been directly and substantially in issue in a suit for rent. Two decisions of the Privy Council are referred to in support of this position. The first of them is Misir Raghobardial v. Sheo Baksh Singh (11). In that case the plaintiff had previously instituted a suit for Rs. 1,665, the balance of interest due on a bond for Rs. 12,000 in a Court not competent to try suits exceeding Rs. 5,000 in value. The defendant had pleaded that the bond was supported by consideration only to the extent of Rs. 4,790, and that the amount already paid by him for interest exceeded the interest due on the actual consideration that had passed. The defendant's plea was upheld. The plaintiff, subsequently instituted a suit for the principal and interest due on the bond in a Court competent to try a suit of that value. The question was, whether the decision in the previous suit as to the amount of consideration that had passed for the bond was res judicata in the subsequent suit. Their Lordships held that it was not. The point was decided on the ground that the Court that decided the previous suit was incompetent to try the later suit for principal and interest. The rule as to the necessity for the Court trying the previous suit having concurrent jurisdiction to try the later suit had also been laid down by the decisions of the Privy Council under Act VIII of 1859, although the language of section 2 of that Act did not in terms refer to that requisite. Sir Richard Couch, in pointing out that the rule, already applied by the Privy Council while Act VIII of 1859 was in force, was embodied in explicit terms in Act X of 1877, went on to observe that the issue as to consideration "was a 'collateral' rather than a 'direct' issue in the suit." He said:—"The plaintiff might have succeeded without having a finding upon it if he had proved an admission by the defendant that the sum claimed was due for interest, or had shown that the Rs. 2,475, (the sum alleged to have been paid for interest) had been expressly paid on account of the larger sum which he said the defendant owed for interest." This is immediately followed by the sentence:—"If the decision of the Assistant Commissioner is conclusive, he will, although he could not have tried the question in a suit on the bond, have bound the plaintiff as effectually as if he had jurisdiction to try that suit. Their Lordships think that this was not intended and that by Court of competent jurisdiction Act X of 1877, means a Court which has jurisdiction over the matter in the subsequent suit in which the decision is used as conclusive, or, in other words, a Court of concurrent jurisdiction." It is clear to my mind that his Lordship in making the observation contained in the previous sentence was only dealing with the question of the necessity of concurrent jurisdiction in the Court which tried the earlier suit, and he used the expression 'collateral' in the sense of 'not referring to the subject-matter of the previous suit' and that he did not mean that it was not necessary for the decision of the suit on the issues raised between the parties on the pleadings in the case. The observation was made with reference to the principle that the judgment of a Court not having jurisdiction to try the later suit would not be res judicata on any issue in the earlier suit, but only with respect to the actual subject-matter of the previous suit. In Run Bahadur Singh v. Lucho Koer (12) the decision in Misir Raghobardial v. Sheo Baksh Singh (11) was treated as an authority only on the question that the adjudication of a Court not having concurrent jurisdiction with that trying the later suit would not make the decision of an issue res judicata. Both Misir Raghobardial v. Sheo Baksh Singh (11) and Run Bahadur Singh v. Lucho Koer (12), on the other hand, proceed on the assumption that if there had been concurrence of jurisdiction in the two Courts, the finding on an issue in the earlier suit would have given rise to a successful plea of res judicata. It would appear that in the Duchess of Kingston's case (13), which was referred to by Sir Richard Couch in the judgment in Misir Ragho Bardial v. Sheobaksh Singh (11), the expression 'direct issue' as opposed to a 'collateral' one was used in the sense of an issue directly determining the subject-matter of the previous proceedings and not in the sense in which it is obviously used in the Indian statute. There is, in my opinion, no foundation at all for making a distinction between an explicit decision and an implied decision of an issue in the application of the doctrine of res judicata, provided the matter raised in the issue was directly and substantially in issue in the earlier suit. If the decision was not sufficiently explicit, that would, no doubt, furnish the party affected by it in the earlier suit a good ground for appeal against the decision just as any other error or imperfection would do, but the defect in the finding is not one that can be collaterally attacked in the later suit. The same observation would apply even if an issue regarding a matter directly and substantially in issue in the former suit was not clearly raised or not raised at all, provided the matter is such that it must be taken to have been decided in the earlier suit, that is, provided the judgment would not be sustainable unless the matter be taken to have been decided. Mr. Justice Sankaran Nair holds that Explanation IV, which states that "any matter which might and ought to have been made ground of defence or attack in such former suit shall be deemed to have been a matter directly and substantially in issue in such suit," does not qualify the statement in the principal clause that the matter in issue should have been heard and finally decided by such Court. It is, of course, true that the matter should have been decided in contemplation of law but if, as the learned Judge concedes, it is sufficient if the matter must be taken to have been decided by necessary implication so far as the subject-matter of the suit and anything involved in the decree itself are concerned, what reason is there for putting a different construction on the same words as applied to the decision of an issue? And, in so far as what is involved in the decree is concerned, any matter which might and ought to have been made ground of defence or attack must be taken to have been decided, there is, in my opinion, equally no reason for not applying the same principle with respect to a matter directly and substantially in issue in an issue in the previous suit. As I have already observed, the language of Explanation IV is equally applicable both to the previous suit itself and to an issue in the suit. What use is there in enacting that what ought to have been made ground of defence or attack in the former suit shall be deemed to have been a matter directly and substantially in issue in that suit, if the matter is not also to be taken to have been decided in the previous suit? What was not made ground of defence or attack could not have been expressly decided. The Explanation would, therefore, be objectless if a decision also is not to be implied and made the ground of estoppel with respect to what is impliedly to be regarded as having been directly and substantially in issue. At any rate, the logical result of the respondent's position must be to make an explicit decision equally necessary with respect to a ground of attack or defence not having been urged with regard to a matter involved in the decree itself in the previous suit. The learned Judge's position is, no doubt, supported by several decisions in the Calcutta High Court [Kailash Mondul v. Baroda Sundari Dasi (14); Woomesh Chandra Maitia v. Barada Das Maitra (15)] but, in my opinion, these decisions are absolutely unsupportable and quite inconsistent with the decisions of the Privy Council in Pahalwan Singh v. Maharaja Muheshur Buksh Singh Bahadur (4) and Mahomed Ibrahim Hossain Khan v. Ambika Prashad Singh (16), even if the decision of the same tribunal in Sri Gopal v. Pirthi Singh (2) could be distinguished, as stated by Sankaran Nair, J., on the ground that the implication of a decision on an issue, which ought to have been raised in the previous suit, was justifiable in that case as the decree passed in the earlier suit would itself be affected otherwise. The Calcutta High Court, however, did not consider Sri Gopal v. Pirthi Singh (2) distinguishable on that ground. Mr. Justice Gurudas Banerjee, who was a party to the decision in Kailash Mondal v. Baroda Sundari Dasi (14), observed, in Rajendra Nath Ghose v. Tarangini Dasi (17), that the position adopted by him in the previous case would require to be re-considered in consequence of the decision in Sri Gopal v. Pirthi Singh (2). The same view was taken by the Calcutta High Court in Kailash Chandra Mandal v. Ram Narain Giri (18); Jamadar Singh v. Serajuddin Ahmed Chowdhuri (19) and Mohim Chandra Sarkar v. Anil Bandhu Adhikary (20), although Jamadar Singh v. Serajuddin Ahmed Chowdhuri (19) might be explicable if the distinction adopted by Sankaran Nair, J, be correct. This Court also has held that a ground of attack or defence, which a party omitted to bring forward in an earlier suit, must be taken to have been decided in the suit. See Arunachalam Chetty v. Meyyappa Chetty (21); Masilamani Pillai v. Tiruvengadam Pillai (22). The point seems to me to be so obviously clear that it does not deserve further consideration.

According to the respondent's argument, although a matter not necessary to sustain the actual decree in an earlier suit will not be res judicata in a later suit if the decision on it is only by way of implication, yet it would be res judicata if it expressly decided it. That an express decision would constitute an estoppel was regarded by Sankaran Nair, J., as concluded by the decision of the Privy Council in Pittapur Raja v. Buchi Sitayya (10), to which might be added several other rulings. [See Gobind Chunder Koondoo v. Taruck Chunder Bose (23); Soorjomonee Dayee v. Sudhanund Mohapatter (19); Krishna Behari Roy v. Brojeswari Chowdranee (8)]. But the test laid down in these cases was not whether the decision was explicit but whether the issue was one on which the judgment in the previous suit was based, quite apart from the question whether the decree itself would be affected by the matter being re-opened in the later suit. If the judgment was not based on the issue, then the decision of the issue, whether express or implied, cannot constitute the matter res judicata in the later suit.

These are the general principles which, in my opinion, must guide the Court in determining whether the question of the correctness of the patta is res judicata by the decision in the previous suit for the rent of Fasli 1314. The point is, was the question of the propriety of the patta directly in issue in the previous suit and was it decided expressly or by implication? In my opinion, the question whether a decree for rent involves a decision that a proper patta had been tendered is one which must be decided with reference to the facts of each case. It is perfectly true, as pointed out by Sankaran Nair, J., that the tender of a patta is not essential to a landlord to recover rent and that the parties may dispense with it. It may be right to go farther and say that a ryot may, if he chose, not insist on the tender of a proper patta before he pays rent for any particular year and that this will not affect his right to require a proper patta in any subsequent year and resisting a suit for rent on the ground that a proper patta has not been tendered. It may be open, therefore, to a defendant to raise no plea at all about the correctness of a patta in a suit instituted for the rent of a particular year; this may not estop him from resisting a subsequent suit for rent for another year on the ground that the patta alleged to be tendered is not correct. This may possibly apply even in cases where the plaintiff alleged in the earlier suit that he tendered a patta containing proper terms. But the effect of a decision depends in large measure on the actual contest between the parties. A party may not be bound to raise a particular plea, but if he does raise a plea, which would be an effective answer to the suit, then the same plea cannot be raised again in a later suit between him and his opponent. It may be that the actual decree alone in the previous suit, with respect to its subject-matter would not lead to an implication of the decision of a particular matter, but if the matter, is put in contest and the result of the contest would be that the judgment in the case must depend on the decision of the matter, then it is clear to my mind that the decision would constitute it res judicata in a subsequent suit and it is absolutely immaterial whether the decision be express or implied. Of course, it is open to the parties to show that the contest on any matter was subsequently waived or that the Court refused to decide the matter, but if neither of these events took place, a decision by the Court on the matter must necessarily be implied if it was not expressly decided. In the case before us, we have a decree for rent. It is said this did not necessarily require a decision as to the terms of the patta or the extent of the land for which the rent was decreed. Is this correct, when the terms of the patta or the specification of the extent of the land were impugned? When these questions were raised by the defendant, could the Court pass a judgment for rent in the plaintiff's favour without determining them? The learned Judge seems to proceed on the footing that the question what is necessary to be decided in a suit is to be settled without reference to the pleas raised by the defendant. With all deference, this seems to be an altogether indefensible position.

In Pahalwan Singh v. Maharaja Muheshur Buksh Singh Bahadur (4), a suit was instituted in the Shahabad Court for recovering certain land as an accretion to the estate of the plaintiff in that suit in the District of Shahabad. The defendant in the suit claimed the land as an accretion to his own estate in the District of Ghazipur. The Courts decided that the land was an accretion to the plaintiff's estate in Shahabad and not to the defendant's estate in Ghazipur. The defendant subsequently instituted a suit in the Ghazipur Court for the land to which the subject of the former suit was found to be an accretion. The Privy Council held that the finding in the earlier suit necessarily decided that the land claimed by the plaintiff in the later suit was in the District of Shahabad and that the Court of Ghazipur had no jurisdiction. It will be noted that the property in the two suits was different. Any plea as to the District, in which the property in the later suit was situated, was not a necessary one, the immediate question in the earlier suit being merely whether the land was an accretion to the property of the plaintiff or of the defendant in the suit; but the parties went to trial on the question whether the land was an accretion to the plaintiff's estate in Shahabad or the defendant's estate in Ghazipur and the issue which arose on their contest was regarded as determining the question in which district the property in dispute in the later suit was situate. Their Lordships observed: "Now, no doubt, it might be possible to suppose cases in which the decision as to the accretion might not necessarily be a decision that the land to which it was accreted was within the local jurisdction of the Court which had dealt with it. But all these questions must be tried with respect to the subject-mattter in the particular suit; and it seems to their Lordships impossible, in construing the section with reference to what was in issue in the former suit, to come to any other conclusion than that the decision did, by necessary implication, find that the green land was within the settled estate of the Maharaja in Shahabad. He came as plaintiff into Court; he claimed the whole of the land as an accretion to his settled estate in Shahabad. From the map and the evidence it is obvious that, if an accretion to his land, it could be an accretion to nothing but the green land. The accretion was found to be an accretion to his land in the settled estate of Shahabad, and that proposition necessarily implied that the green land was a part of the settled estate of Shahabad."

In Soorjomonee Dayee v. Suddanund Mohapatter (9), the Privy Council held that if the right to certain property is contested on a ground equally applicable to that and other property, then the decision of the matter will be res judicata not only with regard to that property but with regard to all other property embraced by the ground on which the contest is based, and that the pleadings must be referred to to decide what matter was contested between the parties. Their Lordships observe: "In their Lordship's opinion, the effect of the pleadings is that the plaintiff sought, inter alia, to set aside the Will on the ground that the testator had not the power to make any of the devises of reality that it contained, inasmuch as he could not devise ancestral real property, and all his real property was in point of law ancestral consisting of such as he had inherited from his father, and such as he had bought out of the income of it .... If both parties invoked the opinion of the Court upon this question, if it was raised by the pleadings and argued, their Lordships are unable to come to the conclusion that, merely because an issue was not framed which, strictly construed, embraced the whole of it, therefore, the judgment upon it was ultra vires. To so hold would appear scarcely consistent with the case of Musammat Mitna v. Syad Fuzl Rub (24), wherein it was held that in a case where there had been no issues at all, but where, nevertheless, it plainly appeared what the question was which was raised by the parties in their pleadings, and was actually submitted by them to the Court, the judgment upon it was valid." This was a decision under Act VIII of 1859, which did not expressly lay down the rule of res judicata with regard to an issue in a suit. In Tiru bhuwan Bahadur Singh v. Rameshar Baksh Singh (25), it was laid down by the Privy Council that the conduct of the parties must be considered in deciding whether an issue was material for the decision in the earlier suit. In Aghore Nath Mookerjee v. Kamuni Debi (26), Mookerjee and Teunon, JJ., held that if a person, who has no present interest in the bequests contained in a Will, is made a party to a suit which asked for the construction of the Will and the determination of all rights created by it and he takes an active part in the contest relating to the construction, the decision of the Court on the construction would be res judicata against him. It is true that it is not always easy to decide what was directly and substantially in issue in a former suit. Issues are often framed by Courts not only on points which are essential for the determination of the actual matter in controversy between the parties but also on subsidiary questions having more or less bearing on the essential points. A decision on such subsidiary questions need not necessarily make the matter raised by them res judicata in a subsequent suit where they became material for the decision of the matter then brought under contest. Again, a decision on one of two questions may be enough to determine a contest, but both the questions might be adjudicated on and made the basis of the judgment. In such a case, the matter raised in both the questions would be res judicata although if the judgment had been based on one of them alone, the other would not be res judicata. Again, suppose a suit is instituted for the recovery of certain properties, the defendant might merely deny the plaintiff's title to those properties and the issues might relate only to the particular properties claimed. In such a case, a pronouncement on points involving both the properties under litigation and other properties might not lead to estoppel by res judicata. But suppose the defendant rests his defence on a ground which admittedly covers both the properties claimed by the plaintiff in the suit and other properties as for instance by claiming them all under a Will and the issue as to the Will is decided against him, then in that case if the plaintiff subsequently claims other properties under the Will, the question as to the Will would obviously be res judicata. Suppose, again, a plaintiff claims on the basis of his right under a Will some of the properties comprised in it and the defendant contests the genuineness of the Will; the decision of the Court that the Will is or is not genuine will certainly bind both the plaintiff and the defendant in any litigation between the parties with reference to other properties in the will. In a suit for rent for a particular year, it may often not be easy to determine whether any particular question raised relates only to the claim made for the year or is one which would affect the right to rent for other years also. The Court has in each case to decide whether the issue covers the plaintiff's right to rent except for the year for which it is claimed. In Vythilinga Mudaliar v. Ramachandra Naicker (5), cited by Dr. Swaminathan for the respondent, the question raised in the earlier suit for rent was whether the defendant was in possession of all the lands for which rent was claimed. This Court held that any finding on the question would not be res judicata in a suit for rent for a subsequent year as the land of which the defendant was in possession might not have been the same in both the years. Mr. Justice Subramania Aiyar, whose judgment was concurred in by Mr. Justice Sankaran Nair, observed, however, that a decision on a point which would affect the right to rent for both the years could not be disputed in the later suit. He observed (page 383): "No doubt, had the decision in the previous suit been to the effect that certain specific parcels constituted part of the inam, the choultry in the present suit could not, if it admitted the possession during the period in question here of those parcels, seek to make out that the parcels were not inam." Nil Madhub Sarkar v. Brojo Nath Singha (27) is probably supportable on similar grounds, although some of the observations in the judgment seem to be open to exception. In a very recent case, Kali Kumar v. Bidhu Bhushan (28), Mookerjee and Teunon, JJ., held that an issue raised on the disputed point in a suit for rent and decided by a Court would operate as res judicata in a subsequent suit for rent. Mookerjee, J., considers the point as settled beyond all controversy and refers to Ekabar Sheikh v. Hara Bewah (29) and Hara Chandra Bairagi v. Bepin Behari Das (30) in support of his statement. The same view was taken by another Bench of the Calcutta High Court in Maharani Beni Parshad Koeri v. Raja Kumar Chowbey (31). Sometimes, in a suit for rent by a landlord against his tenant, a third party intervenes and claims the land as his own and it becomes difficult to decide whether a decision in the suit as to the plaintiff's right to rent would be res judicata in a subsequent suit regarding the title between the plaintiff in the previous suit and the intervenor. The questions material for deciding a right to rent as against a particular tenant are, of course, very different from the considerations that will arise in a suit for title between rival landlords. If the suit was, in fact, expressly or impliedly allowed to be expanded in character and was regarded also as one for the declaration of the landlord's title as against the intervenor and a decision as to title was arrived at, the finding might be res judicata in any subsequent proceedings between the two rival landlords. But a mere decree for rent against a tenant need not amount to any decision in a contest about title. This was the ground on which the decision of the Privy Council in Run Bahadur Singh v. Lucho Koer (12) proceeded, though estoppel by res judicata was avoided in that case on the ground also of the absence of concurrent jurisdiction in the Court that decided the previous suit. In the present case, the question raised in the previous suit, Original Suit No. 430 of 1906, was whether the patta tendered was proper. The terms in question did not relate to any incidents special for the year Fasli 1314 but to the relationship between the plaintiff and the defendants generally as the owners of melvaram and the kudivaram interests in the land respectively. Section 4 of the Rent Recovery Act, VIII of 1865, required that the rent payable and all other material incidents of the tenancy should be stated in the patta to be tendered to the tenant and according to section 7 of the Act, no suit was maintainable unless the landlord had previously tendered to the tenant such a patta as he was bound to accept. The defendants were not bound to accept a patta which was incorrect in any particular. If the extent was wrongly stated or the rent was stated to be payable in kind while any portion of it was not, they could refuse to accept the patta. The plea raised by them in substance was that there were defects in the patta which entitled them not to accept it and that the suit should, therefore, be dismissed. The question, therefore, was whether there were any such defects in the patta. The trial would, of course, proceed on the defects which the defendants insisted on. With regard to the issue whether the patta was proper or not, the defendants were bound to raise all objections that they could to the contents of the patta, and if they failed to do so, they must be taken to have raised them and all points that they could have raised must be taken to have been impliedly decided against them. Suppose the defence in this case was that the plaintiff was not the holder at all of the plaint lands. Suppose that though the defendants raised that defence in the previous suit, the matter was not explicitly decided; or suppose they did not raise the defence at all. The question being one which related not merely to the rent for the particular year, 1317, but to the plaintiff's right to claim rent for any year, the matter must be regarded as res judicata. It has been established by the cases in this Court that a decision with regard to the proper terms of patta to be tendered by a land-holder to his ryot for any one year is res judicata with regard to subsequent years, unless the terms related specially to the particular year or there was a change in the terms of the tenancy [Sree Venkatachalapati v. Krishna (32); Sellappa Chetty v. Velayutha Tevan (33)]. In the latter case, the tenant did not object in the earlier suit to some of the stipulations in the patta. It was held by Benson and Wallis, JJ., that estoppel by res judicata was nevertheless applicable to the case. Sankaran Nair, J., distinguishes it from the present case on the ground that in both, the suits were to enforce acceptance of pattas and not for rent and that the decision that the patta is proper would necessarily involve a finding that the lands referred to in the patta belong to the plaintiff. But the question raised related to some of the terms of the patta only and not to the ownership of the land. The trial of the question as to the ownership of the land in the later suit would not affect the decree in the earlier suit—the cause of action was different. The objections taken in the later suit were not expressly decided in the earlier suit. According to the tests adopted by the learned Judge, Sellappa Chetty v. Velayutha Tevan (33) must be regarded as wrongly decided. I am of opinion that the principle of that decision is clearly applicable to the present case. In both, the question raised bore on the relationship of the parties, not for the particular year in question in the earlier suit, but subsisting between them during future years also. The defendant raised questions relating to the permanent relationship between the parties. He was entitled to raise them and his pleas, if successful, would be an effective answer to the plaintiff's suit. These are the tests for deciding whether the rule of res judicata is applicable. See Natesa Gramani v. Vencatrama Reddi (34). Assuming, therefore, that the specific objections to the patta raised in this suit were not expressly decided in the previous suit, that point is immaterial. It is by no means clear, however, that one at least of the points was not decided. The finding was that the terms of the patta "did not contain any objectionable matter." The question as to the extent was certainly raised in the previous suit. There is nothing to show that the Court did not decide everything that was comprised in the written statement of the defendants. The question as to whether the rent was not payable in kind for a portion of the lands was not raised in the written statement. Whether evidence was led with regard to it, it is impossible to say, but the Court was entitled to try the issue as to the correctness of the patta on the pleadings in the case; and if any matter of attack with reference to the patta was not raised by the defendant, he must be taken to have raised it, for any successful attack of the terms would be a complete defence to the suit for rent. I am of opinion, therefore, that the issue on the question of res judicata must be decided in the plaintiff's favour. I cannot agree with the respondent's contention that as the suit for rent related only to the year 1314, the defendant, who resisted the suit on the ground that the terms of the tenancy were not properly embodied in the patta tendered by the plaintiff, was entitled to keep back any objections on the ground that it would be profitable to him to do so with respect to that particular year. As the Appellate Court has not disposed of all the questions in the case, the case cannot be finally disposed of here. The decree of this Court in Second Appeal No. 640 of 1909, and the decree of the lower Appellate Court must be reversed and the appeal remanded for fresh disposal according to law. All costs in this Court must abide the result.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—The question for decision in this appeal is whether the defendants, who are tenants under plaintiff, (a landholder), are barred by res judicata owing to the decision in a previous suit brought by the plaintiff against them to recover rent for two previous Faslis (1314 and 1315) from setting up the contention that the patta tendered for the plaint Fasli (1316) contained improper terms as to the extent of the lands in defendants' holding and as to defendants' liability to pay waram rent for a portion of their holding and that hence they (the defendants) are not liable for the rent of Fasli 1316, the present suit having been brought to recover such rent.

2. The former suit brought for the rent of Faslis 1314 and 1315 is Original Suit No. 430 of 1906. The pattas tendered for those faslis contained practically the same entries as are found in the disputed patta for Fasli 1316. The defendants contended then (see Exhibit C), among other defences, that,—

(a) "The pattas alleged to have been tendered are not proper" and

(b) "The extent of defendant's jeroyati land has been very much overstated by plaintiff."

In the present suit also, they put forward the same defences, though they gave more details, viz.,

(*a*1) that 3 acres are "cash rent paying lands," and

(*b*1) that the extent of the lands liable to pay rent is 5 acres plus 3 acres (and not about 14 acres entered in the patta).

3. In the former suit, the very first issue raised the question "whether the pattas tendered are proper" and the finding of the Court was as follows :—

"The terms of the pattas, Exhibits E and F, do not contain any objectionable matter. I accordingly find the 1st issus in the affirmative." According to section 4 of the Rent Recovery Act VIII of 1865, "the patta shall contain.....the local description and extent of the land; the amount and nature of the rent according as the same is payable in money or in kind or by a share of the produce, etc, etc." Thus, when the Court in the former suit found no objectionable matter in the pattas for Faslis 1314 and 1315 and when it found the 1st issue in that case (viz., whether the pattas tendered were proper) in the affirmative, it clearly found,

(*a*2) that the nature of the rent payable for the entire lands is waram share of the produce as entered in the pattas, and

(*b*2) that the extent of the lands liable to pay rent is 14 acres as found in the pattas.

The Court, undoubtedly, overruled defendants' contention that the extent was not 14 acres and that the pattas were alse otherwise improper. It is not clear whether defendants, at the trial of that suit, prominently put forward the contention that 3 acres of the lands were liable to pay only cash rent and not waram produce, but it cannot, in my opinion, be denied that when they attacked the pattas as containing improper terms, they were bound to put forward all the grounds on which they attacked the pattas as improper and could not be allowed to put forward some grounds of attack alone for one fasli and other grounds for other faslis. As has been decided in Vythilinga Mudaliar v. Ramachandra Naicker (5), Sellappa Chetty v. Velayutha Tevan (33) and Natesa Gramani v. Venkatarama Reddi (34), a decision as to the standing terms of a patta between a landlord and a tenant for one fasli is res judicata in respect of such terms for all subsequent faslis, though, of course, the tenant might prove in a subsequent fasli that by the act of God or anything which has subsequently happened (i. e., by proper relinquishment of a portion of his holding, etc.) and which gives him a legal right to have the terms modified, the conditions and terms of the tenancy have been altered.

4. The pattas for Faslis 1314 and 1315 having been expressly found to be proper pattas (that is, to contain the proper extent of land in defendants' holding and proper rates and kinds of rent) in the former suit, the defendants are, in my opinion, clearly barred by res judicata from contending that a similar patta tendered for plaint Fasli (1316) was not a proper patta. The learned Judge, whose judgment is under appeal before this Full Bench, held (if I understand rightly his observations in pages 5 to 8 of his judgment)—

(a) that the question as to the extent of the lands to be entered in the annual patta and the kind of rent leviable on 3 acres of the holding was not "directly and substantially in issue" in the former suit, because a decision on the above question was "not essential for the decree that was passed in Original Suit No. 430 of 1906" and was "not essential for the relief finally granted in the former case" as "a decree for rent does not necessarily involve" or "require a decision as to the terms of the patta or the extent of the land for which the rent has to be paid;"

(b) that assuming that a decision on that question was essential in the former suit, and assuming, therefore, that "the question must be deemed to have been directly and substantially in issue under Explanation IV to section 11 of the Civil Procedure Code, even though the parties did not raise that question as they were bound to raise it," it did not follow that the question must be deemed to have been "as a matter of fact" "heard and decided;"

(c) that in the former suit, the question in the present suit was not 'heard and decided' expressly and 'we are not bound to imply' that it was so decided;

(d) that the 'causes of action' and the 'subject-matters' of the two suits are different;

(e) that it 'is not enough' that 'a determination' in the present suit (about the extent of lands and rate of rent) 'would be inconsistent with the decision in the previous case that the patta then tendered was proper' to prevent such determination in the present suit by the bar of res judicata, and

(f) that on all the above grounds, the question in the present suit whether the patta for Fasli 1316 is a proper one is not concluded by the decision in the former suit.

5. A decree for rent between an ordinary landlord and an ordinary tenant may not necessarily involve a decision as to the terms of the lease or as to the extent of land comprised in the lease. But a decision under the Rent Recovery Act VIII of 1865, where the landlord sued for rent on the allegation that the standing terms of the tenancy were contained in the patta tendered by him mentioning particular terms and the particular extent of the holding, does, in my opinion, involve and require a decision as to whether the terms of the lease are proper and the extent of land covered by the holding is as alleged in the patta tendered by the landlord and hence the reason (a) given by the learned Judge seems to me to fail. The case in Nil Madhub Sarkar v. Brojo Nath Singha (27), quoted by the learned Judge, is, therefore, not applicable and the earlier case in Gobind Chunder Koondoo v. Taruck Chunder Bose (23) and the cases in Venkatachalapathi v. Krishna (32), Natesa Gramani v. Venkatarama Reddi (34), Pittapur Raja v. Buchi Sitayya (10) and Sellappa Chettyar v. Velayutha Tevan (33), also quoted by the learned Judge and referred to by him with approval, seem to me to clearly govern this case.

6. I shall next deal with the argument that even though the question was directly and substantially in issue because the decision involved the finding on that issue, it must also have been heard and decided before it can be deemed res judicata. There are, no doubt, observations in Kailash Mondul v. Baroda Sundari Dasi (14); Woomesh Chandra Maitra v. Barada Das Maitra (15), and Rajendranath Ghose v. Tarangini Dasi (17), to the above effect, but, as pointed out by Subramania Iyer, J., in Arunachalam Chetti v. Meyyappa Chetti (21), if a Court is bound, by Explanation II to section 13 of the old Civil Procedure Code (corresponding to Explanation IV to section 11 of the new Code), to adopt and act upon the fiction that a matter, which might and ought to have been made a ground of defence or attack in the former suit, should be deemed to have been a matter directly and substantially in issue in such suit, that same Explanation necessarily imposes the duty of acting upon the further fiction that that matter was also heard and decided and adjudicated upon in the former suit. Explanation II to section 13 would be meaningless, as pointed out by the Allahabad High Court in Sri Gopal v. Pirthi Singh (1), if it were necessary in cases which were covered by it that the matter should have been, as a matter of fact, heard and finally decided in the previous suit. That case in Sri Gopal v. Pirthe Singh (1) follows the Privy Council cases in Mahabir Pershad Singh v. Macnaghten (35) and Kameswar Pershad v. Rajkumari Ruttan Keor (36) and the interpretation of section 13 by the Allahabad High Court in that case was approved and adopted by the Privy Council when the case went on appeal before their Lordships in Sri Gopal v. Pirthi Singh (2). The cases in Kailash Mondul v. Baroda Sundari Dasi (14); Woomesh Chandra Maitra v. Barada Das Maitra (15) and Rajendranath Ghose v. Tarangini Dasi (17), being opposed to the above decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council, can, no longer, be considered good law. In fact, the Calcutta High Court itself, in Jamadar Singh v. Serajuddin Ahmed Chaudhuri (19), has virtually dissented from the cases in Kailash Mondal v. Baroda Sunndari Dasi (14) and Woomesh Chandra Maitra v. Barada Das Maitra (15). At page 937, one of the learned Judges says [In Jamadar Singh's case (19) :—"It is very difficult to see how a matter, which ex hypothesi was not before the former Court, could possibly have been heard and finally decided by it; and it seems to me that if this were necessary, the whole of Explanation II (to section 13) would be rendered meaningless." Their Lordships also decided in that case that the decision in Sri Gopal v. Pirthi Singh (1), is good law and that it is not necessary that the subject-matter of the two suits must be the same before Explanation II (to section 13) can be applied. I might, however, state that this question (b) does not really arise in this case because I am unable to agree with the learned Judge whose judgment is under appeal, that the present question was not, as a matter of fact, heard and decided in the former suit. In the statement of facts in the beginning of this judgment, I believe I have shown that the question was really heard and decided as the defendant raised the plea as to the impropriety of the patta in the former suit and his plea was expressly overruled. (See Soorjomonee Dayee v. Suddanund Mohapatter (9), which decides that pleadings must be looked into to understand what was in issue and what was decided in the former suit). The fact that the cause of action and the subject-matters of the two suits are different is immaterial because the only question is whether the decision in the former suit on certain issues of fact is res judicata in the present suit and it is not necessary under section 11 that the causes of action and the subject-matters of the two suits should be the same for a decision on issues of fact to constitute res judicata in a subsequent suit. Lastly, I am unable to hold that the decision as to the terms of the patta in the former suit was on a mere collateral question in the former suit. Section 11 does not use the word 'collateral' but uses the words 'directly and substantially in issue.' The Privy Council case in Misir Raghobardial v. Sheo Baksh Singh (11) was decided mainly on the ground that the Court which tried the first suit was not competent to try the second suit and hence that the decision of an issue in the first suit was not res judicata in the second suit. There is an expression at page 445 of the judgment that the issue decided in the former suit was merely a "collateral" issue, though the facts show that it was a direct and substantial issue. In the Duchess of Kingston's case (13), it would seem to have been held that where the Court which decided the first suit was not competent to decide the second suit, the question of fact decided by the former Court, though material for the decision, must be deemed to have been "collateral" to the subject-matter of the first suit. It was with reference to that use of the word "collateral" that the Privy Council held that the Court, which decided the first suit, dealt with that issue only as a collateral issue. If the Privy Council, by their obiter dictum, intended to state that the question was not directly and substantially in issue in the former suit, a dictum irreconcilable with the Privy Council decision in Pahalwan Singh v. Maharaja Muheshur Buksh Singh Bahadur (4), such dictum must be held to have been overruled by their later decisions already set out including Sri Gopal v. Pirithi Singh (2). The latest Privy Council case in Mahomed Ibrahim

(35) 16 C. 682; 16 I. A. 107.
(36) 20 C. 79; 19 I. A. 234.

Hossain Khan v. Ambika Pershad Singh (16), seems to me to be conclusive on the matter, for their Lordships decide that section 13, Explanation II, would bar a defendant who omits to raise a material issue in a former suit when he was a party thereto, even though that issue was not, as a matter of fact, heard and decided in the former suit. The case in Masilamani Pillai v. Tiruvengadam Pillai (22) seems also to me to be conclusive on this question of res judicata. It is, no doubt, not enough to constitute res judicata that a determination contra in a later suit would be inconsistent with the determination in the former suit; for there is also a further requisite that the Court which decided the former suit should have been competent to decide the later suit. In this case, this latter requisite also is complied with, and I am, therefore, clear that the findings of fact in the former suit are res judicata, one of those findings being that the defendants held the extent of lands mentioned in the patta tendered to them and are bound to pay rent according to the terms of the said patta.

7. I may now refer, shortly, to one important question which was lightly touched upon during the arguments, namely, whether, where the subject-matter of the former litigation and the relief claimed therein were the same as those claimed in the subsequent litigation, the plaintiff can bring two suits on what is put forward by him as two different causes of action. The question does not really arise in this case, but I wish to state that I agree with Subramania Aiyar, J, in Arunachellam Chetty v. Meyyappa Chetty (21) that Courts should try their best to hold that the causes of action in such cases are substantially the same. I shall here quote West, J.'s observations (quoted also by Subramania Aiyar, J.): "Under systems such as the Roman Law or the English Common Law, in which the development of legal rights and duties has been greatly influenced by the re-action of a highly artificial mode of procedure, appropriate forms of action can be found for nearly all the ordinary cases which the legal consciousness of the community recognises as justifying an exercise of the coercive power of the State; but, as the variety of human relations greatly exceeds that of the conceptions, upon which a system of actions can be framed, it happens that the same transction or group of circumstances may furnish a ground for several different actions. In such cases, different causes of action arise to the party injured; but as it is felt that the same set of facts, which the mind at once grasps as jurally integral, ought not to be made the basis of repeated proceedings, the complaining party is allowed to frame his complaint in various ways, and the rule obtains that all the circumstances which exist when the former of two actions is brought and can be brought forward in support of it, shall be brought forward then, not reserved for a second action arising out of the same events. The cause of action is regarded as identical, though the form of action differs on the second occasion, and the test applied is whether the evidence to support both actions is substantially the same [Hitchin v. Campbell (37): Martin v. Kennedy (38)]. Under a freer system of procedure, such as that of the Equity Courts in England or of the Civil Courts in India, second suits are to be admitted more sparingly than when the plaintiff has to proceed by set forms of action. As he can bring forward his whole case, unfettered by artificial restraints, and seek all remedies that the Court can justly award upon the facts proved, there is no reason why he should be permitted to harass his opponent and occupy the time of the Courts by repeated investigations of a set of facts which ought all to have been submitted for adjudication at once. His cause of action, into whatever Protean forms it may be moulded by the ingenuity of Pleaders, is to be regarded as the same, if it rests on facts which are integrally connected with those upon which a right and infringement of the right have already been once asserted as a ground for the Court's interference".

I am aware that Benson and Bashyam Iyengar, JJ., in Ramaswami Aiyar v. Vythinatha Aiyar (39) discuss some of the observations in the decision in Arunachellam Chetty v. Meyyappa Chetty (21) with disapproval and Subramania Aiyar, J., himself in Veeranna Pillai v. Muthukumara Asari (40) said that "anything in the language used" by him in Arunachellam Chetty v. Meyyaypa Chetty (21)

"inconsistent with the view of the law as expounded" in Ramaswami Aiyar v. Vythinatha Aiyar (39) "can no longer be treated as an authority." I am, however, inclined to hold, with due deference to the contrary opinions, that all the observations in Arunachellam Chetty v. Meyyappa Chetty (21) as to the scope of the doctrine of res judicata are sound law and those observations in Ramaswami Aiyar v. Vythinatha Aiyar (39), which conflict with the views in Arunachellam Chetty v. Meyyappa Chetty (21), seem to me to draw rather fine distinctions and, in my humble judgment, would lead to unnecessary and undesirable multiplicity of litigation. However, in so far as any principle in Arunachellam Chetty v. Meyyappa Chetty (21) is directly inconsistent with the later Full Bench decision of the Madras High Court in Thrikaikat Madathil Raman v. Thiruthiyil Krishnan Nair (41), [which approves of the decision in Ramaswami Aiyar v. Vythinatha Aiyar (39), but which does not refer to and do not expressly overrule Arunachellam Chetty v. Meyyappa Chetty (21), though it expressly overruled only Rangasami Pillai v. Krishna Pillai (42)], I am not anxious that such directly overruled principle should be again reconsidered. As at present advised, I do not see anything in Thrikaikat Madathil Raman v. Thiruthiyil Krishnan Nair (41), irreconcilably inconsistent with any observation in Arunachellam Chetty v. Meyyappa Chetty (21), as two separate mortgages can be separately redeemed, especially if there is an express understanding to that effect between the parties and all that Thrikaikat Madathil Raman v. Thiruthiyil Krishnan Nair (41) decided was that the failure of a suit to redeem one mortgage is not a bar to a suit to redeem another.

8. I would, for the reasons mentioned in paragraphs 5 and 6 of this opinion, reverse the judgment of the lower Courts and remand the case to the lower Appellate Court for a fresh disposal of the appeal before it, the District Munsif not having decided the questions involved in issues 4 and 5 and the lower Appellate Court also not having considered all the issues. The costs hitherto will abide the result.

Appeal allowed.

OUDH JUDICIAL COMMISSIONER'S COURT.

RENT APPEALS NOS. 62 TO 66 OF 1912.

July 16, 1912.

Present:—Mr. Stuart, J. C.

DEPUTY COMMISSIONER, FYZABAD, FOR NANEMAU ESTATE—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

versus

GUR DAYAL SINGH—DEFENDANT—RESPONDENT.

Tenant, holding on after formal ejectment—Oudh Rent Act (XXII of 1886), s. 127.

Where a tenant was ejected formally under the provisions of section 60 of the Oudh Rent Act, but nevertheless continued to cultivate the holding in question without any break for any period, however small:

Held, that the provisions of section 127 of the Oudh Rent Act could not apply to such a case.

Deputy Commissioner of Patrabgarh, Manager of Baragaon Estate v. Sheoambars, 1 O. C. 29, followed.

Appeal against the decision of the District Judge, Fyzabad, dated 15th January 1912, upholding that of the Assistant Collector, Fyzabad, dated 13th October 1911.

Babu N. N. Ghoshal, for the Appellant.

Babu Ishri Dayal, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The respondents were tenants of the Nanemau Estate. They were served with notices of ejectment in November, 1907. They filed objections to ejectment. On 5th April 1908, the Nanemau Estate took counter-parts from the respondents, and leases were prepared in the respondents' favour, but those leases were never signed by or on behalf of the Estate. On 9th April 1908, the respondents withdrew their objections in Court. They stated that the Estate had come to amicable terms with them and had permitted them to remain on as tenants on leases which had been executed. Nevertheless on 15th May 1908, an application was made on behalf of the Estate, under section 60 of the Oudh Rent Act, to eject these tenants from their holdings and they were ejected accordingly in June 1908. The appellant, who represents the Estate, has since come into Court on the allegations that, although the respondents were formally ejected, they have nevertheless remained in cultivatory possession of the holdings in question. The appellant wants to assess rent upon them and to obtain arrears of rent for the two years 1316-17 Faslis. Both the Courts below have decided that rent cannot be assessed in this case under the provisions of section 127 of the Oudh Rent

Act. I concur with their conclusion. The facts show that there has been no period during which the respondents have not been in cultivatory possession of the land. Although they were ejected formally under the provisions of section 60 of the Oudh Rent Act, they have never ceased to cultivate the holdings in question for any period, however small. In the case of Deputy Commissioner, Partabgarh, Manager of Birigaon v. Sheoambar (1), it was decided by Mr. Spankie, that the provisions of section 127 could only apply to the case of a person wrongfully and unwarrantably entering upon and cultivating the land of a landlord without his consent and not to the case of a person lawfully entering upon the land with the landlord's consent, but remaining on it against his Will. That decision applies to the present case. And, upon the interpretation of the provisions of the section contained therein, it is clear that the rent cannot be fixed against the respondents under the provisions of section 127. As the rent cannot be fixed against them, it is, of course, obvious that a decree for rent cannot be passed against them under the provisions of section 103, clause (2). It would be open to the appellant either to recognise the counter-parts, if the respondents are still ready to abide by their terms, and to treat them as tenants under the terms of the counter-parts, or to sue to eject them from their holdings through the Civil Courts and to obtain mesne profits from them. But I am satisfied that it is impossible to give him any relief upon the claims which he has put in. I accordingly dismiss Appeals Nos. 62, 63, 64, 65 and 66 of 1912 with costs.

Appeals dismissed.

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge of Saharanpur, dated the 19th day of July 1911.

Mr. J. N. Choudhri, (with him Messrs. Nihal Chand and A. P. Dube), for the Appellant.

Mr. B. E. O'Conor, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The only question which has been argued in this appeal is whether or not the mortgage sued upon was duly presented and registered in accordance with the provisions of the Indian Registration Act. The document was in fact registered. It has an endorsement that it was presented for registration in the office of the Sub-Registrar. Below this is the name of a person which is variously read as Santha, Nanha, Natha or Sehna. He is described as the servant of the mortgagee. The mortgagor, in answer to the interrogatories served upon him, admits that he was present when the document was being registered and when it was handed over to the Sub-Registrar. He cannot remember apparently who actually handed over the document but he says that some person, whose name probably was Santha, handed over the document. It is clear, however, from the admitted facts in the case that at the time of registration, the mortgagor was present assenting to the registration of the document with full knowledge of what was being done in the office of the Sub-Registrar. The real question for consideration is, whether or not these circumstances amount to a "presentation" within the meaning of section 32 of the Indian Registration Act. Both the Courts below have dismissed the plaintiff's suit on the preliminary point that the mortgage was not duly "presented" for registration There has been some conflict of authority on this question and the point was very fully argued recently before a Full Bench of the ZAKIR ALI v. GULAB RAI.

Court, but unfortunately no decision was pronounced by the Court on the question now before us, the case turning on another point. In the case of Nathumal v. Abdul Wahid Khan (1), a case, in which the facts were very similar to those of the present case, it was decided that where a person who was authorised to "present" a document for registration was present assenting to the registration, the mere fact that his was not the hand to give the document to the Sub-Registrar did not prevent the document being regarded as duly "presented" within the meaning of section. No doubt, a somewhat contrary view was taken in the case of Jambu Prasad v. Aftab Ali Khan (2). We think, under the circumstances, we are entitled to consider the question on its merits without feeling bound by authority, particularly as we have had so recently the benefit of the very full argument advanced in the Full Bench case to which we have referred.

The Privy Council decision in the case of Mujib-un-nissa v. Abdur Rahim (3) has, in our opinion, no application to the circumstances of the present case. In that case, the person who presented the document had been the attorney of a deceased person who wished to execute and register a deed of wakf. Before the document was presented for registration, the donor of the power-of-attorney had died. Consequently, the person presenting the document for registration had no authority from any one to present the document, nor was there any other person present who could have legally "presented"|the document for registration. We think that the remarks of their Lordships in this case must be read and understood in connection with the facts of the case which were before them.

Afther full consideration, we see no reason to depart from the view which we expressed in the case of Nathumal v. Abdul Wahid Khan (1).

We accordingly allow the appeal, set aside the decrees of both the Courts below and remand the case to the Court of first instance through the lower Appellate Court, with directions to re-admit the case upon its original number in the file, and proceed to hear and determine the same according to law. Costs here and heretofore will be costs in the cause. Costs in this Court will include fees on the higher scale.

Appeal allowed; Case remanded.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 201 OF 1911.

July 22, 1912.

Present:—Mr. Stuart, J. C.

Saiyad ZAKIR ALI—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT

versus

Munshi GULAB RAI—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Contract Act (IX of 1872), s. 2 (d)—Consideration—Forbearance to prosecute appeal.

A forbearance to continue an appeal against a person on that person's brother agreeing to pay the amount claimed in appeal is a good consideration.

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Rae Bareli, dated 11th March 1911, upholding that of the Subordinate Judge of Rae Bareli, dated 17th October 1910.

Babu Salig Ram, for the Appellant.

Mr. Shahanshah Husain, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The appellant was defendant in a suit brought in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Rae Bareli upon the basis of a deed of mortgage, dated 30th July 1907. The learned Subordinate Judge decreed the suit against the appellant. An appeal was filed to the Court of the learned District Judge. He dismissed that appeal. The appellant comes here in second appeal. Three points only were argued on behalf of the appellant. The first was, that a portion of the alleged consideration for the deed in question cannot be considered legal consideration. The second point was, that the execution of the deed in question had been obtained by the exercise of undue influence on the appellant. The third point was, that the burden of proof had been improperly placed by the Courts below. The alleged consideration to which objection is taken is with regard to an item of Rs. 447-1-9, which, it is alleged, was due from Zohra Begam, sister of the appellant. It appears that the respondent had filed a suit against Zohra Begam with reference to this item and that the suit had been dismissed, but that the respondent had preferred an appeal against the dismissal of the suit against Zohra Begam. The respondent's case is, that the appellant permitted this amount to be entered in the deed and agreed to make himself responsible for the satisfaction of this claim in consideration of the respondent's forbearing to continue his appeal against Zohra Begam. The respondent thus abstained from doing what he had a right to do, and, under the definition of "consideration" in section 2 (d) of Act IX of 1872, it appears that the consideration so alleged is a good consideration. I am supported in this view by the decision in Jogadindra Nath Roy v. Chundra Nath Poddar (1) and the decision in Orears v. Hunter (2). I find against the appellant on this point.

With regard to the allegation of undue influence, the learned District Judge has found that the appellant's witnesses on this point do not deserve credit. I cannot go behind this finding of fact. Leaving on one side the evidence of these witnesses, the following facts are proved. The respondent is a money-lender and a co-sharer in the village, and the appellant owed him money on more than one account. The brother of the respondent had issued a warrant for the arrest of the appellant in execution of a decree. When an attempt was made to execute this warrant, it was alleged by the process-servers engaged that the appellant had resisted arrest and the Civil Court had thereupon considered whether the appellant should be prosecuted criminally. On the other hand, however, the Civil Court had decided the matter, and had finally decided not to take action against the appellant some time before the deed in question was executed, and at the time when the deed was executed, there were no proceedings for arrest of the appellant pending in the Civil Court. On these facts, I am unable to find that the execution of the deed was caused by undue influence.

(1) 31 C. 242.

(2) 19 Q. B. D. 341; 56 L. J. Q. B. 518; 57 L. T. 554; 35 W. R. 821.

With regard to the question of the burden of proof, the appellant relies on the provisions of section 16 of Act IX of 1872. As I am unable to find on the facts that the respondent was in a position to dominate the will of the appellant, or that the transaction was unconscionable, I find that the burden of proof lay on the appellant.

I, therefore, dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

ALLAHABAD HIGH COURT.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 547 OF 1912.

November 19, 1912.

Present:—Mr. Justice Banerji.

SHYAM CHANDRA SINGH—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

versus

BALDEO AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Mortgage by conditional sale—Foreclosure—Limitation—Regulation XVII of 1806—Limitation Act (XV of 1877), Sch. II, Art. 147, scope of—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882).

The limitation for an application for foreclosure under Regulation XVII of 1806 is 12 years.

Article 147, Schedule II, Limitation Act of 1877, applied not to foreclosure proceedings under the Regulation but to such suits for foreclosure as under the law then in force could be brought.

Where a right to make an application for foreclosure had come to an end by reason of efflux of time, before the enactment of the Transfer of Property Act, the subsequent enactment of the Act could not resuscitate that right.

Where a mortgage by way of conditional sale, governed by Regulation XVII of 1806, has not provided for possession of the mortgagee, the latter has no right to take possession unless foreclosure proceedings have been taken under the Regulation.

A mortgage by conditional sale, executed in 1865, provided for payment of mortgage-money with interest on 31st March 1866. The mortgagee made no application for foreclosure under Regulation XVII of 1806. In 1910, he brought a suit for foreclosure:

Held, that the suit was barred.

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge of Jhansi, dated the 30th of January 1912.

Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru (with him Mr. S. Mushren), for the Appellant.

Dr. S. C. Banerji, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This was a suit for foreclosure of a mortgage by way of conditional

sale, dated May 6th, 1865. The amount secured by the mortgage was Rs. 99-13-0. The document provided that the said amount should be re-paid with interest on Chait Sudi 15th of the following year, corresponding to March 31st, 1866. The defendants Nos. 1 to 3 are heirs of the mortgagor. The defendants Nos. 4 to 5 are in possession of the mortgaged property under a foreclosure decree obtained subsequently to the date of the plaintiff's mortgage. The present suit was brought on August 4th, 1910, and by it the plaintiff claimed foreclosure of the mortgage and possession of the property comprised in it. The Court of first instance dismissed the suit on the ground that it was time-barred and this decree has been affirmed by the lower Appellate Court. The Courts below were of opinion that as the plaintiff mortgagee did not take possession within 12 years of March 31st, 1865, the claim was barred by limitation. This appeal has been preferred by the plaintiff and it is contended that as the plaintiff could not take possession without obtaining foreclosure proceedings, the fact of his not having taken possession within 12 years, did not deprive him of his right to foreclose the mortgage and to sue for possession. This being a mortgage to which Regulation XVII of 1806 applied, the procedure for foreclosing it was that prescribed by section 8 of the Regulation. Until the mortgage was foreclosed in accordance with the Regulation, the mortgagee's right to possession did not accrue. This was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Hub Ali v. Wazir-un-nissa (1). In that case, their Lordships observed that "there was no right to take possession of the property without the procedure prescribed by law." So that, unless foreclosure proceedings were taken under the Regulation, the mortgagee had no right to take possession. If the mortgage-deed had provided for possession, the mortgagee would have been bound to sue for possession within twelve years and if he did not do so, his right as mortgagee would become extinct and the result would have been that he could not subsequently bring a suit for foreclosure. This was the case in Srinath Das v. Khetter Mohun Singh (2). The distinction between a case in which the mortgage-deed provided for possession and a case in which the mortgagee could only take possession after getting the mortgage foreclosed by taking foreclosure proceedings under Regulation XVII of 1806, was pointed out in Modun Mohun Chawdhri v. Ashad Ally Beparee (3). It seems to me, therefore, that the ground on which the Courts below dismissed the suit cannot be supported. The learned Advocate for the respondents, however, contends, that, as, before the passing of the Transfer of Property Act, no suit for foreclosure could be brought and the only remedy of a mortgagee under a mortgage by way of conditional sale was to take foreclosure proceedings under Regulation XVII of 1806, the plaintiff could not maintain his suit unless he had taken those proceedings within the period of limitation applicable thereto, that the period of limitation for such proceedings was 12 years, and as no proceedings was taken within 12 years of March 31st, 1865, the right to foreclosure had become extinct before the Transfer of Property Act came into operation, and the passing of that Act could not revive it. This contention seems to me to be well founded. It has been held by the Calcutta High Court and by this Court, that the limitation for an application for foreclosure under Regulation XVII of 1806 was 12 years. I need only refer to the case of Karimdad Khan v. Mustaqim Khan (4), in which other cases on the point are cited. Therefore, the plaintiff's right to apply for foreclosure proceedings became extinct on March 31st, 1878. On that date no suit for foreclosure could be brought in respect of a mortgage like the one now in question. It was only upon the enactment of Act IV of 1882 (The Transfer of Property Act) that a suit for foreclosure was provided for. It is true that before the date above-mentioned, Act XV of 1877 was enacted and Article 147 of the Schedule to that Act provided a limitation of 60 years for a suit for foreclosure or sale. But that evidently applied not to foreclosure proceedings under the Regulation mentioned above but to such suits for foreclosure as, under the law then in force, could be brought, as for instance, a suit to foreclosure a mortgage made in the English form. The Article was evidently not enacted to provide for the case of foreclosure proceedings under the Regulation. Consequently, the plaintiff could not take the benefit of that Article. His right to make an application for foreclosure having come to an end by reason of efflux of time on March 31st, 1878, the subsequent enactment of the Transfer of Property Act could not resuscitate that right and as he could not take possession without obtaining foreclosure in accordance with the provisions of the Regulation, his present claim could not be sustained. On this ground, I would affirm the decree of the Courts below and dismiss the appeal with costs and I order accordingly.

Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), s. 9—Suit in ejectment by licensee against trespasser, maintainability of.

A licensee of land, if dispossessed by a trespasser, is entitled to maintain not merely a suit under section 9 of the Specific Relief Act, but also a regular suit on the basis of his title as lessee.

Appeal against the decree of the Officiating District Judge, Rae Bareli, dated 17th May 1911, reversing that of the Subordinate Judge, Rae Bareli, dated 8th February 1911.

Mr. Sidheshwar Banerji, for the Appellants.

Mr. Bisheshar Nath, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The point argued in this appeal is that the plaintiff-respondent should have brought his suit under the provisions of section 9 of Act I of 1877, and that as his suit was dismissed by the Court of the learned Subordinate Judge, no appeal lay against the dismissal and that, therefore, the reversal of the learned Subordinate Judge's decree by the learned District Judge was illegal. It is clear from the plaintiff-respondent's plaint that he did not bring this suit under the provisions of section 9 of the Specific Relief Act (I of 1877). There is nothing in the plaint to show that he brought his suit under the provisions of that section and the wording of the plaint contradicts any such supposition. Further, whereas by the provisions of the law, he could have brought a suit under the provisions of section 9 of the Specific Relief Act (I of 1877) on half of the ordinary Court-fee he paid the full Court-fee. I find accordingly that although the plaintiff-respondent could, had he wished, have brought a suit for possession of the property in question under the provisions of section 9 of the Specific Relief Act (I of 1877), he did not bring such a suit, but brought a suit for possession under the ordinary law. It is asserted by the appellants that the plaintiff-respondent had no right to bring a suit under the ordinary law and that his only remedy was to bring a suit under the provisions of section 9 of the Specific Relief Act (I of 1877). The learned Counsel for the appellants has produced no authority in support of this view. The plaintiff-respondent is proved to be a licensee of the land in question and the proposition that a licensee when dispossessed by a trespasser has only the right to bring a suit under the provisions of section 9 of the Specific Relief Act (I of 1877) upon the mere fact of dispossession without stating his title appears insupportable. If that were the law, a licensee, who had been dispossessed by a trespasser, would be debarred from any right of appeal in case the Court found against him on the fact of dispossession. There is, however, nothing to show that the law lays down any such stipulation. This disposes of the main grounds of appeal. It is sufficient to add as to the remainder that the plaintiff-respondent proved clearly his possession within the period of limitation and that the learned District Judge applied the principles of the law correctly.

I dismiss this appeal with costs.

The heir of a person in possession of property is entitled to bring a suit for possession as against one who can show no better title.

One of several persons jointly interested in land may sue to eject a trespasser where the removal of the trespasser is necessary to give the plaintiff enjoyment of his rights.

Second appeal from the decision of the Subordinate Judge of Farukhabad, dated the 29th of April 1912.

Mr. S. N. Sen, for the Appellant.

Mr. Govind Proshad, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This was a suit by one of the widows and the daughter of Qudrat Husain for possession of a bagh. The plaintiffs alleged that Qudrat Husain had purchased half the bagh by private treaty and the other half at an execution sale, that he had died leaving the plaintiffs as his heirs, and that the defendant had interfered with their possession. The lower Appellate Court has found that Qudrat Husain acquired the bagh as stated, that he was in possession of the same within 12 years of the suit, and that he left another widow and a son, whose whereabouts were unknown but whose death had not been proved, but that the plaintiffs as two of the heirs of Qudrat Husain were entitled to a decree for possession of the whole bagh.

The first point taken in second appeal is that secondary evidence of the purchase of half the bagh was not admissible. It appears to me, on the facts found, that the case falls under section 65 (a) or 65 (c) of the Evidence Act and that any secondary evidence of the sale was admissible. The Subordinate Judge finds the sale proved and it is not suggested that there is no evidence to support the finding. Next, it is contended that the rights of the original owners of the bagh were not transferable. It appears to me that even if they were not transferable, Qudrat Husain, having held possession of the bagh, had an interest which devolved upon his heirs and that his heirs are entitled to recover possession against any one who cannot show a better title than they have. The third and last point taken is that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover more than their share of the grove, because the existence of another widow and of a son has been proved. The plaintiffs rely on the decision reported as Munnu v. Nusrat Ullah Khan (1), which follows a previous ruling of this Court reported as Hira Lal v. Bhairon (2). It seems to me that the decisions cited do not cover the present case. They amount to no more than this that one of several persons jointly interested in land may sue to eject a trespasser where the removal of the trespasser is necessary to give the plaintiff enjoyment of his rights. In the present case, the plaintiffs have definite shares in the grove of which they can be given possession and, in my opinion, they are not entitled to possession of any larger share. The plaintiffs are, as between them entitled to a 17/48ths share in the grove. I modify the decree of the lower Appellate Court by giving the plaintiffs a decree for possession of a 17/48ths share in the grove. The parties will pay and receive proportionate costs throughout.

Section 25 of the Small Cause Courts Act does not give any right of appeal on law or fact and the powers conferred by the section are purely discretionary, not to be exercised unless it appears that some substantial injustice has resulted from the decree of a Court of Small Causes.

An error by a Small Cause Court on a question of limitation does not justify interference by the High Court under the section.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application under section 25 of Act IX of 1887 for revision of a decree of the Subordinate Judge of Fyzabad in a Small Cause Court case. The first point is that the suit is barred by limitation. It has recently been decided in Ram Gopal Jhoonjhoonwala v. Joharmal Khemka (1) that an error by a Small Cause Court on a question of limitation does not justify the interference of the High Court under section 115, Act V of 1908, and there is a decision of the Allahabad High Court in Raghu Nath Sahai v. The Official Liquidator of the Himalaya Bank (2), that an application under section 25, Act IX of 1887, ought not to be entertained except in cases in which a similar application under section 622 of the then Code of Civil Procedure would be allowed. That section corresponds to section 115 of Act V of 1908. This follows a previous ruling of a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court in Muhammad Bakar v. Bahal Singh (3) that section 25 of Act IX of 1887 does not give any right of appeal on law or fact, and that the powers conferred by that section are purely discretionary and not to be exercised unless it appears that some substantial injustice has resulted from the decree of the Court of Small Causes. That Full Bench decision does not appear to be considered invariably by applicants for revision of Small Cause Court decrees in this Court. As, upon the merits of the case, it is apparent that no substantial injustice has resulted from the decree in question, I should, in any circumstance, dismiss this application; but, even upon the grounds raised before me there is no reason to suppose that the learned Subordinate Judge made any error either of law or of fact.

This application is dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.

GRIFFIN, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit to enforce a claim under an indemnity bond, executed in favour of one Abdullah by Kishun Chand and Gokul Chand on the 12th of November 1889. On that date, Kishen Chand and Gokul Chand executed a sale-deed of a village named Lasra in favour of Abdullah. The latter apparently had some doubts as to the validity of his vendors' title, for on the same date he took from his vendors an indemnity bond, the conditions of which have given rise to the present suit. By this indemnity bond the vendors undertook to make good to Abdullah the sale price together with any loss he might sustain on account of any defect of title in the property conveyed by the sale-deed. Apparently, Abdullah entered into possession of the property sold and remained in possession until the 27th of May 1897, when he made a dedication of this village along with others for certain religious purposes. Under the waqfnamah, he appointed himself the first mutwalli and nominated his son, the appellant before us, his successor. In the life-time of Abdullah, Musammat Naraini appeared as a claimant of the ownership of the village Lasra. She was the adoptive mother of one Ramgopal, a nephew of Abdullah's vendors. Her suit was decreed by this Court on the 21st of

NASIR-UD-DIN v. BALLABH DAS.

December 1905 and Musammat Naraini obtained possession of the village Lasra in May 1906. This suit was instituted on the 3rd of August 1910, to recover a sum of Rs. 52,000 on account of the price of the village Lasra and the loss incurred by the plaintiff owing to the village having passed out of his possession. The defendants Nos. 1 to 5 are transferees from the vendors of Abdullah of the village hypothecated under the indemnity bond mentioned above. Musammat Naraini, the sixth defendant, is the person who, under a decree of this Court, obtained possession of the village Lasra. The defendants Nos. 7, 8 and 9 are representatives of the vendors. They have not appeared to defend the suit and no relief was asked as against them. Abdullah died during the pendency of the appeal in this Court in the suit brought by Musammat Naraini and his son who is the appellant here was brought on the record as his representative. The present suit was defended on various grounds and we are concerned here with two only. The lower Court has upheld the contention of the defendants, first, that the waqf is invalid and, therefore, the plaintiff is not entitled to maintain the suit, and secondly, that Abdullah, the vendee, at the time he created the waqf, did not at the same time convey to the mutwalli his rights under the indemnity bond. In appeal it is contended that the Court below was wrong in holding that the waqf was invalid and that the plaintiff has no right to maintain the suit because the waqfnamah contained no mention of a conveyance to the mutwalli of the vendee's rights under the indemnity bond. It is further contended that if the present suit cannot be maintained by reason of any defect in the plaintiff's position as mutwalli, he ought to be allowed to continue the suit as heir of the vendee Abdullah. This Court, in its decision of the 21st December 1905, held that the sale to Sheikh Abdullah was not a valid sale and that Abdullah was not a bona fide purchaser under that sale. The Muhammadan Law on the subject of waqf, which it is necessary to refer to in this case, will be found at page 134 of Ameer Ali's Muhammadan Law Volume I: "The subject-matter of the dedication must be the property of the waqif at the time the waqf is made, that is, he must be in a position to exercise dominion over it. Consequently, if a waqf is made by a person of some property of which he is in unlawful possession, but which he subsequently purchases from the rightful owner, such waqf is invalid. So also, when a man makes a waqf for certain good purposes of land belonging to another, and then becomes the proprietor of it, the waqf is not lawful but it would become validly dedicated if ratified by the proprietor. Accordingly, when a person purports to make a waqf of property which does not belong to him and such waqf is subsequently ratified by the true owner, the dedication is valid." Here it will be seen that Abdullah made a dedication of certain property of which he was not the true owner. There has been no ratification of the waqf by the true owner and I am not satisfied that according, to the Muhammadan Law, as set out above the so-called waqf, so far as the particular village Lasra was concerned, was valid. I agree, therefore, with the lower Court in dismissing the plaintiff's suit on that ground. I do not consider it necessary to go into the second ground as to what was the exact intention of Abdullah in regard to his rights under the indemnity bond at the time he executed the waqfnamah. As to the plea advanced on behalf of the appellant that he should be permitted to continue the suit in his capacity as heir of the deceased Abdullah, I do not think that the request is one which, should be acceded to at this stage of the case. It is not pretended that the plaintiff is the one and only heir of Abdullah and I am not prepared at this stage of the case to allow the plaintiff to continue the suit in an entirely different capacity. In my opinion, the suit was rightly dismissed by the Court below and I dismiss this appeal with costs including fees on the higher scale.

CHAMIER, J.—I agree that the appeal should be dismissed but I should prefer to rest the dismissal of the appeal on the ground that even if the waqf was valid, the plaintiff has no right to sue on the deed of indemnity as mutwalli of the waqf. The right to sue on that deed does not appear to have been transferred to the mutwalli for the time being. Under the waqfnamah, Abdullah abandoned his title to Mouza Lasra, but did not mention, or in any way refer to the deed of indemnity. The right to sue on that deed is not appurtenant to the interest of Abdullah in Mouza Lasra and did not pass to the mutwalli for the time being under section 8 of the Transfer of Property Act or under any other provision of which I am aware. If it was intended that the mutwalli for the time being should have the right to sue on the deed of indemnity, I can only say that, in my opinion, no such intention has been expressed in the waqfnamah. I agree that the plaintiff should not, at this stage, be allowed to convert the suit by him as mutwalli into a suit by him as one of the heirs of Abdullah.

BY THE COURT.—The appeal is dismissed with costs including fees on the higher scale so far as defendants Nos. 1 to 5 are concerned.

Appeal dismissed.

Lunacy Act (XXXV of 1858)—Malabar Law and Usage—Tarwad property, nature of—Karnavan of a Malabar tarwad, declaration of, as lunatic—Appointment of manager in his stead—Powers of karnavan.

The property of a Malabar tarwad is not the individual property of the karnavan and a manager appointed for him obtains no rights over the tarwad property. His powers of management may be modified by a karar entered into by the other members of the family. The members concurring with each other may dispose of the property as they please. The right of disposition is the crucial mark of ownership. If any one of the members does not join, the alienation, unless justified by family necessity, would be invalid because the ownership is as much in any one dissenting member as in all the other members together.

No application can lie for a declaration of lunacy of the karnavan of a Malabar tarwad under Act XXXV of 1858 and for the appointment of a manager in his stead for property other than his separate property. Lunacy of a karnavan is a conclusive ground on which the next Anandravan could claim to have the karnavan removed. Act XXXV of 1858 cannot be applied to a member of a Hindu Mitakshara family who owns no separate property.

Per Sundara Aiyar, J. Quære:—Whether the lunacy of a karnavan would automatically work a forfeiture of his right of management or whether it would be necessary to get him removed by Court?

JUDGMENT.

SUNDARA AIYAR, J.—The application which gave rise to this appeal was one under Act XXXV of 1858 to adjudicate the karnavan of a Malabar tarwad a lunatic and to appoint a manager for his estate. The application was dismissed by the District Judge of South Malabar, he being of opinion that no application would lie under the provisions of Act XXXV of 1858 to adjudicate a member of an undivided Malabar tarwad a lunatic. He did not, on the view he took, consider it necessary to hold an inquiry as to the question whether the karnavan was in fact a lunatic or not.

The question for our decision is, whether that view is right. No decision bearing on the precise question has been brought to our notice. The competence of the Court to adjudicate an undivided member of a Mitakshara family a lunatic has been considered in some cases. In Trimbaklal Govandas v. Hiralal (1), it was not necessary for the Court actually to decide the question, an adjudication having, as a matter of fact, been previously made in that case and a manager having been appointed. The question before the Court was whether the manager so appointed, who was another member of the undivided family, was bound to render accounts in accordance with the provisions of section 17 of the Act. Farran, C. J., and Parsons, J., held that the Court would not make him render an account under the section. At page 666 Farran, C. J., observed: "The Act provides no machinery nor does it confer any power upon the Court to deal with joint family property or interfere in the affairs of a joint family." This observation tends to show that, if the question had actually arisen, the learned Judges would probably have decided that no adjudication could be made with reference to the member of an undivided Mitakshara family. In In the matter of the petition of Bhoopendra Narain Roy (2), Pontifex, J., observed at page 541: "It has been objected before us, and apparently the Judge seems to have been of opinion, that Act XXXV of 1858 cannot and does not apply to members of a Mitakshara family. We are unable, as at present advised, to admit that as a correct proposition. It appears to us that there may be cases where it is essentially necessary that a guardian should be appointed for a member of a Mitakshara family as much as for a member of any other family. It is not necessary, however, for us to decide that question, because we think the application fails on other grounds." It was argued before the learned Judges that the application for adjudication in that case was made with a view to enforce partition of the share belonging to the alleged lunatic. Dealing with that argument, the learned Judge observed: "Now, with respect to the supposition of the Judge that these proceedings were taken with the intention of ultimate proceedings for a partition, without deciding whether or not a partition could be had under such circumstances, if the lunatic were declared a lunatic under the Act, it may be not improper to refer to the policy of the Lunacy Enactments in England. Under these Acts, it has always been the policy of the Legislature not to interfere with the course of inheritance of the lunatic's property, and provisions for that purpose have been inserted into these Acts, so that even where it is necessary for payment of debts or otherwise, that the lunatic's real property should be sold, it is provided that the surplus monies should be considered as in the same condition as if invested in land, leaving them heritable as if they were land, possibly, therefore, even if an application for partition were made, it might be refused in accordance with that policy." If the Court would refuse a partition at the instance of the manager of a lunatic, then it is difficult to see what object would be served by the appointment of a manager for his undivided share in the estate.

The learned Judges do not point out in what circumstances it would be permissible to appoint a manager for a lunatic co-parcener of an undivided family. In several cases, the Indian Courts have held that a guardian cannot be appointed under the Guardians and Wards Act for an undivided member of a Mitakshara family. See Sham Kuar v. Mohanunda Sahoy(3); Virupakshappa v. Nilgangava (4); Bandhu Prasad v. Dhiraji Kuar (5). That question is really concluded by the opinion of the Privy Council in Gharib-ul lah v. Khalak Singh (6). Sir Arther Wilson, delivering the judgment of their Lordships in that case, observed: "It has been well settled by a long series of decisions in India that a guardian of the property of an infant cannot properly be appointed in respect of the infant's interest in the property of an undivided Mitakshara family. And, in their Lordships' opinion, those decisions are clearly right, on the plain ground that the interest of the member of such a family is not individual property at all, and that, therefore, a guardian, if appointed, would have nothing to do with the family property." These observations are, in my opinion, equally applicable to the appointment of a manager for a lunatic co-parcerner in a Mitakshara family. The question then is, can a different view be taken with respect to the karnavan of a Malabar tarwad? Mr. T. R. Ramachandra Iyer, the learned Vakil who appears for the appellants, has strenuously contended that the karnavan should, for all practical purposes, be regarded as the owner of the property and that, although in theory the property of a tarwad may be vested in all its members, the ownership of the others is practically worthless, their substantial rights being confined to the receipt of maintenance and to prevent the karnavan from wasting or misusing the property of the tarwad. Whatever may be the extent of the karnavan's powers of management, I cannot doubt that the tarwad property is not, to use the language of the Privy Council, the individual property of the karnavan, and that a manager appointed for him will obtain no rights over the tarwad property. Observations are, no doubt, to be found in Varnakot Narayanan Namburi v. Vernakot Narayanan Namburi (7), which might encourage the notion that the property of a tarwad is vested in the karnavan. The question in that case was whether a decree obtained against a karnavan in a properly contested suit would be binding on the other members. It was, with reference to that question, that Kernan, J., observed that the tarwad property was vested in the karnavan and that he had large powers of dealing with it. This observation was referred to in Vasudevan v. Sunkaran (8), where also the question was similar to that raised in Vernakot Narayanan Namburi v. Vernakot Narayanan Namburi (7). Subramanya Iyer, J., observed: "The family property is not liable to partition, except with the consent of all, the right of the members other than the karnavan, being practically limited to claim maintenance and to prevent the karnavan from wasting or improperly alienating the family property; and the title to hold possession of the estate and to receive and expend its income is vested in the karnavan, not by the sufferance of the other members, but of right, which is indefeasible so long as he exercises his functions without injury to the family. Therefore, according to the substantive law to which he is subject, a karnavan is necessarily the natural representative of the family in all matters concerning it as between it on the one hand and outsider on the other". These observations, understood with regard to the context, cannot, in my opinion, be taken to lay down that the karnavan has any larger right of ownership than any junior member over the tarwad property. What is vested in him, according to the learned Judge, is the right "to hold possession of the estate and to receive and expend its income" and this right, he observes, is one not derived by appointment or sufferance of the other members, but under the law of the land. The karnavan's power of management, extensive as it may be, is, in my opinion, in no respect different in character from that of the managing member of a Mitakshara family. The only difference between the latter and the karnavan of a Malabar tarwad arises from the fact that partition cannot be enforced except with the consent of all the members. But the substantive right of the karnavan in the tarwad property is of exactly the same character as that of the managing member of a Mitakshara family.

In Narayani v. Gobinda (9), it was pointed out by this Court that the karnavan has no higher rights over the income of the tarwad than any other members. The equal ownership of all the members was also recognised in Moidin Kutti v. Krishnan (10). In Lunhichekkan v. Sydia Arukenden (11), I have referred to other cases in which the same view was adopted. My observations in Kallani Amma v. Govinda Menon (12), do not, I think, throw any doubt on the equal ownership of all the members of a tarwad. The question in that case was whether the karnavan had the right to claim the actual possession and custody of all the property of the tarwad against any other members who might take possession of any part of it, and I expressed the opinion that he had the right. There can be no doubt that, both in a Malabar family and in a Mitakshara family, so long as it remains undivided, the manager is the person entitled to the actual possession of all the property of the family, although in the case of a Mitakshara family, this right is of comparatively small value because a partition could be enforced by any of the co-parceners at his will. case of Kenath Puthen Vittil Tavazi v. Narayanan (13), merely laid down that the karnavan was not bound to account to the other members or to pay them the surplus profits. This really has no bearing on the question of the equal ownership of all the owners. The case cannot be taken to lay down that the karnavan himself has any right to use the surplus profits for his own purposes This he has not, as pointed in Narayani v. Gobinda(9), He has the right to dispose of the income for the benefit of the members of the tarwad, and, as the manager, he has considerable discretion in the actual distribution of the income. The right to distribute, however, can be exercised only in the interests of the tarwad and of its members, and unequal distribution cannot be supported on the larger right of any one member to the income than of any other. Ordinarily, no doubt the right of a junior member would be to receive maintenance and to prevent waste of the tarwad property. But the equal ownership of all is demonstrated by the fact that the members by joining together may divide the property between themselves If a karnavan wastes tarwad property, it has been held that a junior member may recover the property for the use of the tarwad, a position inconsistent with anything but his right of ownership. The karnavan's rights of management may be modified by a karar entered into by all the members of the family. The members concurring with each other may dispose of the property as they please. The right of disposition is the crucial mark of ownership. If any one of the members does not join in the alienation, unless justified by family necessity, it would be invalid because the ownership is as much in any one dissenting member as in all the other members together.

It is imposible for me to come to any other conclusion than that the property of a tarwad is not the individual property of the karnavan and that is the test, according to the view of the Privy Council, which must decide whether a guardian can be appointed under the Guardians and Wards Act, and, as I take it, a manager under Act XXXV of 1858. As observed by their Lordships, a manager appointed would obtain no right of management over the property of the tarwad, but only over the individual property of the lunatic for whom he is appointed. The appointment of a manager, therefore, would be of absolutely no use. If the karnavan becomes a lunatic, then the next senior member of the tarwad has the right to succeed to the management. How then can the Court displace that right by appointing a stranger? If the Court could appoint a manager it may appoint any one to that position. It is unnecessary to consider whether lunacy would automatically work a forfeiture of the karnavan's right of management, or whether it would be necessary to get him removed by Court. It is quite clear that in either case, lunacy would be a conclusive ground on which the next Anandravan could claim to have the karnavan removed. Such a right cannot be prejudiced by any appointment of a manager under Act XXXV of 1858. It would, therefore, be absolutely useless to take any proceedings under that Act. It was pointed out that the karnavan has large powers and that the powers vested in a lunatic may be exercised by his manager. Apart from the answer already given, namely, that the right of junior members could not be affected by any order made under Act XXXV of 1858. I should observe that a power which may be exercised by a lunatic's manager, must be a power attached to his beneficial estate. See Halsbury's Laws of England, Volume 19, page 449. The right of management of a karnavan of a trawad and the powers attaching to that right are not incidental to the karnavan's beneficial right in the tarwad property, but to his being the seniormost member of the tarwad or to his being allowed to be the manager by the tarwad including the senior most member. His beneficial interest, as already pointed out, is no more than that of any other member and does not carry any powers, which the karnavan could exercise in virtue of it.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the order of the lower Court is right and that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

of a guardian for his person. The District Court refused to grant their prayer and hence they have appealed to this Court.

The alleged lunatic has evidently no property except what he was managing as karnavan of the tarwad. This application to the District Court was made, not because the bowels of compassion of the petitioners were moved towards their karnavan by his alleged lunacy or because they wished to protect the karnavan (who has one foot in the grave, being nearly 90 years old). The 4th paragraph of the petition is as follows:—"As the (tarwad) properties are not properly managed owing to the karnavan's lunacy, "the petitioners are put to great hardship and inconvenience as they do not get their maintenance and other expenses. Besides this, it is likely that the properties to which the petitioners are also entitled will be wasted."

The District Judge's reasons for dismissing the petition are as follows:—"A consideration of the Lunacy Act XXXV of 1858 shows that the property of, which the person alleged to be a lunatic is possessed of should belong to the lunatic and that it is not intended that the Court should deal with joint family property nor interfere in the affairs of a joint family. In Trimbak Lal Govindas v. Hiralal (1), it was held that the Act provides no machinery nor does it confer any power upon the Court to deal with joint family property or interfere in the affairs of a joint family. In the analogous case of the appointment of a guardian under the Guardians and Wards Act of 1890, it has been held that a guardian cannot be appointed of the property of a minor who is a member of a joint Hindu family governed by the Mitakshara Law and possessed of no separate property. Sham Kuar v. Mohanunda Sahy(3)." "A fortiori does this reasoning apply in the case of a karnavan of a Malabar tarwad in which partition cannot be demanded." "I do not think that it is desirable that the provisions of the Lunacy Act should be invoked to remove the head of a tarwad from office when the obvious and ordinary remedy of suing for his removal is available to the members of the tarwad. It is not improbable that the petitioners have devised an inexpensive method of attaining their object by means of this petition."

The appellants' learned Vakil attacked the District Judge's above observations at great length but has left me unconvinced that there is any flaw in the reasoning of the learned District Judge, whose language I adopt in toto. Act XXXV of 1858 was enacted "to make better provision for the care of the estates of lunatics" and not to enable junior members of a tarwad to deprive their karnavan of his powers of management by charging him with lunacy. Act XIV and XL of 1858 (which were repealed by the consolidating and amending Act VIII of 1890) were passed in the same year as the Lunacy Act XXXV of 1858 to protect the estates of minors. The analogous provisions in these Acts have been construed as not applying to cases of minors, who are members of a joint Hindu family and whose only property is their undivided share in the joint family property. [See Gourah Koeri v. Gajadhar Prasad (14); Sheo Nundun Singh v. Musammat Ghunsam Kooree (15); Musammat Ajhola Kooeree v. Babu Digambur Singh (16); Sham Kuar v. Mohanunda Sahoy (3) and Gharib-ul-la v. Khalak Singh (6)]. A member of a Malabar tarwad is in a position worse than that of a male member of a joint Hindu family in two respects:—

(a) A tarwad member, even if he was the karnavan, cannot enforce partition by suit and no partition of tarwad property can take place unless by a family arrangement assented to by all the members, whereas a male member of a Hindu co-parcenary can always sue for partition. (The suit can be brought even on behalf of a minor member if the Court could be persuaded that it is for the minor's benefit, viewed in a broad sense, that the suit should be conducted).

(b). A tarwad member cannot alienate for his own private purposes a particular fraction or share of the tarwad property as belonging to him, while a Hindu family co-parcener could do so.

I am, therefore, clear that Act XXXV of 1858 was not intended to authorise Courts to entertain proceedings under it in respect of an alleged lunatic who is a member of a Malabar tarwad, or of a joint Hindu family and owns no separate property. Though the learned Judges, who decided Trimbaklal Govindas v. Hiralal(1), say that they 'express no opinion upon this general question', the inclination of their opinion seems clear. I do not agree with the obiter dicta in In the matter of the petition of Bhoopendra Narain Roy (2) and Soobanse Singh v. Juggeshur Koer (17), that Act XXXV of 1858 may be applied to a member of a Mitakshara family who owns no separate property. I, however, agree entirely with many of the other observations in the first case. One such observation is that sufficient cause must be made out by the petitioners for putting the Lunacy Act into operation against an individual alleged to be a lunatic, such sufficient cause being, not certainly the benefit to the petitioners but, the lunatic's benefit, and "the proper protection and care" of his person and of his properties. In construing the provisions of statutes relating to minors and lunatics, the paramount consideration is the benefit of the disqualified person. I am of opinion that it would be an abuse of the powers granted to the Court by the Lunacy Act to exercise such powers in the interest of persons other than the alleged lunatic. Further, if (as the petitioners alleged) the old karnavan, Chathu Nair, has become a lunatic, he has become civilly incapable of holding the office of karnavan and the next senior Anandravan ipso facto has become the head of the family entitled to possession and management of the tarwad properties. Chathu Nair has ceased to possess even the right of management of the family property and the Lunacy Act, which could only be invoked where the lunatic has got property, becomes wholly incapable of application. It was argued that as a karnavan who becomes blind does not lose his position merely by reason of his blindness, a karnavan who becomes a lunatic does not lose his right to manage as karnavan. There is absolutely no analogy between the two cases. A minor or a lunatic cannot be a karnavan. If a karnavan dies and the next senior male is the minor or a lunatic, he cannot succeed to the office at all, whereas if he is merely blind, there is no legal objection to his succeeding. If his blindness is shown to have led to gross incompetency in management, he might be removed, but a minor or lunatic can never hold the office at all till the minority ceases or the lunacy is cured. Lunacy deprives a man of all legal competence to contract or to manage affairs and the lunacy of even one partner dissolves the partnership [section 254 (1) of the Contract Act]. If the karnavan is the agent or karta of the tarwad, his powers as agent ought to terminate on his becoming of unsound mind (compare the provision in section 201 of the Contract Act, which of course does not directly apply). To hold that a karnavan, who can become such only if he is an adult, of sound mind and who has to represent the tarwad as its managing member, could continue to be karnavan and to possess the powers of representing the tarwad when he has become a lunatic, seems to be a contradiction in terms.

In the result, I agree with my learned brother that the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Hindu Law—Dayabhaga—Gift of immoveable property by father to daughter at her marriage—Stridhan —Yautuka—Death of daughter without male issue—Inheritance—Daughter of daughter—Original owner's sister's son.

A Hindu governed by the Dayabhaga School, executed a deed of gift in respect of certain immoveable property in favour of his daughter on the occasion of her marriage. A clause in the deed ran thus:—"You do remain in possession of the land held by myself down to your sons, son's son and so on in succession. Your sons, son's son, etc, heirs in succession and not your husband or his heirs or any other wife that may be taken by him, shall be competent to own the said property". The daughter died sonless:

and, therefore, was not defeasible upon her death without male issue; that the intention of the grantor was not to exclude female children of his daughter from the line of succession, and that the daughter of the grantee was entitled to take the property by right of inheritance and not the grantor's sister's son.

JUDGMENT.—The subject-matter of the litigation which has given rise to this appeal belonged admittedly at one stage to a person of the name of Kali Prosad Singha Roy. On the 4th December 1864, he executed a deed of gift in respect of this property in favour of his daughter, Dhan Kumari Debi, on the occasion of her marriage. The sole question in controversy in this litigation is, whether the property has passed by inheritance to the defendants, the sons of the sister of the original owner, or to the plaintiff, the daughter of the donee. The Courts below have concurrently held in favour of the plaintiff.

In the present appeal, it has been argued by the defendants that the gift in favour of the daughter was limited for her life, and that, in any event, if there was an absolute gift in her favour, it was defeasible upon her death without male issue.

In support of the first contention, reliance has been placed upon two circumstances, namely, first, that the grant was for maintenance; and secondly, that the gift was by a Hindu to his daughter. In support of the second contention, reliance has been placed upon a clause in the deed of gift which has been rendered as follows:—"You are vested with the right and possession from this day, and you do remain in possession of the land held by myself down to your sons, son's son and so on in succession on payment of the rent thereof. You shall not give up any land comprised within the boundaries in favour of any body. Your sons, son's sons, etc, heirs in succession and not your husband or his heirs or any member of a different family shall be competent to own and hold the said property." In our opinion, there is no substance in either of these contentions.

In so far as the first contention is concerned, we observe that the clause in the deed of gift upon the construction whereof the decision of this appeal really depends, stands in the vernacular as follows:—Tomakay dan karilam. Adyakar tarikh haitay tumi svatvadhikari hailay. Uhar rajasva malguzari sarbaraha kariya putra pautradi kramay amar dakhali jamitay svatvaban o dakhalikar thakibay. Chowhaddir madhye jote kahakayo chharia dibayna. Ar ai bastutay tomar putra pautradi waris bhinna tomar svasmir kingba tihar waris othaba anya paribar svatvadhikari haibay na. Now, it may be conceded, that a grant for maintenance is presumably intended to continue for the life of the grantee. This is indicated by the decisions in the cases of Ram Chandra v. Jogendra Nath Banerji (1); Rameshar v. Gobardhan Lal (2); Bhujanga Rau v. Ramayamma (3); Rameshar Bakhsh Singh v. Arjun Singh (4) and Rama Chandra Naiker v. Vijayaragavulu Naidu (5). The rule, however, is not inflexible; and, if there is any indication to the contrary, for instance, if by express terms a right of alienation has been vested in the maintenance-holder, as in the cases of Jogeswar Narain Deo v. Ram Chandar Dutt (6) and Saroda Sundari v. Kristo Jiban Pal (7), or if the maintenance holder has been expressly constituted a full owner as in the case of Moti Lal Mithalal v. Advocate-General (8), the grant must be deemed permanent, although it may be for the purpose of maintenance.

It need not also be disputed, as pointed out by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the cases of Moulvi Mahomed Shamsool Hooda v. Shewak Ram (9) and Radha Prasad Mallik v. Ramimoni Dassi (10), that when a deed of gift by a Hindu in favour of his daughter or any other female relations has to be construed, it must be borne in mind that a Hindu is ordinarily aware that a woman takes only a limited interest under the Hindu Law and that his desire presumably is that his estate should not pass out of his family and be vested in a different family. This rule again is not inflexible and it cannot be disputed that if there are appropriate words in the deed of gift, although it may be in favour of the daughter or of the wife, it may have to be treated as a gift in perpetuity. [Suraj Mani v. Rabinath Ojha (11); Thakur Parshad v. Jamni Kunwar (12)]. Now, in the case before us, the gift is made in favour of the daughter, and, at the same time, it is expressly stated that it is to be held by her down to her sons, son's sons etc., and so on in succession. These words create a permanent estate, as is clear from the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the cases of Ramlal Mukerjee v. Secretary of State for India in Council (13) and Lalit Mohun Singh Roy v. Chukkun Lal Roy (14). The first contention of the appellant, therefore, that this was intended to be a grant of a life-interest in favour of the daughter cannot possibly be supported.

In so far as the second contention is concerned, it has been argued that the intention of the grantor was that the daughter should take an estate defeasible upon her death without male issue. In support of this contention, reliance has been placed upon the decision of the Judicial Committee in the case of Bhoobun Mohini Debia v. Hurrish Chunder Chowdhry (15) and reference has been made to the clause in the deed of gift already quoted. It has also been argued that even though the grantor expressly stated that, the property was not to descend in a particular line, effect cannot be given to such an intention unless there has been a valid prior disposition. This last contention is, undoubtedly, sound, as is clear from the observations of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Jatindra Mohan Tagore v. Gonendra Mohan Tagore (16). But, in the case before us, it is impossible to construe the deed of gift in the way suggested by the appellant. It will be observed that the vernacular words "Tomar swamir kimbi tahar waris athaba anya paribar swatwadhikari haibeni" have been translated as "Your husband or his heirs or any member of a different family shall not be competent to own and hold the said property." The learned Judges in the Courts below have expressed the opinion that this interpretation is not quite intelligible and that it is rather difficult to say what is meant by paribar. In our opinion, it is fairly clear that "anya paribar" means "another wife" of the husband of the donee. What the grantor evidently intended was that the daughter should take an absolute estate descendible to her children; but that, in the event of her death without children, the property should not; in any event; pass to her husband or to any other wife of her husband, or to the members of her husband's family. But even if we do not interpret the word paribar as meaning another wife of the husband of the grantee, it is quite clear that the object of the donor was that the property should not, upon the death of the donee, pass to her husband or his representatives. The object of the grantor is obvious; and that this was the true object, becomes fairly clear when we remember the law of succession in relation to stridhan property. Under the Bengal School of Hindu law, in respect of the yautuka property of a woman, who dies without children, the very first heir is the husband. The grantor, therefore, laid down that if his daughter should die without any children, the property should not be taken by her husband or his heirs and certainly not by any second wife that might be taken by him. Under these circumstances, we are of opinion that the intention of the grantor was not to exclude female children of his daughter from the line of succession, as has been contended by the appellant. Whether having made an absolute gift in favour of his daughter, he could validly impose such a restriction is a matter which need not be considered on the present occasion. It is clear that the plaintiff, as the daughter of the grantee, is entitled to take the property by right of inheritance. The second ground, therefore, fails.

The result is that the decree of the District Judge is affirmed and this appeal dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Service inams, grant of—Construction of grant— 'Sudda Inam', meaning of—Grant of melvaram right —Enfranchisement of service inams, effect of—Abandonment by Government of right of resumption—Madras Act (II of 1894).

The expression 'Sudda inam,' appearing in a deed of grant of a service inam, does not show that the inam consisted of the land itself and not merely of the melvaram. The meaning of the expression is merely that there is nothing payable to Government in consideration of the inamdar's possession of the land.

The effect of the enfranchisement of a service inam under Madras Act II of 1894, where the Government merely gives up the right of resumption possessed by it and does not resume the inam, is that the title rests where it was before.

Second appeals against the decrees of the District Court of Madura, in A. S. Nos. 148, 154 and 155 of 1910, presented against those of the Additional District Munsif of Madura, in O. S. Nos. 17 and 16 of 1909, respectively.

FACTS.—Plaintiffs sued to recover possession of the suit land free from interference and obstruction by the defendants and with damages Rs. 160 for Faslis 1316 and 1317, or, in the alternative, for a declaration that, in case it be found that one-half of the melvaram produce alone of the suit land appertained to the 1st plaintiff's karnam miras, the plaintiffs were entitled to receive the melvaram produce accordingly and for a direction to the defendants to pay to plaintiffs Rs. 160 for the damages of Faslis 1316 and 1317 with costs of suit.

2. It was set forth in the plaint that the suit land and some other lands were given away by Karnatic Kings as emoluments of the karnam miras of Sathamangalam, a Jari village in the Madura Taluk, and enjoyed by plaintiffs' forefathers and then by the 1st plaintiff's father and after him on hereditary right by 1st plaintiff, that the suit land was leased out to defendants Nos. 1 and 2 on condition of paying to plaintiffs one half of the produce of the land remaining, after deducting the cultivation expenses and the varam due to defendants, that accordingly these defendants had been giving the varam annually to plaintiffs from 1902 when 1st plaintiff took charge of the karnam work after the demise of his father, up to February 1906, that when the Inam Deputy Collector came to the village for enfranchisement, these defendants made an untrue statement to the effect that these plaintiffs are entitled to the melvaram of the suit land (i.e., one half of the produce) and that the then Deputy Collector ordered the issue of a joint title-deed in the names of these defendants, who were only cultivating for varam under the plaintiffs and that upon the plaintiffs appealing to the Inam Commissioner, the Commmissioner passed an adverse order on 6th November 1907. It further set forth that the above order was not valid as against the exclusive right of the plaintiffs to the suit land, that the defendants were bound at least to deliver to plaintiffs the melvaram, i.e., a moiety of the produce at least, if it be held that the plaintiffs are entitled to such shares, that the defendants have not paid the varam due to plaintiffs under the lease since Fasli 1316 (February 1907) probably with the idea that they have obtained a new title to the land under the title-deed issued by the Deputy Collector and have not agreed to surrender the land to plaintiffs for cultivation.

The 3rd defendant was impleaded, as the 2nd defendant, subsequent to the said title-deed, conveyed benami to the 3rd defendant, one half of the western portion of the suit land, fully conscious of his defective title newly created. Cause of action arose on 6th

SESHAGIRI AIYAR v. TIRUMALAI AMBALAM.

November 1907, when the plaintiffs became aware of the Inam Deputy Collector's order.

3. The 2nd defendant allowed the suit to proceed ex parte.

4. Defendants Nos. 1 and 3 by Pleader ignored the plaintiffs' exclusive right to the land at any time and the lease set up by the latter in favour of the former. They also took objection to the so-called benami sale to the 3rd defendant, as set forth in paragraphs 9 and 10 of the plaint, and stated that the suit was bad for misjoinder of parties and causes of action, that the melvaram alone appertained to the karnam miras, that in kudivaram $\frac{1}{4}$ kanwnies of the eastern portion of the suit land were purchased on 22nd January 1900 from the owner of the kudivaram right with a bona fide intention and for valuable consideration and with 1st plaintiff's father's attestation to the document, that they have been in the enjoyment of this land ever since the purchase, that the remaining portion in the kudivaram belonged to the 2nd defendant by ancestral right, and that after the melvaram was enfranchised, he (2nd defendant) had the exclusive right to both the kudivaram and melvarams, which were subsequently sold to 3rd defendant for proper consideration and with a bona fide intention, that if it be held that both varams were inams of the karnam mirasi, the plaintiffs were estopped from filing this suit in a Civil Court under section 21 of the Madras Act III of 1895, that if it be held that the plaintiffs are entitled to the melvaram, their right was not sustainable under section 30 of the Madras Act II of 1894, as they claimed melvaram subsequent to the Inam fysal which was, in no way, irregular and fraudulent, that the suit was barred as it was brought one year after the title-deed, dated January 1906, that it was bad for misjoinder of the Inam Commissioner as a party to the suit, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to damages and that the damages claimed were excessive.

5. The following issues were recorded:

(i) Whether defendants are in possession under separate rights and whether the suit is bad for misjoinder of parties and of causes of action?

(ii) Whether the plaintiffs are entitled to the kudivaram as alleged in the plaint?

(iii) Whether the plaintiffs have been in possession of the kudivaram right at any time within the statutory period?

(iv) Whether the suit in this Court is barred under Madras Act III of 1895?

(v) Whether the plaintiffs' claim to the melvaram after the enfranchisement is barred by section 30 of Madras Act II of 1894?

(vi) Whether the suit is unsustainable so long as the Inam Commissioner's order is not cancelled?

(vii) Whether the suit is time-barred as not having been brought within a year from the date of the said order?

(viii) Whether the suit is bad for non-joinder of the Inam Commissioner?

(x) Whether the plaintiffs are estopped from bringing the suit as pleaded in paragraph 10 of the written statement?

The District Munsif found that plaintiffs were entitled to both the kudivaram and melvaram and decreed possession of the land to plaintiff.

On appeal, the District Judge reversed the Munsif's finding and held that the plaintiffs were entitled only to the melvaram in the following

JUDGMENT.—Appeal Suit No. 148 of 1910 is an appeal by the defendants Nos. 1 and 3 from the decree in Original Suit No. 17 of 1909 on the file of the lower Court, and the plaintiffs have filed an objection memo. Appeals Suits Nos. 154 and 155 are cross-appeals by the plaintiffs and defendants Nos. 1 and 2, respectively, in Original Suit No. 16 of 1909 on the file of the lower Court. These suits are closely connected with each other and refer to certain items of land, which were originally classed as "karnam manibham" or karnam service inam in the village of Sathamangalam, and have been recently enfranchised by the Revenue Authorities in the names of defendants in Original Suits Nos. 16 and 17 of 1909. The plaintiffs in both the suits are the present karnam of the village and his minor son. They sue both for the kudivaram and melvaram rights in the items and contend that they should not have been enfranchised in the names of any of the defendants in the two suits.

2. The District Munsif has clearly made certain mistakes of law in his judgment. In paragraph 19 in his judgment in Original Suit No. 16 of 1909, he applies the ruling in Venkatanarasimha Naidu v. Damdamudikatyya (1) to the suit land, whereas that ruling has only application to lands in zemindaris and not to lands like the suit lands which are service inams. The ruling in Marapu Tharulu v. Telukula Neelakanta Behara (2) applies to an inam of this kind.

3. Another mistake which the District Munsif has made is that he seems to think that the possession of a tenant or his alienee becomes adverse to that of the landlord as soon as the tenant executes a document, which shows that he claims an adverse title. This is the principle on which the District Munsif has held in Original Suit No. 16 of 1909 that the plaintiffs have lost the kudi right in the items covered by that suit and have not lost it in the items covered by Original Suit No. 17 of 1909. In coming to these conclusions, the District Munsif has clearly overlooked the ruling in Srinivasa Ayyar v. Muthusami Pillai (3), where it is clearly laid down that "a tenant repudiating the title under which he entered becomes liable to immediate eviction at the opinion of the landlord, but that until the landlord indicates that he intends to exercise his option, the tenancy subsists."

4. The District Munsif, in my opinion, is further mistaken in his finding of fact on issue No. 2, which raises the question whether the original grant of the service inam consisted of the rent of the land only or of the land itself free of assessment. According to the plaintiffs' case, the inam was granted by the Carnatic Kings. There is no document to evidence the original grant. The earliest documents, which have been properly proved and which have any reference to these lands, are Exhibits B and B-1, Jamabandi Chittas for Faslis 1211, 1212. These were prepared long after the original grant. In these documents, the suit lands are described as Kanakku Subbier's rent-free inam. Exhibit B-2 is an extract from the Olugu account for Fasli 1215, which merely shows the areas of the plots and the measurements. Exhibit B-3 is the inam statement put in by Subbier for Fasli 1217 and shows the total extent of the lands in cawnies together with assessment. Then later on, we get Exhibits M and C which are respectively extracts of the inam statement and the Inam Register of the village which were prepared in 1863. These documents give the same extent and assessment of the lands. In column 6 of Exhibit C, reference is made to the Chittas of Faslis 1212 and 1217, and it is said that the grant is tax-free.

5 The District Munsif has assumed that the land itself must have formed the subject of the grant, because these documents describe the suit land as an inam and contain no mention of the fact that only the assessment of the land constituted the inam. The District Munsif in coming to this conclusion has overlooked the rulings which he himself quotes in paragraph 19 of his judgment from which it is clear that prima facie such inams should be taken to be assignments of the State share in the lands, i.e. of the assessment only. He has also overlooked the caution contained in the preamble to the Madras Inams Act VIII of 1869, in which it is remarked that "the terms of title-deeds granted by the Inam Commissioner in many cases appear to convey more extensive rights than could be legally given." The Act, therefore, provides that anything contained in any title-deed shall not be deemed to define, limit, infringe or destroy the rights of any description of holders or occupiers of the land or to affect the interests of any person other than the inam holder under the title-deed.

6. It was contended for the plaintiffs that because Exhibit B-3 and the subsequent documents, Exhibits M and C, show the assessment on the land was fixed, the assessment alone could not have constituted the inam; because if that were so, the inamdars would have been entitled to collect that assessment only and nothing more from the occupiers, whereas the defendants admit that they have been paying half the produce as melvaram to the inamdars, i. e., plaintiffs. This contention, however, entirely overlooks the fact that there is nothing to show that any assessment was fixed on the lands at the time of the original grant. It is true that even the earliest documents, B and B-1, refer to "panams" which seem to be the assessment on the land, but these documents are as recent as 1802 and the grant was made long before that time. It is a matter of common knowledge that money assessments were not in existence in early times in this district. It is probable that, in the time of the Carnatic Rulers, the State took as its share a portion of the produce, and that the grantees of the inam continued to take that share, although money assessments were fixed for lands in the village subsequently and the assessment which inam lands would be liable to, if not rent-free, was at that time entered in the registers. The argument of the plaintiffs' Pleader, that because a money assessment is mentioned in the accounts and because the plaintiffs have admittedly not been receiving that assessment but melvaram from the occupiers, the land must, therefore, have been granted as service inam, entirely falls to the ground. When the State share in land was granted as inam, the State had no longer any concern with the occupiers or kudivaramdars of the lands, and there was, therefore, no necessity to refer to them in the old accounts. The area and description of the land was entered in the accounts; the assessment it would bear if the assessment had not been granted as inam was also entered and the name of the inamdar was then entered. No other entry was necessary. No presumption arises from such entries that there were no kudivaramdars on the land having occupancy-rights. The State had nothing to do with these men after granting its share in the land to the inamdar, who had to make his own arrangements to get his share from the occupiers. There was no necessity, therefore, for the State account to refer to these occupiers at all.

7. Plaintiffs also rely on two old documents, Exhibits P and P-1, to show that the ancestor of Subbier was a cultivating tenant of the suit land at one time. I hold that these documents have not been proved to be public documents or to have come from proper custody and I reject them. The District Munsif himself has not based his judgment upon them. The burden of proving that the land itself constitutes the inam lies heavily on the plaintiffs, and not only do the admissible documents, [which] they rely on, not establish this fact, but it is clear from the 1st plaintiff's admission in Exhibit VII that he had no idea of putting forward such a case when he made the statement, Exhibit VII, on the 8th August 1905. It was only subsequently, when he learnt that the Revenue Authorities were going to enfranchise the inams in favour of the kudivaramdars, that he changed his attitude and contended that he was the owner of the kudivaram and not merely a melvaramdar as he admitted in Exhibit VII.

8. Further in his evidence, the 1st plaintiff admits, as pointed out in paragraph 29 of the District Munsif's judgment in Original Suit No. 16 of 1909, that he does not know how the defendants or their ancestors got into possession of any of the suit lands. The defendants in Original Suit No. 16 have been dealing with the kudi right as their own under Exhibits VI series so long ago as 1872. The mere fact that they refer to their right in the land as "Olavadai right" in Exhibit VI-b cannot be taken as an admission that they had no occupancy-right and were tenants-at-will, for, there is evidence to show that there is some doubt as to what the ryots mean by the expression "Olavadai right."

9. I should also observe that Exhibits O series, on which the District Munsif relies to prove the plaintiffs' right to the kudivaram right throw, no light on the subject. P. W. No. 1, the hakdar of the village, admits in his evidence that land-cess pattas like Exhibit O series, are always issued to the melvaramdar whether he has a kudi right or not.

10. In both the suits, I hold that the plaintiffs have not proved their title to the kudivaram right and are not entitled to oust the defendants from possession.

11. It was contended by the defendants' Vakil that as the inams are enfranchised and as a separate salary has been fixed for the karnam, the plaintiffs are entitled to nothing and that the inam title-deeds have been rightly issued to the defendants. This contention is, however, clearly untenable and there is nothing in the Land Estates Act to support it. The effect of the enfranchisement of a service inam is clearly laid down in Gunnaiyan v. Kamatchi Ayyar (4). When it is enfranchised by the imposition of a quit-rent, the resumption by Government simply consists of so much of the assessment as is equal to the quit-rent, neither the land nor the assessment in excess of the suit rent being resumed. The enfranchisement only converts the inam into ordinary property. The inam title-deeds should clearly have been granted in this case to plaintiffs' family, who were the grantees of the inam and not to the occupying tenants. I agree with the District Munsif that it was not necessary for the plaintiffs to join the Inam Commissioner as a party to the suit or to pray in this suit for the cancelment of the Inam Commissioner's order. All that need be determined in these suits is the relative rights of the plaintiffs and the defendants in the suit lands. The plaintiffs are at liberty to obtain from the Revenue Authorities the grant of the necessary title-deed enfranchising the inam in their names.

12. In the result, I hold that in both the suits, the plaintiffs are entitled to the melvaram right and to collect melvaram from the defendants at the same rate as they have been hitherto collecting it subject to the payment to Government of the quit-rent fixed when the inam was enfranchised.

13. The District Munsif has disallowed the plaintiffs' costs on the ground that it was the misleading statement of the 1st plaintiff in Exhibit VII which led to the mistake committed by the Inam Commissioner and to the necessity for these suits. I am unable, however, to take this view. I think the plaintiff's original statement, Exhibit VII, represents what is really the fact, viz., that he and his son are only melvaramdars of the suit land. The mistake in the issue of the inam title-deeds has been made by the Officers of the Inam Department. Although the plaintiffs have claimed too much in these suits by setting up a title to the land itself as well as to the melvaram, the defendants have also unreasonably opposed the plaintiffs' claim by contending that they had a right to nothing. I think the fairest way, therefore, would be to allow the plaintiffs proportionate costs throughout and direct the defendants to bear their own costs throughout.

14. In the result, the decrees of the lower Court will be modified in accordance with the above findings and in other respects they are confirmed and the appeals and the memorandum of objections dismissed.

JUDGMENT.

(IN SECOND APPEALS Nos. 325 AND 326 OF 1911).

So far as the principal question in Second Appeals Nos. 325 and 326 of 1911 is concerned, we see no reason to differ from the finding arrived at by the lower Appellate Court; the expression 'Sudda inam' occurring in the documents referred to by the Appellate Court does not show that the inam consisted of the land itself and not merely of the melvaram. The meaning of the expression is merely that there was nothing payable to the Government in consideration of the inamdar's possession of the land. It is argued that the finding with regard to plaintiff's share of the profits cannot be sustained in law. The Appellate Court did not deal with the question in its judgment, but merely said that the memorandum of objections was dismissed. The District Munsif evidently intended to award the amount spoken to by Chokkalingam Pillay, the 2nd witness for the defendant. That witness stated that both kudivaram and melvaram together amounted to 10 kalams per acre. The District Munsif evidently made a mistake in making the calculation and thought that 10 kalams was the yield per cownie (which is about $1\frac{1}{3}$ acres). The decree, therefore, with respect to the melvaram due to the plaintiff must be corrected by awarding $15\frac{1}{2}$ kalams a year in Original Suit No. 16 of 1909 and $18\frac{1}{2}$ kalams in (4) 26 M. 339 at p. 340.

ALLAHDAD KHAN v. SANT RAM.

Original Suit No. 17 of 1909. The price of a kalam was taken to be Rs. 5. The amount due to the plaintiff will be calculated at that rate.

The plaintiff will also be entitled to a decree for the melvaram from the date of the suit until the end of Fasli 1321. The lower Appellate Court will make an inquiry as to the amount due to the plaintiff for the period subsequent to the date of the plaint and pass a final decree for the amount found due. With this modification, these second appeals are dismissed with costs.

(IN SECOND APPEALS NOS. 311 AND 399 OF 1911).

Mr. Ananthakrishna Aiyar for the appellants in these cases argues that the plaintiffs are not entitled to any decree at all. His contention is that, when the Government enfranchised the lands, the plaintiff's interest in them ceased. In substance, his argument amounts to this: that the Government resumed the inam and made a fresh grant of the inam to the defendants at the same time enfranchising the inam. This is absolutely unsupported by the evidence on record. Exhibit III shows that the Government merely gave up the right of resumption that it possessed and did not resume the inam. The result of the enfranchisement, therefore, was that the title rested where it was before. Prior to the enfranchisement, there can be no doubt that the 1st plaintiff as karnam was entitled to the melvaram in the lands. That title was not in any way disturbed by the enfranchisement. These second appeals are also dismissed with costs.

Appeals dismissed.

Succession Certificate Act (VII of 1889), ss. 4, 16—Assignee of holder of certificate, whether can maintain suit.

The assignee of a person, to whom a Succession Certificate has been granted, cannot sue for the recovery of the debt assigned to him.

First appeal from the decision of the Second Additional Judge of Moradabad, dated the 18th of March 1911.

The Hon'ble Nawab Abdul Majid, for the Appellants.

Mr. Muhammad Ishaq, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This was a suit upon a mortgage made in favour of one Bahadur Khan by two persons who are now represented by the appellants and others. Bahadur Khan died leaving a son Farzand Ali and other heirs. Farzand Ali applied for a succession certificate in respect of several debts due to his father. Some of the other heirs stated that they had relinquished their rights in his favour and a certificate was issued to Farzand Ali who, some years later, assigned the mortgage-debt, together with his right to sue for the same, to the respondent Sant Ram. It is on the strength of that assignment that the present suit was brought. The claim was resisted upon several grounds, one of which was that Farzand Ali was not competent to transfer to another the right conferred upon him by the Succession Certificate to sue for the recovery of the debt. The Court below decided this and other questions against the appellants. Hence this appeal.

Apart from the provisions of the Succession Certificate Act, Farzand Ali, as one of the heirs of Bahadur Khan, could have sued upon the mortgage making as defendants the heirs of Bahadur Khan who declined to join as plaintiffs. He could also have assigned his interest in the mortgage to the respondent Sant Ram. Indeed the assignment in favour of Sant Ram may be regarded as having transferred to Sant Ram all Farzand Ali's rights under the mortgage although the assignment purports to have been made by Farzand Ali as holder of the succession certificate. But section 4 of the Succession Certificate Act provides that no Court shall pass a decree against a debtor of a deceased person for payment of his debt to a person claiming to be entitled to the effects of a deceased person or to any part thereof except upon the production by the person so claiming of a certificate granted under that Act or of one or other of certain other documents which admittedly have not been produced in this case. It has been held by this Court in many cases, which we are bound to follow, that a debt secured by a simple mortgage is a debt within the meaning of the provision just quoted. A certificate under the Succession Certificate Act has been produced but it is in favour of Farzand Ali. The question is whether such a certificate is sufficient. The Act does not, in so many words, say that the certificate must be one in favour of the plaintiff but we think that that is the meaning of the provision. The declared object of the Act is to facilitate the collection of debts on successions and to afford protection to parties paying debts to the representatives of deceased persons. Section 16 of the Act protects a debtor of a deceased person, who pays the debt in good faith to the person to whom the certificate was granted. An assignee of the person to whom the certificate was granted does not appear to come within the section. From this, it would appear that the person to sue for the debt is the person to whom the certificate was granted. Notwithstanding the preamble to the Act, one of the objects of the Act seems to have been to prevent people from evading payment of the duty payable on certificates issued under Act XXVII of 1860. If that had been the sole object of the Legislature, there would have been much to say for the view taken by the Court below. But the main object must be taken to be that stated in the preamble. The Act is designed to enable debtors to know with certainty the person to whom they can safely pay a debt due to a deceased person. If we were to hold that any person may sue for the recovery of a debt due to a deceased person, provided that he produces a certificate having the debt specified in it, the debtor would have to trace the title of the plaintiff and we should re-introduce the confusion which the Act was designed to remove. If the plaintiff relies upon a grant of Probate or Letters of Administration, he must show that the grant was made to him and we see no reason why it should be otherwise in the case of a succession certificate. The result is that the plaintiff, in our opinion, was not entitled to maintain this suit.

It was suggested that we might adjourn the case in order that the plaintiff might apply for a certificate. We cannot allow this as the plaintiff cannot be permitted to convert a suit by him as assignee of Farzand Ali into suit by him as holder of a certificate authorising him to collect debts due to Bahadur Khan. The appeal is allowed and the suit is dismissed with costs including fees on the higher scale.

Appeal allowed.

Hindu Law—Alienation by widow of whole property to next reversioner—Agreement by reversioner to re-convey portion of property—Consideration.

An alienation by a Hindu widow of the whole of her estate to the next reversioner on the latter's undertaking to re-convey a portion thereof to the widow or her nominee is valid, irrespective of whether any consideration actually passed or not.

Challa Subbiah Sastri v. Palury Pattabiramayya, 31 M. 446, applied.

Appeal against the decree of the Temporary Subordinate Judge of Guntur, in O. S. No. 31 of 1909.

Mr. P. Nagabhushanam, for the Appellant.

Mr. V. Ramesam, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

MILLER, J.—In this case, the widow conveyed the whole of her estate to the next reversioner who, on the same day, re-conveyed a portion of it to the widow's brother. The question is, whether the conveyance by the widow is valid. It has been suggested in the argument before us that the conveyance to the widow's brother was benami for the widow herself and that, therefore, as to half or whatever was the proportion of the property so conveyed, there was no real conveyance by the widow; consequently, the conveyance to the next reversioner was in reality only a partial conveyance to the next reversioner and is, on that ground, invalid. That particular case, I think, was not made in the Court below; but however that be, the evidence which has been read to us does not prove to my mind that the conveyance was not really to the brother. It may be that it was expected that the widow would share the benefit of it; but the conveyance is suggested even by some of the witnesses on the appellant's side to have been for the benefit of the brother and not of the widow herself. Taking that view, I take it to be established that what was transferred to Kamanna was the whole estate of the widow in consideration of his re-transferring part of it to her brother, and possibly in consideration also of a payment of Rs. 400, although the Subordinate Judge believes that Rs. 400 were not paid. Taking that to be so, it is then contended that the alienation is invalid by the reason that the conveyance to the reversioner was a conveyance for consideration. It seems to me that that contention is disposed of by the case of Challa Subbiah Sastri v. Palury Partabiramayya (1), where, in consideration of an undertaking by the next reversioner to re-convey a portion of the property, the widow conveyed the whole estate to that reversioner. In that case, the surrender or the alienation, if it can be so called, was held to be valid To my mind, there is no reason why that case should not be applied to this case. No doubt, there was no actual money passed in that case, while, here, it is open to us to find, although the Subordinate Judge has not so found, that money did actually pass. That, I think, makes no difference. What we have to see is whether the whole estate was transferred to the reversioner as was done in Challa Subbiah Sastri v. Palury Pattabiramayya (1). That being so, it seems to me that we must hold the transfer valid and dismiss the appeal with costs.

ABDUR RAHIM, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge of Farrukhabad, dated the 22nd of December 1911.

Mr. Brij Nath Vyas, for the Appellants.

Dr. Satish Chandra Banerji, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—Nand Kumar and Kumar Bahadur owned the village of Ismailpur in equal shares. The shares of the two were known as ten biswas each. On January 3rd, 1905, Nand Kumar and Kumar Bahadur executed a lease of the village in favour of Lalta Pershad reserving an annual rent of Rs. 195. On July 5th, 1907, Nand Kumar executed a deed of gift in favour of his three minor sons, the plaintiffs-appellants, in respect of 9 biswas and 15 biswansis share out of his 10 biswas share in Ismailpur. On October 8th, 1910, the plaintiffs appellants instituted a suit in the Court of the Assistant Collector of Farrukhabad to recover their share of rent for 1315 to 1317 Faslis. It was alleged in the plaint that they had sued for their share only as the other co-sharers, viz., Nand Kumar and Kumar Bahadur, had declined to join them in the suit for which reason the latter had been made co-defendants with Lalta Pershad. Lalta Pershad alone resisted the suit. He stated in defence that the rent for the years in suit had been paid to Nand Kumar and that the rate of rent given in the plaint was incorrect. During the pendency of the case, Lalta Pershad raised a further plea to the effect that the paintiffs-appellants, as members of a joint undivided Hindu family, could not sue alone. The Assistant Collector passed a decree in favour of the plaintiffs-appellants ignoring the plea of Lalta Pershad of non-maintainability of the suit, which was raised by him at a late stage in the case. The latter preferred an appeal to the District Judge who framed three additional issues and remanded the case. One of the issues remanded for trial was whether the plaintiffs-appellants could sue alone. The Assistant Collector held that they could sue alone. Lalta Pershad filed objections to the finding of the Assistant Collector. The learned District Judge disposed of the appeal on one point only, viz., whether the suit was maintainable by the plaintiffs-appellants alone. He found that issue against the plaintiffs-appellants on the authority of the case of Manohar Das v. Munzur Ali (1). In second appeal, it is contended that the ruling, relied on by the learned District Judge, is no more applicable, as under the new Agra Tenancy Act, one out of several joint co-sharers can bring a suit for the recovery of rent to the extent of his share on the refusal by the other co-sharers to join him as co-plaintiffs. In the present case, the plaintiffs-appellants sued in respect of their share, stating in paragraph 5 of the plaint, that both Nand Kumar and Kumar Bahadur had declined to join as co-plaintiffs in the suit. The allegations made in paragraph 5 of the plaint were never challenged by Lalta Pershad, or Kumar Bahadur and Nand Kumar. Clause 3 of section 194 of Act II of 1901 distinctly supports the contention of the appellants. I, therefore, hold that the suit of the plaintiffs-appellants is maintainable. I set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court and remand the case under Order XLI, rule 23, to the lower Appellate Court for disposal according to law. Costs of this appeal will be paid to the appellants. The Court-fee will be refunded.

Appeal allowed.

Estoppel—Grant by Government—Suit for possession by grantee—Expression of intention not to claim land prior to grant—Whether amounts to estoppel—Fraud.

A mere disclaimer by a person of his preferential right to acquire land, made to a rival applicant, will not estop him from suing to recover possession after it was actually granted to him by Government, in the absence of a deliberate fraud practised by him on Government or on the rival claimant.

Secretary of State for India in Council v. Bandeppa of Konikondla, 32 M. 399, 5 M. L. T. 31; 19 M. L. J. 203; 1 Ind. Cas. 76, explained.

A person, who, as adjoining owner, had a preferential right to the grant of a certain land by Government, expressed his intention not to claim that the land should be allotted to him:

Held, that such disclaimer at a time when he had no right to the land would not work as an estoppel unless he was guilty of the exercise of deliberate fraud on his rival or the Government.

Second appeal against the decree of the District Court of Salem, in A. S. No. 123 of 1910, preferred against that of the Additional District Munsif of Salem, in O. S. No. 863 of 1909.

Messrs. T. Subramania Aiyar, T. Rangachariar and T. M. Krishnaswami Aiyar, for the Appellant.

Mr. T. R. Venkatarama Sastri, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The defendant in the suit applied, for the grant of certain land, to the Revenue Officers of Government in 1903. The plaintiff, who was an adjoining owner and who, according to darkhast rules, had a preferential claim to have the land allotted to him, then stated that he did not want it. The Revenue Inspector required the defendant to clear the land of prickly pear. While inquiries for allotting the land were in progress, the defendant spent a considerable amount of money on the land. Subsequently, when the darkhast inquiry was resumed, the plaintiff broke faith with the defendant and made an application for the land. Unfortunately, the Revenue Authorities granted it to him and ignored the claims of the defendant. The plaintiff, having got a patta from Government, instituted, this suit for recovery of possession from the defendant.

Both the lower Courts disallowed his claim on the ground that plaintiff was estopped by his previous disclaimer from setting up a claim to recover the land. We are unable to uphold this view. The plaintiff, at the time that he expressed his intention not to claim that the land should be allotted to him, had no right to it. His suit is based on title subsequently acquired by him by grant from Government. Government has not repudiated the grant made to the plaintiff. There is, therefore, in our opinion, no legal answer to the plaintiff's claim for recovery of the land. An observation contained in The Secretary of State for India in Council v. Bundeppa of Konakondia (1) has been read to us on behalf of the respondent. It is stated that in Collector of Salem v. Ranagppa (2) that a person, who has obtained a patta from Government, would acquire a valid title, in the absence of any fraud on Government or on the defendant, a rival claimant. There may possibly be cases to which that proposition might be applicable. It is possible that a fraud practised on a particular party might entitle that party to oppose the plaintiff's claim to enforce his legal right. But there was no fraud in this case as found by both the lower Courts and we are not able to find any defence to the plaintiff's claim.

We must, therefore, reverse the decrees of the lower Courts and give the plaintiff a decree for the recovery of the land sued for. We disallow the claim for mesne profits prior to the date of suit as the claim is not pressed. The lower Appellate Court will hold an inquiry as to the amount of mesne profits which the plaintiff is entitled to from the date of suit to the date of delivery of possession and pass a final order for the amount that may be found due. The plaintiff is also entitled to costs from the defendant throughout on the value of the land.

Appeal allowed.

REGULAR CIVIL APPEALS NOS. 52 TO 55 OF 1911.

Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act (VI B. C. of 1908), ss. 81 cl. (n), 91—Suit by zemindar against jagirdar for possession—Whether suit barred by section 91—Section 81 cl. (n) whether includes coal in mine not opened—Minerals lying on surface of soil—Scope of suit referred to in clause (b) of section 91—Jurisdiction of Civil Court, presumption to be made in favour of—Dismissal of suit under section 91, whether necessary—Stay of suit till final publication of Record of Right—Section 91, sub-section (1) Proviso, relief to be obtained under—No relief by appointment of Receiver or by grant of injunction.

The first eight defendants were jagirdars under the plaintiff. Defendant No. 9 was the manager of their estate under the Chota Nagpur Encumbered Estates Act of 1876. The remaining defendants had obtained a prospecting lease from the manager to open up mines and quarries. The plaintiff, stating that the jagirdars were incompetent to grant a lease in respect of mines and quarries as they had no underground rights, sued for recovery of possession and injunction.

No written statement was filed, but the defendants took exception to the competency of the suit on the ground that it was barred under section 91 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act of 1908.

Held, that the suit was not barred by section 91; that clause (a) of the section was not applicable, first because as the defendants had not yet filed their written statement, it was impossible to ascertain what matters were in issue between the parties to the suit, and secondly, because none of the questions covered by clause (n) of section 81 arose directly or indirectly for determination in the suit as framed; that clause (b) of section 91 was not applicable, because the suit could not be deemed as one for alteration of the rent or the determination of the status of any tenant.

Clause (n) of section 81 does not include coal contained in a mine which has not yet been opened, it refers to minerals lying on the surface of the soil which may be taken by any person, tenant or not. Clause (b) of section 91 does not refer to a suit where the question of the status of the tenant arises only indirectly for consideration.

Every presumption should be made in favour of the jurisdiction of a Civil Court, and it should not be taken away except by express words or by necessary implication.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal on behalf of the plaintiff, the Raja of Ramgarh, in a suit for recovery of possession of land, for damages, for perpetual injunction and for incidental reliefs. The first eight defendants are alleged to be jagirdars under the plaintiff. The ninth defendant is the manager of the estate of the first eight defendants under the Chota Nagpur Encumbered Estates Act of 1876. The remaining defendants, ten in number, are members of the firm of Bird and Company, who have obtained a prospecting lease from the manager with a view to open up mines and quarries. The case for the plaintiff is that the jagirdars are incompetent to grant a lease or a license in respect of mines and quarries as they had no underground rights whatever; he further asserts that the jagirdars held under the condition that if they failed to pay rent according to the prescribed instalments or disputed lawful orders and rules, the villages would be forfeited. It is also stated that the defendants have granted a prospecting lease in respect of a village named Damri, which is not included in their jagir. On these allegations, the plaintiff seeks a decree for ejectment and mesne profits; he further prays that a perpetual injunction may issue on the lessee defendants restraining them from prospecting for coal and from opening mines and quarries There is also a prayer for the issue of a temporary injunction and for the appointment of a Receiver pendente lite. The suit was commenced on the 8th October 1909. The defendants entered appearance and from time to time obtained adjournments to enable them to file their written statement. No written statement, however, was filed, and on the 9th August 1910, the defendants took exception to the competency of the suit on the ground that it was barred under section 91 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act of 1908. The Subordinate Judge gave effect to this objection and dismissed the suit with costs. The substantial question in controversy in this appeal, consequently, is whether the suit as framed is barred under that section.

Section 91 provides that when an order has been made under section 80 or under any law in force before the commencement of the Act, directing the preparation of a Record of Rights, then notwithstanding anything contained in the preceding sections of the twelfth Chapter of the Act, no Deputy Commissioner or Civil Court shall, until six months after the final publication of the Record of Rights, entertain any suit or application in which there is in issue, either directly or indirectly, the existence or non-existence, in the area to which the Record of Rights applies, of any right referred to in clause (n) of section 81 or for the alteration of the rent, or the determination of the status of any tenant in such area. In the case before us, it is not disputed that in respect of a portion only of the subject-matter of the litigation, an order has been made for the preparation of a Record of Rights. It is obvious, therefore, that if the construction adopted by the Subordinate Judge be well founded, the objection to the competency of the suit is valid, only in respect of a portion of the disputed property. From this point of view, the suit ought not to have been dismissed in its entirety.

The real question in controversy, however, is whether the objection is valid in respect of any portion of the subject-matter of the litigation. On behalf of the appellant, it has been contended that neither clause (a) nor clause (b) of the first sub-section of section 91 is applicable; not clause (a), first, because as the defendants have not yet filed their written statement, it is impossible to ascertain what matters are in issue between the parties to the suit, and secondly, because none of the questions covered by clause (n) of section 81 arises, directly or indirectly, for determination in the suit as framed; nor clause (b), because the suit cannot be deemed as one for alteration of the rent or the determination of the status of any tenant in such area.

In so far as clause (a) is concerned, it plainly does not present any bar to the maintainability of the suit. Before that clause can be applied, the Court must ascertain what matters are in issue between the parties. Here the plaintiff has made allegations which have not yet been challenged by the defendants. No doubt, the plaintiff apprehends that upon certain points, his case will not be acceptable to the defendants. But that does not, with any approach to certainty, indicate what will ultimately be the actual matters in issue between the parties. It may be conceded, as explained in Gobind Mohan Das v. Kunja Behari Das (1), that the Court may sometimes be in a position to ascertain the matters in question in the suit, before the issues have been framed, and even before the written statements have been filed, though ordinarily, this can be done only after the pleadings have been filed. Let it be assumed, therefore, for a moment that clause (n) may be applied before the written statement has been filed by the defendant, the question still remains whether any of the matters covered by clause (n) of section 81 will be in controversy directly or indirectly in this litigation. Now, section 81 clause (n) refers to the right of any person, whether a landlord or tenant or not, to take forest produce from jungle land or waste land or to graze cattle on any land in any village in the area to which the Record of Rights applies. The term "forest produce" is defined as follows in section 3 clause (XI): "Forest produce," unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context, includes the following, whether taken from a forest or not, that is to say, peat, surface-soil, rock and minerals, including iron-stone, coal, clay, sand and lime-stone (when taken by any person for his own use). It is plain that clause (n) of section 81 does not include coal contained in a mine which has not yet been opened; such coal cannot be described in any sense of the term as forest produce from jungle lands or forest lands. It has been suggested, however, that the extended meaning given to the expression 'forest produce' in clause (e) of section 3, shows that coal may be included thereunder. This argument is obviously unfounded. Clause (e) mentions peat, surface-soil, rock and minerals (including iron-stone, coal, clay, sand and lime-stone when taken by any person for his own use). It cannot be reasonably argued, nor, indeed, has it been seriously contended, that the lessee-defendants, when they open a mine, can be deemed to take coal for their own use; the clause refers obviously to minerals lying on the surface of the soil which may be taken by any person, tenant or not. It is clear, therefore, that the right mentioned in clause (n) of section 81 cannot be directly or indirectly in controversy in this litigation; and this is the view which commended itself to the Subordinate Judge.

In so far as clause (b) is concerned, it has not been suggested that the suit is one for alteration of the rent. But it has been argued that the suit is one for determination of the status of a tenant in an area in respect of which preparation of the Record of Rights has been directed. In this connection, we must not overlook a remarkable difference in the phraseology of the two clauses (a) and (b); clause (a) speaks of a suit in which there is in issue, either directly or indirectly, the existence or non-existence of certain rights: clause (b), on the other hand, speaks of a suit for the determination of the status of a tenant. This difference in phraseology must be taken to have been intentional; clause (b), therefore, does not refer to a suit where, as here, the question of the status of the tenant arises only indirectly for consideration. In no sense of the term, can the present suit be deemed for the determination of the status of the defendants as tenants under the plaintiff; nor can the question raised be regarded as a question about the status of the defendants as tenants. There is no question that the defendants are jagirdars and the lessees under them cannot obviously have higher rights than their lessors. The different classes of tenants, recognised by the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act, are defined in section 4 and it is clear that, in the present case, the plaintiff does not invite the Court to determine to which of these classes the tenancy of the defendants belongs. The real point in controversy is, whether the defendants as jagirdars possess any mining rights; to put it plainly and broadly, the question is, whose property is the underground coal? The plaintiff asserts that the defendants as jagirdars do not possess any mining rights. What position will be taken up by the lessee-defendants, has not been disclosed by them up to the present stage; but if we assume that their contention will be that the jagirdars defendants were entitled to the coal, it cannot be successfully argued that the suit is for the determination of the status of the defendants as tenants. The conclusion follows that neither clause (a) nor clause (b) of sub-section (1) of section 91 bars the suit as framed. In this connection, we must remember that, as pointed out in the case of Mavoulu Seetharam Naidu v. Doddi Rami Naidu (2), it is an elementary principle of law that every presumption shall be made in favour of the jurisdiction of a Civil Court and that it shall not be taken away except by express words or by necessary implication [see also Winter v. Attorney-General (3)]. In the case before us, the jurisdiction of the Civil Court has not been taken away by the express words of the statute, nor can it be deemed to have been taken away by necessary implication. On the other hand, it is extremely unlikely that the Legislature should have intended that questions of this description should be determined by the Revenue Authorities under section 81 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act of 1908.

We may finally observe that even if the view taken by the Subordinate Judge had been well founded, he ought not to have dismissed the suit. Section 91, where it is applicable, merely provides that the Civil Court shall not entertain a suit of a particular description. That does not mean that the suit, if instituted, shall be dismissed. The proper course to follow in such a contingency is to adjourn the trial of the suit till the final publication of the Record of Rights. The view we take is supported by the principle recognised in Rendall v. Blair (4); Azmat Ali v. Lalli Begum (5); Alimuddin Khan v. Hira Lal Sen (6); Jijaji v. Balkrishna (7); Bandu v. Jambu (8); Jagat Tarini Dasi v. Nabogopal Chaki (9) and Sarat Chandra Banerji v. Apurba Krishna Roy (10) and does not militate against the decision in Chandu Lal v. Awad (11). The Subordinate Judge plainly failed to appreciate the true nature of the suit and when he considered that the proviso to the first sub-section of section 91 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act afforded ample relief to the plaintiff, he overlooked that the plaintiff could thereunder obtain relief only when waste or damage had been actually committed. The plaintiff is entitled under that proviso merely to prohibit the continuance of waste or damage; he cannot demand a prohibition of the commission of the waste or damage. It is further clear that under the proviso, no relief can be granted either by the appointment of a Receiver or by the grant of a temporary injunction. The suit, in our opinion, is in its essence a suit for recovery of possession of land and although, incidentally, in the course of the trial, questions may arise as to the rights of the defendants as jagirdars, the suit is clearly not barred under section 91 of the Chota Nagpur Tenancy Act.

The result is that this appeal is allowed, the decree of the Subordinate Judge set aside and the case remitted to him in order that it may be tried on the merits. The appellant is entitled to his costs in this Court. We direct, under section 13 of the Court Fees Act, that the Court-fees paid on the memorandum of appeal be refunded to the appellant.

It is conceded that this judgment will govern the other appeals (Regular Civil Appeals Nos. 53 to 55 of 1911). Similar orders will be drawn up in each of them.

As the suits were instituted so far back as the 8th October 1909, the Subordinate Judge will take up the cases for disposal as early as practicable. Let the records be sent down at once.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal on behalf of some of the defendants in a suit to enforce a mortgage security. Dhananjoy Roy, the mortgagor, now represented by his widows, the first two defendants, executed four successive mortgages. The earliest in point of time was executed on the 19th March 1889, in favour of the third defendant one of the appellants in this Court. The second transaction was in favour of one Hare Krishna Maity and took place on the 28th July 1892. This was followed by a mortgage in favour of Titu Charan Dass on the 29th April 1894. The last mortgage was in favour of the plaintiff on the 21st November 1899, and it is stated that out of the consideration for this mortgage, the claim of the third mortgagee was satisfied. The third defendant who is the first mortgagee sued to enforce his security and obtained a decree, on the 24th May 1895. To this decree the parties were the mortgagor and the second and third mortgagees. In execution of this decree, he purchased, on the 22nd March 1897, a parcel No. 16, which has been released in his favour by the Court below. He subsequently obtained a supplementary decree under section 90 of the Transfer of Property Act and, on the 11th July 1900, purchased the right, title and interest of the mortgagor in the five parcels now in dispute. The second mortgagee, Hare Krishna Maity, also sued to enforce his security and obtained a decree on the 24th November 1902; to this decree, the parties were the mortgagor, and the third and fourth mortgagees, of whom the last is the plaintiff in the present suit. In execution of this decree the properties were purchased by the decree-holder on the 20th March 1905. The third mortgagee, Titu Charan Das, sued to enforce his security and obtained a decree on the 5th August 1897. To this decree, the only party was the mortgagor. The plaintiff, as the fourth mortgagee, now seeks to enforce his security, and the substantial point in controversy between the parties at this stage is, whether this mortgage can be enforced against five parcels mentioned in schedule to the plaint, namely, Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15 and 17. The contention of the appellant is that the mortgagor had a two-fold right in these lands, namely, a chakdari right (or the interest of a tenure-holder) and a jotedari right (or the interest of an occupancy-ryot), that the superior interest alone was covered by the previous mortgages, while the subordinate interest is covered by her mortgage, and that, consequently, her right in these parcels as mortgagee has not been affected in any way by the sales in execution of the decrees on the previous mortgages. This claim is resisted on a two-fold ground, namely, first, that the mortgagor had no jotedari right in these parcels independent of his chakdari right; and secondly, that if he had a two-fold right, his whole interest was included in the previous mortgages, so that the interest of the plaintiff as fourth mortgagee of the occupancy-right alone was extinguished when she failed to redeem as directed by the decree obtained by the second mortgagee, from whom the third defendant-appellant has subsequently taken a settlement. The Subordinate Judge has overruled these contentions and made a decree in favour of the plaintiff. That decree has been assailed in this Court on the grounds just mentioned. In our opinion, the decision of the Subordinate Judge cannot be supported. The evidence does not establish that the mortgagor had a two-fold right in the disputed parcels. No direct evidence has been adduced in support of the theory that the mortgagor had a two-fold right in these parcels of lands, namely, a superior interest as chakdar or tenure-holder and a subordinate interest, as jotedar or occupancy-raiyat. There is no indication in the evidence that at any time in the history of these parcels, there were in two different persons two distinct rights of the character mentioned. If there had been such evidence available, the question would have arisen, when did the two distinct interests combine in the same person and what was the legal effect thereof. It is not suggested that the mortgagor had any co-sharers in the property and that he could, by any possibility as a share-holder in the chakdari interest, have acquired also the interest of a subordinate tenant and kept it alive. Presumably, therefore, if the two interests existed, when they vested in the plaintiff, the principle of merger would have applied. But whether by any device the two interests, after they have been vested in the same person, could have been kept alive and distinct, is a matter which we need not consider in the present case, because there is no foundation laid in the evidence either to prove the existence of two distinct interests, or to show that if two distinct interests existed, they were vested in the mortgagor or his predecessor-in-interest. Our attention, however, has been drawn to the deposition of one of the witnesses for the third defendant, who stated that after purchase by that defendant, rent was paid to the mortgagor as chakdar. The passage in question is by no means clear and is not sufficient to establish the existence of a jotedari right independent of, and subordinate to, the chakdari right. The learned Vakil for the plaintiff-respondent has laid much stress upon the recitals in the successive mortgage-bonds and upon the description of the property conveyed thereby. In our opinion, these descriptions do not lend any support to the theory that there was a jotedari right independent of the chakdari right. On the other hand, the description in the second mortgage indicates that the whole of the interest of the mortgagor in the property described as the chak of 200 bighas was transferred to the mortgagee. As was pointed out by this Court in the case of Joy Dutt Jha v. Bayee Ram Singh (1), when a proprietor is in possession of nij jote lands, it cannot be said that he has in respect of such lands, an interest subordinate to the proprietary interest, so that when his interest as proprietor disappears, along with it must disappear his interest in the nij jote lands. It is further clear from the decision in Gour Chandra Gajapati v. Mukunda Deb (2) that when the mortgagor effected a mortgage of his interest in the chak, unless there was express reservation, the presumption would follow that he had given by way of security all interests of whatever kind he possessed in the land; for in the words of Lord Coke, "it is a maxim in law, that every man's grant shall be taken by construction of law most forcible against himself, which is so to be understood that no wrong be thereby done," (Co. Litt. 183, a, b,) or, as Lord Selborne puts it, "the words of a deed, executed for a valuable consideration, ought to be construed, as far as they properly may, in favour of the grantee [Neill v. Devonshire, (3)]. Upon an examination of the successive mortgages, it is manifest that there was no reservation made by the mortgagor in any of them of an interest in the property described as chak. We must hold, therefore, that even if it were established that the mortgagor had a jotedari right, subordinate to chakdari right, his entire interest was transferred to the second mortgagee, so that when the plaintiff failed to redeem as directed by his decree, his interest in the disputed parcels was extinguished. In this view of the matter, it is clear that the plaintiff is not entitled to enforce her security as against plots Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15 and 17.

We may add that it was suggested on behalf of the respondents that this position cannot be assumed by the third defendant, because the settlement alleged by him from the purchaser at the sale in execution of the decree on the second mortgage, has not been established. It cannot be disputed that the third defendant, by virtue of his purchase of the disputed plots at a sale in execution of a money-decree against the mortgagor, did not acquire an interest superior to that of the plaintiff; he can succeed, only on the strength of the title, if any, acquired by the purchaser at the sale in execution of the decree on the second mortgagee. The question, therefore, does arise whether the third defendant has established his alleged settlement from the purchaser. In our opinion, the reasons given by the Subordinate Judge for the adverse view taken by him, are by no means conclusive. The alleged settlement is supported by the representatives of the second mortgagee and the surrounding circumstances make such a settlement very probable. The third defendant had purchased these parcels on the 11th July 1900; he had subsequently to face the claim of the plaintiff. The only way, in which he could protect himself, was by acquisition of a title from the representatives of the second mortgagee. This he asserts, he has done, and there is no good reason why he should not be believed. We are, therefore, of opinion, that for the purposes of the litigation it has been proved that the third defendant is entitled to challenge the title of the plaintiff.

It is worthy of note that if the third defendant had failed to establish his title, the plaintiff would have been met by a fresh difficulty. The plaintiff was bound to bring on the record the representatives of the second mortgagee; if the third defendant is not such representative, the suit has been improperly constituted. It must, therefore, either fail, or be re-tried after all the necessary parties have been brought on the record.

The result is, that the appeal by the third defendant must be allowed and the decree of the Subordinate Judge modified. The plaintiff will be entitled to proceed in execution of her decree against the properties other than those exempted by the lower Court, namely, plots Nos. 1 and 16 as also the plots now exempted, namely, Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15 and 17. This appellant is entitled to the costs of this appeal. We assess the hearing fee at five gold mohurs. The appeal of the eleventh defendant will, however, stand dismissed with costs. We assess the hearing fee against him in favour of the respondent at three gold mohurs. The appeal by the other defendants will also stand dismissed, but without costs. The decree of the Court below, except in so far as it is varied, will stand confirmed.

Decree modified.

In determining what interest passes to a vendee under a sale-deed executed to him by the managing member of a joint Hindu family, it is competent to Courts to go beyond the language of the document, if necessary, and look to the surrounding circumstances to see whether the executant purported to convey only his personal interest or the family interest.

The managing member of a Hindu family has power, in proper circumstances, to bind the minor's interest, in a contract by him for the sale of the joint family property and specific performance can be given against that interest.

Appeal against the decree of the District Court of North Arcot, in O. S. No. 47 of 1907.

Mr. T. R. Vencatrama Sastri, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the District Court of North Arcot in a suit for specific performance of a contract.

The defendants Nos. 1 to 5 were the members of a joint family of which the 5th defendant was the father and the 1st defendant the eldest son. Defendants Nos. 6 and 7 were persons who had taken from the 5th defendant a sale of the property in question after the date of the contract sued on. The contract is dated the 27th August 1906 and by it the property was agreed to be sold for Rs. 2,375 and it was executed by the 1st defendant and witnessed by the 5th defendant. The sale to defendants Nos. 6 and 7 of the same item of property is dated the 20th of September 1906 and was for a sum of Rs. 2,900. The District Judge has given a decree to the plaintiff directing defendants Nos. 1 to 3 and the 2nd defendant as guardian of the 4th defendant to execute a sale-deed to the plaintiff and put the plaintiff in possession and with other reliefs has given a declaration that the sale-deed to the 6th and 7th defendants was void and ineffectual as against the plaintiff. The 5th defendant is dead. Defendants Nos. 6 and 7 appeal and their contentions are as follows:—(1) that prior to the date of the agreement in favour of the plaintiff, there was an oral agreement between them and the other defendants, dated the 22nd August 1906, to sell the property to them for the sum of Rs. 2, 275, (2) that at the date of the sale to them, there was no subsisting contract between the plaintiff and the other defendants, (3) that the plaintiff's contract is not binding on any party but himself, because (a) he was not the managing member, (b) even if he was de facto manager, it was not made with the express consent of the 2nd and 3rd defendants as alleged in the plaint and the 4th defendant being a minor, specific performance cannot be had against him with the result that the plaintiff could only bind the 1st defendant on his contract in which circumstances the Court would not grant the specific relief sought for but would only award damages. We will take these contentions in order and see how far they are proved and are an answer to the plaintiff's claim.

We are unable to accept the evidence of the alleged oral agreement of the 22nd August 1906. Mr. K. Srinivasa Aiyangar relies chiefly on the fact that defendants Nos. 6 and 7 purchased stamp papers soon after the date of the alleged agreement and also on the fact that that agreement is recited in the sale-deed. The story, however, is utterly improbable on the face of it. The 6th and 7th defendants allege that they were in negotiation for this property for a month prior to the alleged oral contract, that they originally having offered Rs. 2,000 and the family insisting on Rs. 2,500, at the end of the month they eventually agreed to pay Rs. 2,275. If this be so, it is inconceivable that they should have subsequently paid Rs. 2,900 for the same property instead of insisting on their contract being carried out. According to their own case, the negotiations for the oral contract were carried on with the 5th defendant, the father, whom they themselves alleged to be the managing member, and lastly it is unlikely that after such protracted negotiations, the agreement should not have been reduced to writing. We have no doubt that the idea of this oral contract was first conceived on the 20th of September 1906, when the sale-deed was executed.

For the contention that there was no subsisting contract at the date of the sale, reliance is sought to be placed on a discussion that is said to have taken place between the plaintiff and the defendants Nos. 1 to 5 on the 5th of September, on which date he undoubtedly asked the 1st defendant to execute a sale-deed and we are asked to hold that he abandoned his right to the execution of the deed, stated that he was going away to Nellore for his father's ceremony and that he would resume negotiations when he returned, but that if he did not return shortly, they could sell the property to anybody else. We have examined the whole of the evidence very carefully and do not find that this contention is proved. We are satisfied that what took place with regard to the plaintiff's contract is as follows: The 1st defendant, undoubtedly, entered into a contract with the plaintiff on the 27th August 1906 for the sale of the lands, which contract was witnessed by the 5th defendant, but we do not believe that this was made with the express consent of defendants Nos. 2 and 3 as the evidence called for the plaintiff would have us believe. On September 5th, when the plaintiff demanded his sale-deed, the 1st defendant informed him that the 2nd and 3rd defendants would not agree. The plaintiff then recognised that the agreement to sell to him was executed by the 1st defendant only and was not binding on defendants Nos. 2, 3 and 4. He did not abandon his contract but he hoped to get the consent of defendants Nos. 2 and 3 by paying a little more and left them to go to Nellore intending to make that arrangement when he returned. Mr. T. Rangachariar for the plaintiff contended that the 1st defendant was the de facto managing member, the father being old and ill, having resigned the management, and that even if express consent is not found, there was necessity proved which makes the contract binding on the junior members, while Mr. Srinivasa Aiyangar contra contended that the 1st defendant did not intend to convey more than his own interest and that even if he did intend to do so, the document does not purport to convey more than his own interest and lastly, that necessity was neither set up in the plaint nor proved and, therefore, the family interest would not pass. In support of the second proposition, he relies on a recent decision of the Privy Council in Balwant Singh v. R. Rockwell Clancy (1). This case, however, does not support his proposition. The decision did not turn on the words of the document but on the surrounding circumstances which were examined by the Court to ascertain the true intent of the document. In that case, the executant was shown to have been claiming the property as the owner of an impartible Raj and the document itself recites this claim. The case is an authority for the exactly opposite proposition that surrounding circumstances must be looked to, to see whether the executant purported to convey his interest or the family interest. This was expressly decided by a Full Bench of five Judges in a case reported as Kanti Chunder Goswami v. Bisheswar Goswami (2). It is true that in Simbhu Nath Pande v. Golap Singh (3), their Lordships of the Privy Council say that a purchaser, who is bargaining for the entire family estate, would hardly be satisfied with a document purporting to convey only the right and interest of the father, but their Lordships used that as one test only of the intention of the parties. We cannot, therefore, accept the contention that this agreement purported only to convey the 1st defendant's interest. We have no doubt that when the 1st defendant executed that document, he wished the plaintiff to believe that he was conveying the whole family interest in the property. But on the question of necessity, we can find no evidence of pressure. What is required to justify such a sale has been laid down long ago in Hanooman Persaud Pandey v. Musammat Babooee Munraj (4): "The actual pressure on the estate, the danger to be averted, or the benefit to be conferred upon it, in the particular instance, is the thing to be regarded." There is no evidence of the condition of this estate or of any threatened proceedings or even pressure of creditors and it further tells very strongly against the plaintiff that within a month from the date of this agreement, the family was able to obtain Rs. 525 more for the same property: such an agreement on that ground alone could not in this case be upheld as being for the benefit of the estate. We, therefore, find that neither consent nor necessity has been made out.

The question, whether specific performance can be had against a minor of a contract made on his behalf to sell property has been argued at great length. Mr. Srinivasa Aiyangar relied on a decision of the Privy Council reported as Mir Sarwarjan v. Fakhr-ud-din Mahomed Chowdhuri (5), and another reported as Waghela Raj Sanji v. Shekh Masludin (6) and the case of Jugul Kishori Chowdhurani v. Anunda Lal Chowdhuri (7). If this is the law, it cannot be denied that it will have a very serious effect on Hindu families. There are very few joint families, one member of which at least is not a minor. If, therefore, a specific performance cannot be had on a contract by such a family to sell property there can be no contract for the sale of land entitling the other party to specific performance. We have examined the case in Mir Surwarjan v. Fakhr-ud-din Mahomed Chowdhuri (5) very carefully and are satisfied that that is not what their Lordships decide. The language relied on is at page 237 and it is as follows: "Their Lordships are of opinion that it is not within the competence of the guardian of a minor to bind the minor or the minor's estate by a contract for the purchase of immoveable property." The first thing that appears is that this is not a case of a contract made by a managing member purporting to bind the whole family but by the guardian of a minor and the manager of his estate. The family in that case were Muhammadans in each of whom including the minor was vested a separate though undivided share of the property, and what was considered was the power of such guardian-manager to bind the minor or his property by a contract for the purchase of immoveable property. It is obvious that the question which is vital to sale by a managing member, namely necessity cannot arise in a contract for the purchase, not for the sale, of immoveable property. The Guardians and Wards Act (VIII of 1890), section 27, expressly provides that a guardian may do all acts that are reasonable and proper for the protection and benefit of the property, but that where a guardian is appointed by the Court, he shall not dispose of immoveable property except in the case of necessity or for an advantage to the ward and then only by permission of the Court. The Act clearly contemplates such necessity arising, as, of course, it frequently does, and as no guardian of the property of a minor, who is a member of a joint Hindu family, can be appointed with reference to his share in the family property, [vide Gharib ul-lah v. Khalak Singh (8)], it follows that the restriction in the Act cannot be applied. The decision is only an authority for the exact proposition quoted, namely, that the guardian and manager of a minor's property cannot bind him by a contract for the purchase of immoveable property. The case above referred to Gharib-ul-lah v. Khalak Singh (8), is one in which a mortgage by the karta of a family and the guardian mother of a minor was considered by the Court; and their Lordships held that the execution by the guardian of the minor was a nullity but that execution by the karta, that is, the managing member, bound the minor. It is true that this was a completed transfer but we can find no principle which would uphold a transfer against the minor but avoid the transaction where it had not got beyond the stage of contract. Krishna Ayyar v. Krishnasami Ayyar (9), relied on by Mr. Srinivasa Aiyangar is not an authority for that proposition. The other decision of the Privy Council Waghela Rajsanji v. Shekh Masludin (6), lays down that it will be a very improper thing to allow a guardian to make covenants in the name of his ward and that in so doing, the guardian exceeded her powers with the result that a suit founded upon the personal liability of the minor must fail. This decision has no bearing whatever on the power of a managing member to bind a minor by a contract for sale of his interest for necessity.

We hold, therefore, that a managing member has power in proper circumstances to so bind the minor's interest and specific performance can be given against that interest. In the present case, however, we are satisfied, on the evidence especially with regard to Exhibit H series, that the 1st defendant was not the managing member and so not entitled to bind the interest of any one but himself. The fact that the 5th defendant witnessed the agreement is of no materiality now as he is dead and his interest in the estate has disappeared. In the view that we take that the contract only binds the 1st defendant's share, Mr. Rangachariar does not ask for specific performance as to his share nor should we grant it in the circumstances of this case. He, however, claims damages against the 1st defendant's representative. He has not asked for damages in his plaint but we are of opinion that they can be awarded under section 19 of the Specific Relief Act and we assess the damages at the difference between the sum for which the 1st defendant agreed to sell the property (Rs. 2,375) and Rs. 2,900 which is shown by the subsequent sale-deed to be the value of the property. He is also entitled to Rs. 25 expended by him in purchasing the stamp paper and Rs. 20 paid by him at the date of the agreement. Defendants Nos. 6 and 7 will have their costs throughout from plaintiff. The plaintiff will have his costs from the 8th respondent as legal representative of the 1st defendant. The other defendants will bear their own costs throughout.

CALCUTTA HIGH COURT.

ORIGINAL CIVIL SUIT No. 61 OF 1911.

February 28, 1912.

Present:—Mr. Justice Fletcher.

LODNA COLLIERY Co. LD.—PLAINTIFF

versus

BIPIN BIHARI BOSE—DEFENDANT.

Letters Patent (Cal.), cl. 12—High Court—Jurisdiction—"Suit for land"—Trespass—Wrongful breaking through mine and carrying away coal—Covenant to keep barrier between lessor and lessee—Privity of contract between lessor and sub-lessee—Cause of action—Suit for damages for erection of buttresses.

A suit to recover damages for breaking through plaintiff's mine or land and carrying away coal belonging to the plaintiff, is a suit for land or immoveable property within the meaning of clause 12 of the Calcutta Letters Patent.

Such a suit is founded on the ordinary case of a trespass quare clausum fregit and necessitates the decision of the question of title as to the coal.

Rajmohan Bose v. East India Railway Co., 10 B. L R. 241, followed.

The venue of a suit on a covenant by reason of a privity of estate is local.

A., an under-lessee, covenanted that he would leave a certain barrier as was provided in the under-lease. Subsequently, A. assigned his rights or granted an under-lease to B., who granted an under-lease to C. The representative of the original lessor sued C. for damages for breach of the covenant to leave the barrier and for damages to which plaintiff would be put in erecting masonry buttresses to protect his mine:

Held, (1) that there was no privity of estate between C. and the plaintiff, that C. was not personally liable on the covenant in the original sub-lease, and that the plaint did not disclose any cause of action against C. on the covenant in the original sub-lease;

(2) that the claim for damages for erecting masonry buttresses was a claim for land, within the meaning of clause 12 of the Letters Patent.

Mr. L. P. E. Pugh (with him Messrs. W. H. Knight, N. Sircar and W. M. Cubitt), for the Plaintiff.

Mr. S. P. Sinha (with him Messrs. B. C. Mitter and B. L. Mitter), for the Defendant.

LODNA COLLIERY CO. LD. v. BIPIN BEHARI BOSE.

JUDGMENT.—This is a suit brought by the plaintiff Company against the defendant, Bipin Bihari Bose, to recover first of all the sum of Rs. 90,902-8, or for an inquiry as to the amount of the plaintiff Company's coal raised by the defendant and sold to the plaintiff Company and the moneys so realized by the defendant with such proper deduction as the Court may direct; and secondly, for discovery from the defendant of the quantity of the plaintiff Company's coal so raised or disposed of; thirdly, for interest by way of further damages; fourthly, for Rs. 1,21,012-6 as damages for breach of contract and injury to the plaintiff Company's colliery; and, fifthly, unless the defendant should undertake to protect and secure the plaintiff Company's workings by masonry buttresses to be erected to the satisfaction of the plaintiff Company's servants and surveyors, for a further sum of Rs. 4,000 as damages.

Now, in the first paragraph of the plaint, it is set out that the plaintiff Company is the proprietor of a colliery and is the owner under a permanent mokurari pottah or lease of Mouza Lodna in Manbhum, subject as to a portion thereof to an under-lease or dur-mokurari pottah granted by predecessors-in-title of the plaintiff Company in favour of one Golab Chandra Sircar of a portion on the North-West of the said mouza. In the second paragraph is set out that by the terms of the said under-lease, dated the 7th Assin 1303 B. S., corresponding with the 22nd September 1896, it was agreed that the boundary should be demarcated between the portion of the said mouza retained by the grantors and the portion underleased as aforesaid and that a barrier or block of coal 30 feet in width should be maintained between the two portions of the said mouza and that neither party should work 15 feet of coal on each side of the boundary line, and that if either party encroached on the barrier and in consequence the other party should sustain any loss, then the encroaching party should make good the other's loss. The third paragraph alleges that no such boundary was actually laid down by and between the original parties to the said under-lease but, subsequent to the purchase of the said mouza and an assignment of the pottah under which the same was held on the 5th June 1897 to Alfred Morrison Turner, George Hampson Morrison, Henry Blois Hawkins Turner, and Charles Edward Smyth, the boundary was on the 20th July 1897 delineated, laid down, and marked by the agents and representatives of the said A. M. Turner, G. H. Morrison, H. B. H. Turner and C. E. Smyth on the one hand and of the said Golab Chandra Sircar on the other hand, and a plan showing the said boundary was signed by both parties. In the fourth paragraph, the plaint alleges that the plaintiff Company is the assignee of those named gentlemen. Then in the fifth paragraph the plaintiff Company alleges that Golab Chandra Sircar assigned his rights in or granted an under-lease of his portion of the said mouza so delineated as aforesaid to one Ram Lal Singh, and that the said Ram Lal Singh granted an under-lease of the same portion of the mouza to the defendant who there carries on a colliery known as the North Burrakar Colliery. In the sixth paragraph, it is alleged that the plaintiffs and defendant dwell and carry on business and personally work for gain in Calcutta. The seventh paragraph alleges that the defendant has so conducted his mining operations at the North Burrakar Colliery that he has cut into and removed portions of the coal forming the barrier agreed to be left between his North Burrakar Colliery and the plaintiff Company's Lodna Colliery, and has cut and carried away coal from the 15 feet agreed to be left on the north of the boundary line in breach of the agreement contained in the said under-lease, and has also cut and carried away coal from the south or plaintiff Company's portion of the barrier, and has further cut through the said barrier, and cut and carried away the plaintiff Company's coal on the said side of the said barrier. Then the eighth paragraph alleges that the plaintiff Company is unable to state the exact dates and times when the defendant cut into and through the said barrier, but the fact that an encroachment had been made was only recently discovered by the plaintiff Company and the plaintiff Company believes and charges that all the said conversions of the plaintiff Company's coal and trespasses in the plaintiff Company's property and the defendant's breach of contract in not maintaining the said barrier, have taken place within two years prior to the filing of the plaint. Then the 9th paragraph alleges that the plaintiff Company had an arrangement under which the plaintiff Company bought from the defendant the whole of the output of the defendant's colliery at prices which during the last two years were Rs. 4-12 in 1909 and Rs. 3 in 1910, and the plaintiff Company alleges that they are entitled to charge the defendant for the coal belonging to the plaintiff Company abstracted by the defendant from the plaintiff Company's property and sold to the plaintiff Company at the highest rate paid by the plaintiff Company for such coal during the past two years. In the 10th paragraph it is alleged that the amount of coal, so far as the plaintiff Company has been able to ascertain, amounts to 17,314 tons of steam coal and 5,774 tons of slack, and the plaintiff Company claims from the defendant the sum of Rs. 90,902-8 in respect of the same, which is the first amount claimed in the prayer. Then the 11th paragraph says that by reason of the wrongful act of the defendant in cutting through the said barrier, the plaintiff Company has further sustained loss and damages in that it has become necessary for the safety and preservation of the plaintiff Company's colliery to leave another barrier of coal as shown on the plan thereto annexed to the south of the coal belonging to the plaintiff Company worked out by the defendant, of the width of 30 feet. By reason of the wrongful acts of the defendant and the necessity for leaving a new barrier, an area of land containing approximately 32,641 tons of steam coal and 10,849 of slack of similar qualities to that raised by the defendant and sold to the plaintiff Company has become unworkable and cannot be utilized by the plaintiff Company. The value of such coal and slack, less the cost of working and raising it, is Rs. 1,21,012 6, and the plaintiff Company claims the said sum as damages inasmuch as the plaintiff Company's colliery has been injured and damaged by the defendant to that extent. In the 12th paragraph of the plaint is set out that at one portion of the defendant's colliery where his workings adjoin the plaintiff Company's workings and the defendant has cut through to the plaintiff Company's workings, there is a portion where the plaintiff Company's workings can only be rendered safe by the insertion of pucca buttresses at a cost of about Rs. 4,000. In the 13 paragraph, it is alleged that the plaintiff Company's causes of action arose at Lodna on dates within three years.

Now, the question that has been argued at the present stage is, does this plaint disclose a cause of action, which this Court can try? In my opinion, it does not. First of all, the case as to the carrying away of coal is founded on the ordinary case of a trespass quare clausum fregit, that is, the defendant broke through and entered the plaintiff Company's mine or land and carried away coal belonging to the plaintiff Company. That it seems to me is the nature of the suit. Now a suit of that nature seems, so far as I can gather from the decisions of this Court, to be one that would be considered as a suit for land or immoveable properties within the meaning of the clause 12 of the Letters Patent of this Court. I think there is a great deal to be said if the matter could be treated as res integra in the argument put forward by Mr. Knight; but suits for land are well defined by the decisions of this Court. The Bombay High Court has taken the other view; and it seems to me to be a much more likely one in respect of suits for land or other immoveable properties. But the matter has been considered over and over again in this Court.

Now, applying the principles laid down in the decisions of this Court to the suit in question, it seems to me that, in so far as the plaintiff seeks to recover damages for the defendant having broken into his close and carried away his coal, it will become necessary that the title in respect of that coal must be gone into, whether the defendant had the right to break through or not. In so far as that portion of the case is concerned, I do not think that having regard to the decisions, that have been dealt with very fully and with great ability by both Mr. Sinha and Mr. Knight, that I can decide otherwise than that this is a suit for land. The decisions of the Appellate Court are binding upon me, and I cannot go behind them. It seems to me that so far as the same is a suit to recover damages arising out of an action for trespass to land, that is a suit for land; in one of the cases cited, Garth, C. J., expressly refers to a suit for trespass as being a suit for land. In England, it has always been considered as a suit for land.

The case of Rajmohun Bose v. East Indian Railway Co. (1), which Mr. Knight has relied on, was a very different case. In that case, a man sued the East Indian Railway Company for carrying on a forge and other works on land adjoining his. That was not a suit for trespass to land, but it was really a suit in respect of nuisance, and that case is wholly distinguishable. In so far as this suit seeks to recover damages by reason of the defendant having broken into close and carried away the plaintiff Company's coal, I am of opinion this is a suit for land.

The other point put forward by Mr. Knight was that in the original under-lease, Golab Chandra Sircar had covenanted that he would leave the barrier as was provided in the under-lease. Now, Golab Chandra Sircar, according to the allegation in the plaint, had either assigned his rights in, or granted an under-lease to, one Ram Lal Singh and Ram Lal Singh granted an under-lease to the defendant. That is the allegation in the plaint. So whichever way we take it, there is no privity of contract or estate between the defendant and the plaintiff Company. The plaintiff Company obviously could not sue the defendant on any covenant contained in Golab Chandra Sircar's under-lease, either on the ground of privity of estate or otherwise. Another point might arise if the defendant were the assignee of Golab Chandra Sircar, and that is whether that would be a suit for land. So far as I remember, it was always held in England that the venue of a suit on a covenant by reason of a privity of estate was local. The defendant is not personally liable on any of the covenants contained in the under-lease to Sircar. It seems to me that so far as it is a suit founded upon the terms contained in the under-lease, the plaint does not disclose any cause of action, because the defendant is not personally liable to perform the terms of the under-lease to Golab Chandra Sircar. That would dispose of the case so far as the plaintiff's claim for breach of contract is concerned.

The next portion of the case is as to a sum of Rs. 4,000 which is claimed as damages that the plaintiff will be put to in erecting masonry buttresses unless the defendant erects such buttresses to the satisfaction of the plaintiff Company's servants or their surveyors. That sum is claimed on the footing that damage has been caused by reason of the wrongful act of the defendant in cutting through the said barrier; that stands on the same footing as the carrying away of the coal. It depends on the question, was the defendant justified in cutting through the barrier and carrying away the coal in the same manner suggested? That is the way it is claimed and that is the only ground on which the defendant can be made liable. It seems to me that the sum of Rs. 4,000 stands on exactly the same footing as the sum of Rs. 90,902-8, which is claimed in respect of the coal which the defendant is alleged to have carried away from the plaintiff's land. That being so, that portion of the action, in so far as it seeks to recover the sum of Rs. 4,000, comes within the meaning of a suit for land. The Court could not be able to award the plaintiff that sum of Rs. 4,000 without deciding the question of the title to the barrier of coal which the defendant is alleged to have broken through and so caused damage to the plaintiff Company. On this ground, I think the plaint in this suit does not disclose any cause of action which this Court is competent to try. The plaint must, therefore, be returned to the plaintiff Company. As to costs, the plaintiff Company must pay the costs of these proceedings as of a hearing. The plaintiff Company will pay the defendant the costs of this suit including all reserved costs on scale No. 2.

Mr. Pestonji, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The land in suit originally belonged to one Nichal, who was the common ancestor of the plaintiff and the last male owner who held the property by the name of Nazro. On the death of Nazro, his widow Surtu succeeded and she sold the land in dispute to her son-in-law in 1890. On her death Hans, whose relationship will be seen from the pedigree-table, was entitled to claim the land. He did not claim it nor did his son, Diwan. Diwan left a widow Musammat Parbati, who made no claim. Musammat Parbati died in 1907 and the plaintiff Shamu then became entitled to the land and he now claims it, on the ground that the alienation by Surtu was not a valid one.

The learned Divisional Judge has held that time began to run against the plaintiff from the death of Musammat Surtu. This view might have claimed considerable support before the passing of the decision by the Full Bench in Sundar v. Salig Ram (1). Under that ruling, it is quite clear that time can only be held to have run against Shamu, plaintiff, from the date of the death of Musammat Parbati, as according to the decision in that case, the fact that time had run against Hans and Diwan and Musammat Parbati is immaterial, Shamu, plaintiff, not having derived his rights from Hans or Diwan, but from the common ancestor. It is unnecessary to enter into my personal view on the subject as the ruling of the Full Bench is perfectly clear and must be followed.

The only remedy for the anomalous conditions produced by this view of the law, a view which may be logically deduced from the premises laid down by previous authorities but which probably never formed any part of Customary Law as known to the people, such Customary Law being by no means logical, lies in legislation. The results, as stated by the learned Judge who passed that ruling, will, undoubtedly, in many cases, be to produce difficulty and injustice which can only be remedied now by legislation on the lines of the Punjab Limitation Act I of 1900. Provisions analogous to those contained in that Act dealing with the widow's estate would probably be very beneficial to the community. That, however, is a matter for the legislation.

Following Sundar v. Salig Ram (1), I hold that the suit was not barred by limitation and I return it for decision on the merits. Of course, it may be that the consent of Hans or the near reversioner living at the time, if given in good faith, may be a bar to the suit, but this matter and other matters must be decided by the lower Court according to law Judgment announced.

Case remanded.

NAGENDRA LAL CHOWDHURY—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT

versus

Srimati RAJA BIBI AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), s. 75—Limitation, special—"Exacted", meaning of—Suit for refund of excess amount realised by landlord without claiming penalty—Limitation applicable to suit—Limitation Act (XV of 1877), Sch. II, Art. 14—Patni Regulation (VIII of 1819), s. 14—Collector's power to determine summarily rent of tenure then payable—No power to determine rent payable in future.

NAGENDRA LAL CHOWDHURY v. RAJA BIBI.

The plaintiffs alleged that they held a patni taluq on payment of certain money rent to the defendants, but that the latter took proceedings under the Patni Regulation for realisation of the value of certain paddy rents which, they said, were payable for the taluq, and the plaintiffs, in order to save their tenure from sale, deposited the amount claimed by the defendants. The plaintiffs accordingly sued for a declaration that the taluq bore money rent and not paddy rent, and for refund of the amount realised from them in excess of the proper rent:

Held, (1) that the suit was not barred by the special limitation prescribed by section 75 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, as that section had no application to the suit: first, because the excess rent realised from the plaintiff in proceedings under the Patni Regulations could not be said to have been exacted by the zemindars within the meaning of the section, which evidently contemplated exactions by means other than process of law; and secondly, because the section did not take away the right of a person, from whom rent had been realised in excess, to recover such excess amount from the landlord, apart from the provisions of the section, within the ordinary period of limitation;

(2) that the suit was not barred under Article 14 of the Limitation Act, because under section 14 of the Patni Regulation the Collector could make only a summary investigation if the talukdar contested the zemindar's demand for any arrear, that the determination of what was the rent payable for the tenure in future was beyond the scope of the Collector's power, and that the plaintiffs did not require to set aside any act or order of the Collector.

Raghu Nath Prasad v. Kaniz Rasul, 24 A. 467; A. W. N. (1902) 116 and Parbati Nath Dutt v. Raj Mohun Dutt, 29 C. 367; 6 C. W. N. 92, distinguished.

Section 75 merely enables a tenant to recover from his landlord certain penalty in addition to the amount or value of what is exacted, if the suit is brought within six months from the date of exaction, and the limitation provided by the section does not bar a suit to recover the excess amount where no penalty is claimed.

JUDGMENT.

N. CHATTERJEA, J.—The plaintiffs-respondents hold certain permanent taluqs under the defendants-appellants who are the zemindars. The plaintiffs alleged that they hold the taluks on payment of certain money rents to the defendants; but that the latter took proceedings under Regulation VIII of 1819 in two successive years for realisation of the value of certain paddy rents which they said were payable for the taluks, and the plaintiffs in order to save their tenures from sale deposited the amount which the defendants claimed as the rents payable. The plaintiffs accordingly sued for a declaration that the taluks bear money rents as stated in the plaints, and not paddy rents, and for refund of the amount realised from them in excess of the proper rent under the proceedings under Regulation VIII of 1819.

Both the Courts below have decreed the suits, and the defendants have appealed to this Court, and the only question raised in these appeals is whether the suits are barred by limitation.

It is contended on behalf of the appellants that the suits are barred by the special limitation prescribed by section 75 of the Bengal Tenancy Act and by Articles 14, 91, 92 and 93 of the general Limitation Act.

We are of opinion that section 75 of the Bengal Tenancy Act has no application to these suits for two reasons: first, because the excess rent realised from the plaintiffs in the proceedings under the Patni Regulation cannot be said to have been exacted by the zemindars within the meaning of section 75 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, which evidently contemplates exactions by means other than process of law, and secondly, because the section does not take away the right of a person, from whom rent has been realised in excess, to recover such excess amount from the landlord apart from the provisions of the section within the ordinary period of limitation. The section merely enables a tenant to recover from his landlord certain penalty in addition to the amount or value of what is exacted, if the suit is brought within six months from the date of the exaction, and we are of opinion that the limitation provided by the section does not bar a suit to recover the excess amount where no penalty is claimed.

We are also of opinion that Articles 91, 92 and 93 of the Limitation Act do not bar these suits. It appears that the defendants produced certain unregistered kabuliats before the Collector which showed that the paddy rents were payable for the tenures. The Courts below have held that these kabuliats were not genuine. It has been contended on behalf of the appellant that the plaintiffs cannot get the declaration that money rents are payable for the tenures without setting aside the kabuliats or getting them declared as forgeries. But even assuming that it is necessary for the plaintiffs to do so in order to succeed in these suits, there is nothing to show that the facts entitling the plaintiffs to have the kabuliats cancelled or set aside were known to them more than three years before the suits were instituted. On the contrary, the facts found in the case go to show that the plaintiffs became aware of the kabuliats for the first time when they were produced before the Collector in 1905, and the suits were instituted in February 1907. The suits, therefore, cannot be barred by Article 91, and for similar reasons, they cannot be barred by Articles 92 and 93 of the Limitation Act.

Then as to Article 14 of the Limitation Act—so far as the suits are for declaration that money rents as stated in the plaints and not paddy rents are payable for the tenures, we think the suits do not come under Article 14. Under section 14 of the Patni Regulation, the Collector has power to make only a summary investigation if the talukdar contests the zemindar's demand of any arrear as specified in the notice advertised. The determination of what is the rent payable for a tenure is beyond the scope of the Collector's power. It may be that the Collector, in order to determine whether the zemindar's demand of the arrears is correct or not, has to consider the rent payable, but the investigation and his award have reference only to the particular demand and he has no power to decide what is the rent payable for the tenure in future. In these particular cases, the Collector did not come to any clear finding as to what was the rent payable, and merely directed the amount deposited to be paid over to the zemindar. But, even if it be held that he did so by implication, we are of opinion that his order merely amounts to a finding that the demand of arrears for the particular period was correct and cannot stand in the way of a suit for a declaration as to the proper rent payable for the tenures.

We accordingly hold that Article 14 of the Limitation Act does not apply to the suits in so far as a declaration is sought that the rents payable for the tenures were money rents as stated in the plaints.

The next question is whether Article 14 applies to the suits in so far as the plaintiffs seek a refund of the amounts realised by the zemindar under the Collector's order. The plaintiffs do not in express terms seek to set aside any act or order of an Officer of Government in his official capacity, but if it is necessary to set such an order aside before the plaintiffs can get a refund of the money, the mere fact that plaintiffs have not prayed for the setting aside of the order would not prevent the application of Article 14. We have, therefore, to see whether it is necessary for the plaintiffs to get the order of the Collector set aside in order to get a refund of the excess amount realised by the zemindar under the Collector's order.

Now, the award of the Collector under section 14 of the Patni Regulation is passed only after a summary investigation into the zemindar's demand if the talukdar contests it, and merely regulates the "ulterior process" as laid down in that Regulation. That section provides that if the summary investigation be not disposed of before the date fixed for the sale and the amount demanded by the zemindar is not deposited, the sale will not be estopped and the only remedy left to the talukdar is to bring a regular suit for reversal of the sale and for damages. Where, however, the award is made before the date of the sale, we think the zemindar takes the amount under the award of the Collector, subject to the liability to a civil suit. The Collector's award may be based upon a kabuliat which is contested by the talukdar (as in the present case) and when the patnidar succeeds in getting the kabuliat declared invalid in a suit, in the Civil Court, the basis of the Collector's order is gone. The Collector's order, in its nature, is merely provisional and made for a particular purpose, viz., for determining in a summary way the amount on payment of which the sale is to be prevented under the Regulation and is not a conclusive adjudication of the amount which may be justly due from the talukdar and the determination of which may depend upon matters which may be beyond the powers of the Collector to adjudicate, and which must, therefore, be adjudicated upon in a suit such as the present. There is no provision for setting aside such an award, and we are of opinion that the award of the Collector is no impediment to bringing a regular suit to contest the demand of the zemindar and there is no necessity for setting aside such an award.

NAGENDRA LAL CHOWDHURY v. RAJA BIBI.

The learned Pleader for the appellant relied upon the case of Raghu Nath Prasad v. Kaniz Rasul (1). In that case, a sale took place in execution of a decree, which had been transferred to the Collector under the provisions of section 320 of the Civil Procedure Code, which was, however, set aside by the Collector on the application of the judgment-debtor and the Collector's order was confirmed on appeal by the Commissioner. The auction-purchaser brought a suit to have the sale in her favour confirmed more than a year after the Collector's order was passed, and it was held that inasmuch as the plaintiff's claim involved the setting aside of the Collector's order setting aside the sale, the suit was barred by Article 14. But the Collector's order setting aside the sale could be set aside by a suit, and so long as that order was not set aside, a suit could not be maintained for having the sale confirmed. That case is, therefore, distinguishable from the present.

The other case relied on, Parbati Nath Dutt v. Raj Mohun Dutt (2), is also distinguishable. In that case, a party to a proceeding before the Collector under the Estates Partition Act (VIII of 1876) contended that certain land measured as part of the estate under partition was not part of that estate but appertained to his howla. The Revenue Authorities, however, decided the question against him under section 116 of the Act, and it was held that a suit brought by him after one year from the date of the order for a declaration that the disputed land was part of his howla, was barred by Article 14 of the Limitation Act But, as pointed out in that case, the order under section 116 which was binding on the plaintiff could not be set aside except as provided by section 150, and section 150 provided that any person aggrieved by an order under section 116 may bring a suit to modify it or set it aside and Article 14 of the Limitation Act prescribes a period of one year for the bringing of such a suit. That case, therefore, is also distinguishable but it may be noted that in a later case Shyama Sundari Dasya v. Mahomed Zarip (3), the learned Judges declined to express any opinion upon the question whether the case of Parbati Nath Dutt v. Raj Mohun Dutt (2) is or is not open to criticism even with reference to the provisions of Estates Partition Act.

On the whole, we are of opinion that the claim for refund of the excess amounts realised by the defendants in the proceedings under the Patni Regulation is not barred by Article 14 of the Limitation Act, and that the suits are not barred by limitation on any of the grounds urged on behalf of the appellant.

The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

RICHARDSON, J.—I concur generally with my learned brother.

The only real difficulty is whether Article 14 of the Schedule to the Limitation Act is applicable to any of the reliefs claimed in the suit. As to that Article, I agree in the first place that the Collector's order in its scope was confined to the particular demand with which the order dealt and that the present suit, as a suit for the determination of the true conditions of the contract between the patnidar, plaintiffs and the zemindar defendants, is certainly not subject to the limitation prescribed by the Article and is within time.

On the other point which arises in this connection, I also agree though not without hesitation. The sum deposited by a talukdar under section 14 of the Patni Regulation is deposited merely for the purpose of preventing the threatened sale and regard being had to the language of the section, I am disposed to concur in the view that whether the amount is in whole or in part ultimately paid over to the zemindar or returned to the talukdar, the Collector's order in relation to the question which party has a better right to the money is not within the purview of Article 14. The order determines that no sale shall take place. For that purpose, it is final and conclusive subject to such further proceedings as it may be open to either party to take in the Civil Courts. That being the nature of the order and the function which it serves, it seems unnecessary to have it set aside as a preliminary to the recovery of the money by means of a civil suit brought by the party other than the party to whom it is returned or paid over. In other words, the order raises no barrier which must be removed before such a suit can be instituted.

Appeal dismissed.

Estoppel—Vendor denying his title—Possession not permissive—Question of fact—Revision—Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 115.

That a certain person's possession is not permissive is a finding of fact and, consequently, cannot be questioned in revision.

A person selling a property is not estopped from denying the correctness of his title so far as the claim of a third person is concerned, but such a vendor is not to be trusted when he is playing the vendee false by supporting that claim.

Petition, under section 70 (a) of Act XVIII of 1884, as amended by Act XXV of 1899, for revision of the order of the District Judge, Ludhiana, dated the 4th day of January 1912, reversing that of the Munsif, 1st class, Ludhiana, dated the 26th day of October 1911, decreeing the claim.

Pandit Ram Bhaj Datta, for the Petitioner.

Mr. Nihal Chand Mehra, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—There are two clear facts in this case:—

(1) That plaintiff's uncle was owner of the house in 1850.

(2) That subsequently Narain Das, patwari, occupied the house for some years and then died and was succeeded in occupation by his widowed daughter-in-law.

Now the patwari's brothers have sold the house to Prem Singh and Partab Singh, and plaintiff claims possession.

The first Court held that the patwari and his daughter-in-law had occupied with plaintiff's permisson. When, I admitted this case to a hearing I was under the impression that the District Judge had not upset this finding, but on re-consideration I find that he has not agreed with the first Court. Taking the witnesses produced by the plaintiff seriatim, he refuses for various reasons to rely on any of them. The patwari's brothers are, he says, estopped from denying the correctness of their title. I do not agree with this, but I certainly think their evidence is not to be trusted, for according to themselves they have sold a house in which they had no rights and are now playing the vendees false by supporting the plaintiff.

I am unable on revision to upset findings of fact. Taking it then that the plaintiff has failed to prove that the possession of the patwari and Musammat Ananti was with permission of the plaintiff, I think the District Judge is right in holding that plaintiff has failed to prove an existing title.

I dismiss this application but pass no order as to costs.

Reversioner—Declaratory suit—Offer to pay—Conditional decree.

In suits by reversioners regarding the alienations of widows, the uncertainty, regarding the person who would be entitled to succeed the widow, is no ground for refusing a declaration regarding the character of the alienation. When the alienation is declared invalid there is no reason why a charge should not be declared in favour of the alienee on equitable grounds for the amount for which necessity has been proved. It is not necessary that there should be an offer in the plaint before a conditional decree can be passed and the alienee given a charge for the amount.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Kistna at Ellore in Appeal Suit No. 426 of 1910, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif of Tanuku, in O. S. No. 674 of 1909.

JUDGMENT.

SUNDARA AIYAR, J.—This is a suit by a Hindu reversioner for a declaration that two sales made by the widow of the last owner, the 1st defendant in the suit, to the 2nd and 3rd defendants, respectively, are not valid beyond the life-time of the widow. The sales were admittedly made for the discharge of the widow's husband's debts. The attack against them was based on the ground that the prices settled for the sales were very inadequate. Both the lower Courts have dismissed the suit on the ground that the plaintiff not having offered to pay to the purchasers the consideration money which was used for the discharge of the husband's debts, the suit is not maintainable. The decision is rested on the authority of Singam Setti Sanjivi Kondayya v. Draupadi Bayanna (1). That case, no doubt, supports the proposition that such an offer should be made by the party seeking to set aside a sale. But the decision of the Privy Council in Bhagwat Dayal Singh v. Debi Dayal Sahu (2) is authority for the position that the suit should not fail on the mere ground of the absence of an offer in the plaint and that a conditional decree might be passed. The case before the Privy Council was one in which the suit was instituted after the death of the alienor and the plaintiff was entitled to possession at the time of the suit. There can be no doubt that a reversioner suing for possession after the death of the widow can only get a decree on condition of paying whatever portion of consideration for the sale by the widow is held to be binding on the estate. In Singam Setti Sanjivi Kondayya v. Droupadi Bayanna (1), two decisions of the Bengal High Court are relied on. In one of them, Mutteeram Kowar v. Gopaul Sahoo (3), the suit was instituted after the reversioner had become entitled to possession, and there can be no doubt that he could not claim a decree except on condition of paying the amount. The case probably went too far in laying down that there should be an offer in the plaint to make payment of any amount that was binding on the reversioners. The other case is Phool Chund Lall v. Rughoobuns Suhaye (4). It was decided in 1867, before the enactment of the Specific Relief Act, section 42 of which lays down the conditions under which declaratory decrees might be granted. One of the illustrations to that section shows that a Hindu reversioner might institute a suit for a declaration that a transaction entered into by a Hindu widow is not binding on the reversioner. According to the new view of the Privy Council in Isri Dut Koer v. Musammat Hansbutti Koerain (5), a decision in a suit instituted by one reversioner may not be binding on another person who may happen to be the actual reversioner when the widow dies; see also Musamma Chand Kour v. Partab Singh (6). But there can be no doubt that notwithstanding this inconvenience a suit by a presumptive reversioner at the time of the alienation for a declaration of its invalidity is maintainable. In Phool Chund Lall v. Rughoobuns Suhaye (4), the judgment was partly rested on the ground that the plaintiff did not ask that the Court should put the vendee (alienee) in the same position as if he had obtained a mortgage for the amount which was binding on the reversioner. This suggests that the Court might declare the sale invalid but at the same time declare that the vendee has a charge for the portion of the consideration paid by him which is binding on the reversioner. Sir Barnes Peacock, no doubt, points out that a declaration that a reversioner may obtain possession on the death of the widow on condition of paying a certain sum of money ought not to be made because the plaintiff who institutes a suit for declaring an alienation invalid may not survive the widow and it would be optional with the actual reversioner, who becomes entitled to the estate on the widow's death, to recover possession or not, but, as already observed, this inconvenience arising from the fact that the plaintiff may not be the actual reversioner who succeeds the widow exists equally whether the decree is one altogether setting aside or upholding a sale or one pronouncing it invalid as a sale but declaring a charge in favour of the alienee. The law as to declaratory suits was not the same when Phool Chund Lall v. Rughoobuns Suhaye (4) was decided as it has been after the enactment of the Specific Relief Act. And the decision in that case, therefore, cannot safely be relied on in cases arising under the present Act. In Mahomed Shamsool Hooda v. Shewakram (7), where a person having a reversion sued to set aside a sale made by a life-owner, their Lordships of the Privy Council felt no difficulty in passing a decree that on the death of the life-owner, the plaintiff would be entitled to possession on payment of the portion of consideration for the sale which was binding on him. Their Lordships did not decide whether the estate would on the death of the life-owner pass to any one as the owner of a vested reversion or to the person entitled to succeed under the Hindu Law as reversioner on the termination of the life-estate. That decision, therefore, would be authority for the position that even if the reversioner has no vested interest, a decree might be passed that the reversioner would be entitled to possession of the property after the death of the life-owner on his complying with certain conditions whatever that may be. It is difficult, having regard to the ruling of the Privy Council in Isri Dut Koer v. Musammat Hansbutti Koerain (5), that the uncertainty regarding the person who would be entitled to succeed the widow, is a ground for refusing a declaration regarding the character of the alienation; and if an alienation may be declared to be altogether valid or altogether invalid notwithstanding the uncertainty about the reversion, there seems to be no apparent reason why a declaration should not be made that the alienation is invalid as a whole but that on equitable grounds the alienee should have a charge declared in his favour. In Gobind Singh v. Baldeo Singh (8), a decree was given declaring that the reversioner would be entitled to possession on payment of a certain sum of money which was binding on the reversioner. The proper form of the decree, however, would appear to be to make merely a declaration that the alienee has a charge for a certain sum of money. The question whether a decree in such a form could not be passed was not considered in Singam Setti Sanjivi Kondayya v. Draupadi Bayanna (1). The decrees of the lower Courts must be reversed and the suit remanded to the Court of first instance for fresh disposal according to law. Costs up to date will abide the result.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—It is now settled law that a widow inheriting the husband's estate obtains only a qualified interest in her husband's properties. It is further settled law that the nearest contingent reversioners can bring suits attacking the widow's alienations in her life-time. To say under these circumstances that the suit of an honest reversioner, who admits that the alienation was partially justified, should be at once dismissed as a suit for a conditional declaration while a suit by a dishonest reversioner, who seeks to have the alienation wholly declared void as against the reversioner, should be tried to the end seems to be anomalous. On principle, I do not see why a declaration that a sale is wholly void should be treated on a better footing than a declaration that the sale is void as a sale and can only be treated as a charge for a certain amount on the property alienated. The very object of allowing a suit by a contingent reversioner has been unfortunately (if I may be permitted to say so) defeated to a very large extent by the decisions which are binding on us to the effect that a decree passed in favour of or against such a reversioner is not binding on a remoter reversioner. I might be permitted to hope that the Legislature should see fit to enact that the decree in a suit bona fide brought and litigated by the then nearest reversioner is binding on the remoter reversioners. In the result, I concur in the decree proposed by my learned brother.

Musammat JAWALA DEVI—RESPONDENT.

Custom—Hindu Law—Alienation—Gift by widow of Sarin Khatri of Lahore of her husband's estate in favour of his daughter—Incompetency of reversioners to challenge gift.

Among Sarin Khatris of Nayar got of Lahore emigrated from Kunjah in the Gujrat District, no special custom, contrary to Hindu Law, exists by which collaterals exclude daughters. All Sarin khatris of Lahore City follow Hindu Law in matters of succession.

KARORI MAL v. JAWALA DEVI.

Amin Chand v. Ghasita Mal, 143 P. R. 1882; followed.

As by Hindu Law a daughter is an heir, a gift by a widow of a Sarin Khatri of Lahore of her husband's separate moveable and immoveable property in favour of his daughter, cannot be challenged by his collaterals, as it simply amounts to an acceleration of succession.

Barkat Ram v. Jagat Ram, 249 P.W.R. 1912; 17 Ind. Cas. 379, followed.

First appeal from the order of the District Judge, Lahore, dated the 23rd day of December 1895, dismissing plaintiff's suit.

Messrs. Madan Gopal and Jaishi Ram, for the Appellant.

Mr. K. P. Roy, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—Kanhya Lal, a Sarin Khatri of Lahore, died some 25 years ago, leaving moveable and immoveable property valued at Rs. 20,000. On 1st November 1882, the widows executed a gift of the whole estate in favour of his daughter. Plaintiff sues for a decree declaring that the gift shall not affect his reversionary rights.

The District Judge has held that by Hindu Law the daughter and daughter's son are the heirs of Kanhya Lal and that plaintiff has failed to prove any custom on the subject, that Hindu Law is, therefore, binding on the parties, and that the gift has surely accelerated the succession, and that plaintiff, therefore, has no right of suit. This was the main ground on which the District Judge dismissed the suit. Plaintiff appeals and his Counsel puts forward the argument that the custom binding on the parties, is not the custom of the Khatris of Lahore, not even the custom of the Sarin Khatris of Lahore, but the custom of the Sarins of got Nayar of Kunjah in the Gujrat District—plaintiff's great-grandfather emigrated from there and the family has been living in Lahore for three generations. The Sarin Khatris are a large tribe, long dwelling in Lahore, and a Mohalla is named after them. The evidence shows that there are more than 50 gots of Sarins in Lahore, and if every got is to set up the customs of its place of origin, there will be no custom of the Sarins of Lahore. It will require very strong proof that a family residing in Lahore for three or four generations, like plaintiff, had not adopted the custom of the Sarins of Lahore. Not only is there no evidence on the point, but the point was never raised, till now, neither in the pleadings, nor in the evidence, nor in the grounds of appeal, and what is more, plaintiff himself said:—"The customs of Sarin Khatris of Lahore are the customs we observe." We, therefore, hold that plaintiff is bound by the customs of the Sarin Khatris of Lahore.

The question then arises, do the Sarin Khatris follow a different custom from the other Khatris of Lahore? Objection has been taken that plaintiff had not sufficient opportunity to prove the custom of the Sarin tribe, but, we think that he had full opportunity.

On 20th July 1895, before Mr. Robinson plaintiff alleged that the custom of his subdivision was not the same as of other Khatris of Lahore, and was given 17th August to prove this.

On 17th August, plaintiff's Pleader said he was prepared to prove that according to the custom of the tribe to which he belongs, a daughter does not succeed in presence of a nephew, but urged that this was not the real issue, and wanted this point argued whether that was the real issue.

Mr. Robinson rejected this contention and recorded plaintiff's evidence, and on 17th August after the evidence of seven witnesses was recorded, plaintiff said he would only call one more witness, who was subsequently examined by commission. Plaintiff, therefore, had full opportunity of producing all his evidence.

On the question whether the Sarins have a different custom from other Khatris, we notice that Mr. Grey for plaintiff in his replication did not take up any definite position. He said:—"Our claim is based on the Hindu Law and Custom."

Paira Mall, witness No. 1 for plaintiff, says that Sarins (he is one himself) are governed by law and not by custom.

Amir Chand, witness No. 2 for plaintiff, says he knows nothing about custom relating to succession of collaterals in presence of daughters.

Puran Chand, witness No. 3 for plaintiff, says collaterals exclude daughters. The daughter of his uncle Davi Dial is married to plaintiff. He gave four instances, but they all broke down on analysis. In fact, none of the instances given by plaintiff has stood analysis as showing the collaterals exclude daughters, and in the case of plaintiff's own family, it is shown that the daughters of Bishan Das and Har Kishen (vide genealogical tree) inherited the houses of their fathers in presence of collaterals.

Pandit Bhan Dutt, witness No 6, says among Khatris, all Khatris follow the same custom, as to succession.

Diwan Raj Kumar, witness No. 8, says I cannot say that the custom of our brotherhood is different from that of the other class of Khatris.

We hold that plaintiff has failed to prove that the Sarins follow a different custom from the other Khatris of Lahore.

With regard to the custom of the Khatris of Lahore, Amichand v. Ghasita Mal (1) is in favour of the daughters, and still more so the case of Dass Mall v. Mai Malawi, decided by Mr. R. Clark, District Judge, on 13th December 1884. It is argued that there is no initial presumption that high caste Hindus in towns are bound by law rather than custom and a large array of authority is quoted in support of this proposition.

However that may be, it lies on plaintiff to prove the custom and heavily so in the face of the judgments referred to above.

We find that plaintiff has failed to prove any custom either among Khatris or Sarin Khatris or got Nayar of Sarin Khatris by which collaterals exclude daughters.

It is next argued that even granting that collaterals are excluded by daughters and daughters' sons, it is still open to plaintiff to sue for the declaration and authority is quoted in support of this contention. As regards the Punjab cases quoted, we do not think that cases of agriculturists following the Customary Law are in point. The rights of collaterals in respect of land under the Customary Law are peculiar and cannot be applied to persons bound by Hindu Law. On this question, we are bound to follow the Full Bench ruling of this Court, Barkat Ram v. Jagat Ram (2).

The question referred was:—"Whether the plaintiffs, the nephews of Dhari Mal, are entitled to bring a suit against the defendant to contest his adoption by Dhari Mal in view of the fact that the defendant, even if held not to be the adopted son of Dhari Mal, is, as the son of Dhari Mal's daughter, entitled to succeed to Dhari Mal's estate as full proprietor on the death of the (defendant's) mother."

The answer of the Full Bench was in the negative. There is this difference in the two cases that there was a case to set aside adoption and this is a case to set aside a gift, but we hold that on the principles laid down in that case, plaintiff is not entitled to bring this suit. Our view of the case obviates the necessity of going into the question of limitation

We dismiss the appeal with costs. Pleader's fee Rs. 250.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 146—Representative of decree-holder—Transferee of decree-holder's interest during pendency of suit, whether can execute decree.

M. sued for the recovery of some immoveable property. By a compromise, M. was awarded a portion of the property. Before a decree could be passed in terms of the compromise, M. transferred his interest in the property to A. A. did not apply to bring himself on the record. After the decree was passed, A. applied to execute the decree as representative of M.:

Held, that he was not a representative within the meaning of section 146 of the Code of Civil Procedure and, as his name was not on the record, he could not execute the decree.

Execution second appeal from the decision of the District Judge of Ghazipur, dated 8th of May 1912.

Mr. Gobind Prashad, for the Appellant.

Mr. Muhammad Ishaq, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—One Muhammad Said sued for some immoveable property. On February 2nd, 1911, a compromise was arrived at according to which Muhammad Said became entitled to a part of the property. On February 21st, 1911, he transferred to one Altaf Husain all the property to which he was entitled under the compromise. Altaf Husain did not apply to the Court to enter his name on the record in place of that of Muhammad Said and on March 25th, 1911, a decree was passed on the compromise in favour of Muhammad Said. Altaf Husain has now applied to execute the decree. The Munsif rejected the application; but the District Judge reversed his order. Hence this appeal. There is no doubt that Altaf Husain ought to have taken steps to have his name entered in the record of the case. But it is urged on his behalf that he is the representative of Muhammad Said and that the District Judge was right in regarding him as the transferee of the decree. It seems to me that it is impossible to treat Altaf Husain as transferee of the decree for the document on which he relies was executed before the decree was passed. His learned Vakil falls back on section 146 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that where any proceeding may be taken or application made by or against any person, then the proceeding may be taken or the application may be made by or against any person claiming under him. This section appears to me to be irrelevant. It was evidently intended to apply to the case of a representative who has succeeded to the position of the person whom he claims to represent. Altaf Husain has not acquired the rights of a decree-holder and I must hold that the application for execution cannot be maintained by him. I allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court and restore that of the Court of first instance with costs here and in the two lower Courts.

Appeal allowed.

Instalment-bond—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 14, Sch. I, Arts. 74, 75 120—Non-payment of instalments not amounting to default—Waiver—Evidence Act (I of 1872), s. 115—Estoppel—Inconsistent action in Court.

In a dispute between plaintiff and defendant as regards their shares in a particular business, the matter was referred to arbitration; an award was passed by which the defendants executed, on 12th December 1904 to plaintiff, an instalment bond payable by monthly instalments. The bond also provided that if the amounts of three instalments be allowed to fall into arrear, the balance of principal and interest then due would at once be recoverable without reference to the instalments. The defendants paid the instalment till May 1906. The instalment for May was returned by the plaintiff as also that for June. In August, the plaintiff filed a suit to set aside the award but the award was upheld by the first Court on 26th February 1908 and by the Appellate Court on the 19th January 1910.* In the course of the appeal, plaintiff's Vakil applied to the Court that a decree for the unpaid instalments on the promissory-note might be given. The defendants, through their Vakil, stated they did not deny their liability to pay and that they had always been ready and willing to pay and got the application rejected. After the termination of the appeal, the plaintiffs brought this suit for the recovery of the instalments due under the pro-note. Defendants contended that the amount was barred by limitation under Article 75:

Held, (1) that in the circumstances, there was no default by the defendants in paying the instalments of May, June or July or subsequently before the suit, which could have caused the whole amount to be due:

(2) that there had also been waiver by the plaintiff of the condition that on failure of payment of three instalments, the whole should become due;

(3) that time would run under section 74 of the Limitation Act from the due date of each instalment;

(4) that section 14 of the Limitation Act would not enable the plaintiff to deduct the period, during which he had been conducting the previous suit and appeal, in computing the period of limitation because there was no defect of jurisdiction or any other cause of a like nature and the cause of action was not the same;

(5) that the defendants were estopped, by reason of what passed when the Appellate Court's judgment was being delivered in the previous suit, from setting up this bar of limitation;

(6) that the plaintiffs were entitled to interest on the instalments due as there was nothing that amounted to a true legal tender of those instalments.

Section 115 of the Evidence Act is by no means an exhaustive exposition of the law of estoppel.

A person, who, without mistake induced by the opposite party, has taken a particular position deliberately in the course of a litigation, must act consistently with it; and this principle will apply to a suit other than the one in which the action is taken, where the second suit grows out of the judgment in the first.

Mr. T. R. Ramachandra Iyer, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. C. P. Ramaswami Iyer, for the Defendants.

JUDGMENT.—This is a suit instituted by the plaintiff to recover certain instalments due on a bond which was executed in his favour by the defendants under an award made in a dispute between the plaintiff and the defendants as to the share which he was entitled to in their business. Under the award, the defendants executed a promissory-note, which is Exhibit A, dated 12th December 1904, by which the sum of Rupees thirty thousand (Rs. 30,000) only, with interest at 9 per cent. per annum, was payable by monthly instalments of Rs. 1,000, the first instalment being due on the 15th January 1905, and each instalment being payable with interest on the unpaid portion of the principal. If the amount of three instalments be allowed to fall into arrears, the balance of principal and interest then due shall at once be recoverable without reference to the aforesaid provision for instalments.

The defendants duly paid the instalments under the bond including the instalment of May 1906. But the cheque they sent was returned to them.

Then they wrote to the plaintiff a letter, Exhibit C, dated 13th May 1906, inquiring the reasons for the refusal; and in answer to that, the plaintiff's Solicitors wrote Exhibit D of the 22nd May 1906, in which they said that the whole settlement was a fraud upon the plaintiff and that he was not going to be bound by it. Again, in June 1906, the defendants appear to have tendered the instalment for that month which was returned to them and in July they wrote the letter—Exhibit E—mentioning that previous two instalments have been returned and asked whether the plaintiff "would not in future receive payments tendered for the instalments of the bond. So that we may cease to go through the farce of sending a cheque every month only to be returned." To that letter, they received no answer but in the following month, a suit was filed by the plaintiff to set aside the whole award and recover the share of the business, to which he claimed to be entitled. That suit was eventually dismissed by a decree of the Appellate Court, confirming the decree of this Court. Then the plaintiff demanded the payment which was due to him under the instalment note but payment was refused; when the present suit was filed, the defendants pleaded that the claim had become barred by limitation. Now the plaintiff contends in this suit, in the first place, that the suit had not become barred either wholly, or in part, both of which contentions were urged by the defendants.

Secondly, the plaintiff says that the defendants are estopped from raising this contention by reason of what passed in Court on the delivery of the judgment of the Appellate Court.

I will deal with the question of limitation first. The defendants contended that they had made default in payment of the instalment in May 1906, that thereupon under the note, the whole sum had become due and that under Article 75 of the Limitation Act the whole claim was barred. Now Article 75 is not quite in the same form in the present Act as in the Act of 1877, because in the Act of 1877 it was:—"On a promissory-note or bond payable by instalments which provides that if default be made in payment of one instalment the whole shall become due" whereas in the present Act it is "If default be made in payment of one or more instalments, the whole shall become due." The present wording applies accurately to the present note which provides that the whole shall become due only in the event of three instalments being in arrear. Now the date from which time begins to run is when the first default is made unless the payee waives the benefit of the provision and then when fresh default is made in respect of which there is no such waiver. In the present case, I am entirely unable to accept the contention of the defendants, which they now raise for their own purpose, that they committed any defaul in May, June, or July or subsequently before suit, which could have caused the whole to be due. The evidence shows that they made payments both in May and June and inquired again whether there would be any use making a payment in July to which the plaintiff had chosen to return no answer and for this reason, that he was prosecuting a claim which was altogether inconsistent with the acceptance of this bond and possibly feared that he might in some way be damaging his position in the other litigation if he did accept. I hold that there is the clearest evidence of waiver by the plaintiff of the condition, that on failure of payment of three instalments, the whole should become due. And I hold further, that until the institution of this suit which followed very closely on the judgment of the Appellate Court, there never had been any failure to pay three instalments which was not waived, I hold that Article 75 is inapplicable, as there was no default which was not waived. There was a great deal of argument whether if you take the Article in its old form, it would apply to the case; whichever form you take, I hold that Article 75 does not apply, because there has been no failure, to pay three instalments which was not waived. If that be so, then it seems to me Article 74 must apply and if Article 74 applies, then, on a promissory-note where payment is made by instalments, time begins to run upon the expiration of the first payment as to the part and as to the other parts on the expiration of the respective terms of payment. It is admitted, I think, if this Article applies, the suit is not barred as to the payments for February, March, April, May and June, five instalments, so that, in any event, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover five instalments.

Mr. Ramachandra Aiyar addressed me several ingenious arguments with a view of taking this case not only out of Article 75 but also out of Articles 74, 80 and 115 with a view of bringing it under Article 120. I am not going to deal with these Articles beyond saying that he did not succeed in convincing me. He also contended that the suit was a suit under section 14 of the Limitation Act on the ground that the time during which the plaintiff was prosecuting his case in the other suit ought not to count. But section 14, to my mind, does not refer to such a case as this. It says:—"In computing the period of limitation prescribed for any suit, the time during which the plaintiff has been prosecuting with due diligence another civil proceeding, whether in a Court of first instance, or in a Court of Appeal, against the defendant, shall be excluded where the proceeding is founded upon the same cause of action and is prosecuted in good faith in a Court which, from defect of jurisdiction, or other cause of a like nature, is unable to entertain it." The Court is not unable to entertain that suit from defect of jurisdiction or other cause of a like nature and that suit was not, in my judgment, upon the same cause of action as the present suit and, therefore, that section has no applicability. There were various courses which were open to the plaintiff by which he could have prevented this suit from becoming barred as to any of the instalments. He might have received the payment under protest, or he might have simply asked for an acknowledgment of liability, or he might have sued for each instalment before it became barred and asked that the suit should be adjourned, pending the decision of the other suit. He did not choose to adopt any of these courses and, therefore, I am of opinion that there has been nothing to stop time from running under the Limitation Act.

It was further contended that there had been an acknowledgment within the meaning of section 19 of the Limitation Act in the affidavit Exhibit G, which was filed by one of the defendants. Paragraph 3 was relied on, but I cannot find any acknowledgment of liability. There is a mere recital that "the plaintiff had received instalments payable under the decision from 1904 to 1906."

I will now deal with the second part of the case, whether the defendants are estopped, by reason of what passed when the Appellate Court's judgment was being delivered, from setting up this bar of limitation at all. When judgment came to be delivered in the Appellate Court, confirming the decree of this Court dismissing the plaintiff's suit, his Vakil applied that at any rate, judgment might be given for him in that suit for the amount of the unpaid instalments on the promissory-note which is the subject of this suit. Now the defendants might have, perhaps did argue that it was not open to the Appellate Court in that suit to grant any such relief and that no such relief ought to have been granted. They did not, however, stop there. For the purpose of inducing the Appellate Court to reject that application, they stated, through their Vakil, that, to use the words of the judgment: "The defendants do not deny their liability to pay and they submit they have been always ready and willing to pay but they contend that no decree should be passed in this suit." Now it was perfectly open to the defendants to submit that no decree should be passed in that suit against them on this instalment bond. But was it open to them, for the purpose of getting that application rejected, to state to the Court that they did not deny their liability and had always been ready and willing to pay and then when they got the application rejected upon that basis, as soon as ever they were asked to pay, to turn round and plead that before that application had been made, the suit had become entirely barred? No precedent has been cited before me which exactly corresponds to this case, probably, I cannot help thinking, because rarely if ever have defendants taken so ill-advised a course as they have taken in this case. It seems to me that it would be a lamentable thing if it were open to parties to play fast and loose with the Court in this manner. It may very well be that if the defendants had made no admission at all, exactly the same result would have followed and the application would have been dismissed. But I am not the Appellate Court; I cannot put myself in their place. I cannot say what effect it might or might not have had upon the Court if no such admission had been made. I know that the admission was made in the defendant's interest with regard to the application then before the Court and that they authorized the eminent Vakil who appeared for them to make it, though even that is challenged in the pleadings. One knows very well that Mr. Sundara Iyer would never have made such an admission unless he had been authorized to make it. As I already said, I find myself in this position, that it is impossible for me to say whether the result of the application would have been the same if no such admission had been made.

Mr. Ramachandra Iyer endeavoured to bring this case within the wording of section 115 of the Evidence Act. I confess, I find some difficulty in following him. But that is by no means an exhaustive exposition of the law of estoppel. And in such a case as this, we can, with advantage, I think, refer to the very learned and authoritative treatise of Mr. Bigelow, a high authority not only in this but in other branches of law. In his treatise on the Law of Estoppel I find that he does not refer to any case precisely like this, because, as I am inclined to think happily, no such case could be found where parties had gone back in this unblushing way on the admissions, which they make to the Court—but the principles, which he lays down, appear to me to cover the case and if any precedent is wanted, I am prepared to make one. Now at page 717, Mr. Bigelow deals with what he calls "Inconsistent positions in Court" and he says:—"If parties in Court were permitted to assume inconsistent positions in the trial of their causes, the usefulness of Courts of Justice would in most cases be paralysed; the coercive process of the law available only between those who consented to its exercise could be set at naught by all. But the rights of all men, honest and dishonest, are in the keeping of the Courts, and consistency of proceeding is, therefore, required of all those who come or are brought before them. It may accordingly be laid down as a broad proposition that one who, without mistake induced by the opposite party, has taken a particular position deliberately in the course of a litigation must act consistently with it; one cannot play fast and loose. Thus, if Counsel seeks to amend his pleadings, and his request is granted upon a condition and the amendment made accordingly, he cannot thereafter object to the condition, supposing at all events that it was competent to him to accept it." Then he gives some other authority. He goes on to say that "the principle under consideration will apply to another suit than the one in which the action was taken, where the second suit grows out of the judgment in the first. It is laid down, that a defendant, who obtains judgment upon an allegation that a particular obstacle exists, cannot, in a subsequent suit, based upon such allegation, deny its truth." It appears to me that it would be opposed to good conscience to allow defendants who, for the purpose of resisting an application against them, have stated that they did not deny their liability and were always ready and willing to pay to turn round immediately afterwards and allege that long before the date of their admission, the suit had become barred by limitation. In my opinion, there must be a finding for the plaintiff on the 3rd issue, "Are the defendants estopped from denying their liability as alleged in paragraph 17-C of the plaint?" The result is that there must be a judgment for the plaintiff.

There is another question as to interest, namely, whether in view of the action of the plaintiff in returning the instalments, interest should run against him. It is not contended that there was anything that amounted to a true legal tender of these instalments and that being so, I must decide, following a decision of my own in which the point was discussed in Civil Suit No. 53 of 1907, that interest will continue to run. There must, therefore, be a judgment for the plaintiff for the amount claimed with interest and costs.

Plaint decreed.

Second appeal from a decree of the District Judge of Meerut, dated the 26th August 1911.

Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru, for the Appellant.

Dr. S. C. Banerji, for the Respondent

JUDGMENT.—This was a suit for redemption of a mortgage made in March 1908. The sum advanced was Rs. 900. The arrangement was that the mortgagor would pay the mortgagee twelve annual instalments of Rs. 100 and a thirteenth instalment of Rs. 50. In default of payment of any instalment, the whole was to become due with interest at two per cent. per mensem compounded yearly. The plaintiff, who purchased the property from the mortgagor in June 1910, sent the mortgagee Rs. 300 in September 1910 which the mortgagee accepted. The plaintiff followed this up with a tender of Rs. 950 in full discharge of the mortgage. This was refused and the present suit was brought on October 1st, 1910, the plaintiff paying Rs. 950 into Court. The first Court held that the mortgagee had waived his right to insist upon the penal clause and made a decree accordingly. On appeal, the District Judge held that there had been no waiver and he made a decree for redemption on payment of the principal sum with interest at two per cent. per mensem compounded yearly up to the date of suit and thereafter at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum. In this appeal, the first point taken is that the mortgagee must be deemed to have waived his right to insist on the penal clause. In my opinion, no waiver has been proved in this case. Before the mortgagee received the sum of Rs. 300, he had indicated in Court an intention to insist upon enforcing the penal clause. The plaintiff, when sending the money to the mortgagee, did not say that he was sending it on account of the first three instalments. He merely sent it on account of the mortgage. It cannot be held that the mortgagee, by accepting the money, waived his rights under the mortgage. The next point taken is that the amount of compensation awarded is unreasonable. In my opinion, it is most unreasonable to award, as the District Judge has in the present case, compensation at the rate of five times the interest originally agreed upon. But I cannot interfere. The question what is reasonable compensation is a question of fact. It was treated as a question of fact by the Madras High Court in Annamalai Chetty v. Veerabadram Chetty (1). The question is not unlike that considered by this Court in Musammat Dhuman v. Syed Abdulla Khan (2). The next point taken is that the lower Appellate Court should not have allowed on taxation the fee paid to the mortgagee's Pleader in the Court of first instance. The respondent does not resist the contention that this sum should be struck out. It is quite clear that the fee was paid long after the first hearing of the suit. The last ground of appeal fails in view of my decision that waiver has not been established. The result is, that this appeal is allowed in part. The amount of fee paid to the respondent's Pleader in the Court of first instance will be struck out. The parties will pay and receive costs in proportion to failure and success.

(1) 26 M. 111.

(2) 6 A. L. J. 381; 31 A. 333; 1 Ind. Cas. 760.

Second appeal from the decision of the Additional Judge of Bareilly, dated the 22nd of December 1911.

Mr. Govind Prashad, for the Appellants.
Mr. M. L. Agarwala, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—One Mool Chand was a co-sharer in the village of Sunderpur in the District of Bareilly. He died leaving him surviving five sons, one of whom was called Kundan. Kundan's share was sold in 1897 in execution of a decree against him and was purchased by one Basant Rai. The latter obtained symbolical possession through Court on 5th February 1898.

On the 31st of December 1898, on the verification of the khewat during the recent Settlement, Mool Chand's share was sub-divided into 200 shares and four shares only were allotted to Kundan. On the 25th of January 1910, Basant Rai executed a deed of sale in favour of Musammat Saraswati Kuar in respect of the share he had purchased at auction sale in 1897.

On the 28th of June 1910, Musammat Saraswati Kuar instituted the suit, out of which this appeal has arisen, for the recovery of $89\frac{1}{3}$ shares on the allegation that Kundan was entitled to $93\frac{1}{3}$ shares out of 200 shares of his father by right of inheritance and purchase at auction sale in execution of a decree against his father prior to 1897. It was further stated in the plaint that Basant Rai had purchased at auction sale of 1897 in execution of the decree against Kundan the entire share of the latter—that is $93\frac{1}{3}$ out of 200 shares, and had obtained and remained in possession and enjoyed profits of the share so purchased up to within a few years of the institution of the suit of Musammat Saraswati in spite of the order in the Settlement, awarding four shares only out of 200 to Kundan. The cause of action was, however, alleged to have accrued on 31st December 1898, the date of the erroneous order in the Settlement describing the share of Kundan as 4 out of 200. The suit was brought after the death of Kundan in the Court of the Munsif of Havali Bareilly against the mistress of Kundan, a brother of the latter, the widow of another brother, two transferees and Basant Rai, the auction-purchaser. The claim was resisted by all the defendants except Basant Rai. It was denied that Kundan had a larger share than what was allotted to him on the verification of the khewat or that he was a purchaser of any portion of his father's property in execution of a decree against the latter. It was also denied that Basant Rai had ever obtained actual possession of Kundan's share or had purchased and enjoyed the profits of anything more than what was allotted to Kundan on 31st December 1898, that is, 4 out of 200. The plea of limitation was also urged in bar of the claim. The learned Munsif found that Kundan was entitled to 66⅔ shares out of 200 shares and that Basant Rai had purchased 66⅔ shares at the auction sale in 1897. But as Basant Rai had obtained symbolical possession only and had not enjoyed profits of 66⅔ shares, the claim was barred as to 62⅔ shares having been brought more than 12 years after the delivery of symbolical possession but Saraswati preferred an appeal to the District Judge which was disposed of by the Additional Judge. The latter held that as the contesting defendants had set up adverse possession, it was for them to prove it and as they had failed to establish their plea of adverse possession, the claim was within time. The learned Additional Judge accepted the appeal and reversing the decree of the first Court decreed the claim for 62⅔ shares.

The contesting defendants have come up in second appeal to this Court. They contend that the onus lay on the plaintiff-respondent in the first instance to show that she had a subsisting title not barred by the law of limitation at the time of the institution of her suit. She had no such title. Her vendor obtained symbolical possession only and was never paid profits over more than four shares. Time began to run in respect of the 62⅔ shares in suit from the date of the delivery of symbolical possession to Basant Rai and the claim in respect of 62⅔ shares is barred. On behalf of the plaintiff-respondent, the argument is that the defendants appellants pleaded limitation presumably on the allegation of adverse possession and they must establish their plea. It is denied that time began to run in respect of 62⅔ shares in suit from the date of the delivery of symbolical possession to Basant Rai. He became by his purchase of Kundan's share a co-sharer with the defendants-appellants. The mere non-payment of profits of the entire share of Kundan to Basant Rai or the plaintiff-respondent, which is not admitted, would not render the possession of the rent-collecting co-sharers, the defendants-appellants, adverse. The admission that profits at least of four shares have been paid up to within a few years of the institution of the plaintiff-respondent's suit would in any case run limitation.

I think that the contention of the defendants-appellants must prevail both as regards the question of burden of proof and as to the date from which time should be calculated for the purpose of limitation.

It has been consistently held by this Court that when a suit for possession is met by a plea of adverse possession during the limitation period, the question of limitation becomes a question of title and the appellant must first furnish prima facie proof of subsisting title at the date of the commencement of his suit before the defendant is required to establish his adverse possession; Vide Parmanand Misr v. Sahib Ali (1); Inayat Husen v. Ali Husen (2); Mazhar Husain v. Behari Singh (3); Musafir Rai v. Musammat Laggan Barta Kuar (4).

The onus was, therefore, on the plaintiff-respondent to show by some prima facie evidence that she had a subsisting title not extinguished by the law of limitation at the time she brought the suit.

There is no evidence that Kundan was in possession of 66⅔ shares or that Basant Rai or the plaintiff-respondent had been paid within limitation profits on the 66⅔ shares.

The payment of profits on four shares only would not save limitation with regard to the remaining 62⅔ shares.

The case might perhaps have been different if the payment of profits on four shares had been in part payment of the profits of 66⅔ shares, in other words, if Kundan's right to 66⅔ shares had been conceded, or his possession within limitation over them proved and a portion of the profits only paid. The appellants have all along contended that all that Kundan got in his father's property was 4 shares out of 200 and that he was never in possession of anything more. Nor is there any evidence that Kundan was in possession of more than four shares. The contention that Basant Rai by his purchase of 1897 became a co-sharer with the appellants and that the mere non-payment of profits would not render the possession of the rent-collecting co-sharers adverse until an adverse right was asserted is not borne out by authority. The argument of the plaintiff-respondent overlooks two facts, namely, that only symbolical possession over the shares of Kundan was given to Basant Rai and that there is no evidence that Kundan was ever in possession within limitation of anything more than four shares. The fact that Kundan was legally entitled to more than four shares in his father's property would not affect the question of limitation. It has been held that when an auction-purchaser at a Court sale has obtained symbolical possession, he or his assigns may sue the judgment-debtor for actual possession within 12 years from the date of obtaining such symbolical possession, Vide Gopal v. Krishna Rao (5), Mahadeo v. Parshram (6).

The plaintiff-respondent admittedly brought the suit more than 12 years after the delivery of symbolical possession to her vendor, Basant Rai. Her claim is, therefore, clearly barred by limitation. The appeal prevails. The decree of the lower Appellate Court is set aside and that of the first Court is restored. Costs of all the Courts are allowed to the defendants-appellants.

A. brought a suit for redemption of a particular plot of land mortgaged by an unregistered mortgage-deed. The sum secured under the mortgage was Rs. 100. The defendant pleaded that he was an occupancy-tenant of the land and not a mortgagee.

Held, that in view of the fact that the mortgage was an unregistered one and could not, therefore, be enforced, section 202 of the Agra Tenancy Act had no application.

Second appeal from a decree of the District Judge of Gorakhpur, dated the 30th January 1912.

Mr. Haribans Sahai, for the Appellants.

Mr. Iswar Saran, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The appellants in this case alleged that they were the occupancy-tenants of two plots Nos. 358 and 181, and that they had mortgaged these plots by two separate mortgages to defendants. They sued for redemption. This suit has been decreed with regard to plot No. 181, but it has been dismissed by both the Courts below with regard to plot No. 358. The lower Appellate Court finds as a fact that there was no legal mortgage over this plot, inasmuch as the mortgage alleged was for a sum of over Rs. 100 and the document was not registered. The plaintiffs come in second appeal to this Court. The defendants had denied the existence of a mortgage over plot No. 358 and alleged that they were the sub-tenants of the plaintiffs in respect of that plot. It is contended in second appeal that in view of the pleadings of the defendant, it was incumbent on the Courts below to require the defendants to institute a suit in the Revenue Court within three months for a determination of the question whether or not they were the tenants of plot No. 358. The provisions of section 202 of the Tenancy Act lend support to this plea. The suit was one relating to an agricultural holding instituted in a Civil Court and the defendants pleaded that they held the land as the tenants of the plaintiffs. In the memorandum of appeal to the Court below, one of the grounds taken was that the defendants should have been required to institute a suit in the Revenue Court for the determination of their status. This plea was not noticed in the judgment of the Court below. The second paragraph of section 202 sets out that "if the defendant fails to comply with the order, the Court shall decide the question against him." We have to see what would be the result if the defendants failed to institute a suit in the Revenue Court. The decision of the Court upon the plea would be that the defendants had failed to prove that they are the tenants of the plot in suit. That decision would not help the plaintiffs, as on the suit as framed they had failed to prove the existence of a mortgage. If, however, the procedure required by section

MAHABIR PERSHAD v. RAM LOCHAN TEWARI.

202 of the Tenancy Act had been carried out and the defendants had instituted a suit in the Revenue Court, it would have been the duty of the Civil Court to dispose of the suit according to the decision of the Revenue Court. Again, we have to see what would be the decision if the Court held that the defendants were tenants and (2) if it held that they were not tenants. In either alternative, the plaintiffs could not get a decree in respect of plot No. 358 inasmuch as they failed to prove the mortgage sued upon. It would, therefore, appear that the question remitted to the Revenue Court for decision must be vital question in the case. Where, as in this case, the decision of the Revenue Court would have no effect on the decision of the Civil Court, the provisions of section 202, in my opinion, have no application. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Pre-emption—Rishtadar karibi not co-owner with the vendor—No right to pre-empt.

The pre-emptive clause in the zamima khewat of a village ran as follows: —"When any sharer wishes to transfer his rights, he can transfer first to a near relative (rishtadar karibi), after him to a distant relative (rishtadar baidi), and after him to sharers in the village (shurkain deh). In the event of those persons refusing, the transferor shall have power to sell or mortgage to whomsoever he pleases. Sharers (hissadaran) and sharers in the village (shurkain deh) shall be considered to have preference on condition that they are willing to pay the same price as a stranger is paying":

Held, that under the above clause, a near relative, who was not a co-sharer of the vendor in the same mahal, had no right to pre-empt.

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge of Gorakhpur, dated the 23rd of January 1912.

Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru (with him Mr. Parmeshwor Dyal), for the Appellants

Dr. Satish Chandra Banerji, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit for pre-emption. The village is now divided into five mahals. A certain individual, proprietor in one mahal, made an exchange with the proprietors in another mahal of certain plots of land. The plaintiff is a co-sharer in a third mahal, that is to say, in the events which have happened he is neither a co-sharer with the transferor nor with the transferee. The plaintiff adduced in support of his case the zamima khewat of 1233 Fasli. This document provides as follows: "When any sharer wishes to transfer his rights, he can transfer first to a near relative (rishtadar karibi), after him to a distant relative (rishtadar baidi), and after him to sharers in the village (shurkain deh). In the event of those persons refusing, the transferor shall have power to sell or mortgage to whom he pleases." Then follow these words: Sharers (hissadaran) and sharers in the village (shurkain deh) shall be considered to have preference on condition that they are willing to pay the same price as a stranger is paying."

Oral evidence to the same effect was given.

Both the Courts below have given the plaintiff a decree. Assuming for the purposes of this appeal that pre-emption extends to a case like the present, namely, that of a mere exchange of certain specified plots, and assuming also in favour of the plaintiff that the entry in the zamima khewat is sufficient to establish the existence of some custom of pre-emption, the question remains whether or not the evidence is sufficient to establish a custom of pre-emption which gives a right to a person who is not a co-sharer at all with the transferor. We have already pointed out in many cases how closely connected with pre-emption is the question of co-ownership. In our opinion, a custom giving a right to a person who is not a co-owner with the transferor is extremely improbable and unlikely. In the present case, the concluding words of the extract from the Wajib-ul-arz, in our judgment, clearly show that the right which the document was recording was a right prevailing amongst co-owners. In the events which have happened, as already mentioned, the plaintiff is no longer a co-owner with the transferor, although it is true that he is a near relation. Under these circumstances, we consider that the evidence was not sufficient to establish the existence of a custom under which the plaintiff is entitled to pre-empt the property.

We accordingly allow the appeal, set aside the decree of both the Courts below and dismiss the plaintiff's claim with costs in all Courts including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal accepted.

Mr. Muhammad Ishaq Khan (with him Mr. Ibn Ahmed), for the Appellant.

Dr. Satish Chandra Banerji, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—On June 14th, 1907, the defendant gave the plaintiffs a bond for Rs. 400 and on the same day gave them a lease of his occupancy holding in which it was provided that the rent was to be retained by the plaintiffs on account of the interest payable under the bond. It was conceded by the plaintiffs in the Courts below and it is also obvious that the two documents should be read together and that the intention was to make an usufructuary mortgage of the holding. The plaintiffs entered into possession of the holding but were ejected by the Revenue Authorities. In the present suit, the plaintiffs claim a decree for the principal sum due under the bond. The Munsif dismissed the suit holding that the contract was illegal having been designed to render the provisions of the Tenancy Act nugatory as, no doubt, it was. On appeal, the District Judge held that as the defendant had caused the plaintiffs to be ejected from the holding, he was bound to re-pay the amount advanced on the bond so that both parties might be restored to the positions occupied by them before the transaction. In my opinion, the decision of the District Judge was erroneous. If the transaction had been carried out by means of a single document, it is clear on the authorities that no suit would have lain to enforce payment of the mortgage money or any part of it, see the decisions in Bhikham Singh v. Har Prasad (1), Murlidhar v. Pem Raj (2), Depan Rai v. Ram Khelawan Rai (3) and Khaja Ikram-ullah Khan v. Moti Chand (4). The fact that the parties with a view to evading the provisions of the Tenancy Act carried out the transaction by means of two documents can make no difference. The learned District Judge has relied upon the decision in Bahoran Upadhaya v. Uttamgir (5) in support of the view which he took. That case seems to me to have no bearing upon the present case. There the plaintiff was asking the Court to restore him to the possession of an occupancy holding which he had mortgaged to the defendant and it was held that he was not entitled to a decree except on re-paying the sum borrowed from the defendant upon the mortgage. In the present case, there is no question of putting the plaintiffs upon terms and there is no room for the application of any equity. The plaintiffs are seeking to enforce an illegal contract as in several of the cases cited above. The present case seems to be covered by the authorities and I must hold that the suit should have been dismissed.

But the claim is for a simple money decree for Rs. 400 and the question arises whether a second appeal is not barred by section 102 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Prima facie the suit is of a nature cognizable by Courts of Small Causes and the learned Counsel for the defendant-appellant is unable to show that the suit falls within any of the Articles of the second Schedule to the Provincial Small Cause Courts Act. He referred to Article 6, but that Article applies only to suits for foreclosure for sale or for redemption of a mortgage. The present suit is clearly not a suit of the kinds contemplated by Article 6. Counsel for the appellant in the last resort asked me to treat this appeal as an application for revision under section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure and he contended, on the authority of the case of Ross Alston v. Pitambar Das (6), that this Court could set aside the decision of the District Judge in the present case in the exercise of its revisional jurisdiction. Elsewhere, I have declined to follow the decision just mentioned but I should have felt myself obliged to follow it in this Court, if it were not for the fact that it is commonly regarded as having gone too far and has in several cases not been followed in this Court. Moreover, the question decided by the Subordinate Court in that case is different from that decided in the present case. In my opinion, the District Judge did not fail to exercise a jurisdiction vested in him or exercised a jurisdiction not vested in him or act in the exercise of his jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity.

It is merely a case of what I consider an erroneous decision of a question of law and this Court cannot interfere in revision. It is, therefore, useless for me to treat this appeal as an application in revision. I dismiss the appeal as barred by the provisions of section 102 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appellant must pay the respondent's costs.

Second appeal from the decision of the Subordinate Judge of Ghazipur, dated the 21st of November 1911.

Mr. Haribans Sahai (with him Mr. Muhammad Ishaq Khan and Dr. Surendra Nath Sen), for the Appellants.

Mr. Parmeshwor Dyal (with him Messrs. B. E. O'Conor and G. W. Dillon), for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This was a suit for declaration of title to the sites of four houses in Mohalla Nawabganj in the town of Ghazipur and for three years' arrears of parjawat, a kind of ground-rent. The plaint was amended by the addition of a prayer for "proprietary possession" of the land as it was feared that the claim for a declaration of title might be held to be barred by limitation. The Courts below have agreed in giving the plaintiffs a decree for proprietary possession and for the arrears of parjawat.

The grounds of appeal are many, but two points only have been pressed before me, namely, that the claim to a decree for proprietary possession is not maintainable and that the whole claim is barred by the long continued adverse possession of the defendant.

It has been found that the plaintiffs are the proprietors of the land and that they or rather their predecessors have received parjawat from the holders for the time being of the houses, but the parjawat has not been paid for a great many years. One of the Munsifs before whom this case came says that the parjawat has not been paid for the last 20 or 30 years. The Subordinate Judge says it has not been paid for many years. As far as I can see, there is no clear evidence of the payment of the parjawat during the last 50 years except possibly in the plaintiffs' account books which the Subordinate Judge has accepted but which have not been translated or referred to by Counsel in this Court. It has been held in many cases that mere non-payment of rent by a tenant is generally insufficient to show that the tenant has acquired proprietary title against his zemindar and that a denial of the landlord's title must be shown. Sheo Dyal Singh v. Ganga (1) and Anroop Misr v. Kedar Pande (2) are recent cases on the point. But I apprehend that non-payment of rent, if proved, to have continued for a very long period might give ground for the inference that the landlord had been ousted or had transferred his right to the tenant just as in the case of tenants-in-common, exclusive possession of one tenant in-common for a very long period may furnish ground for the inference that the others have been ousted by him or have transferred their rights to him. See Fisher & Taylor v. Prosser (3), referred to in Gangadhar v. Parasharam (4). In the present case, I do not think that such an inference should be drawn from the non-payment of the parjawat. The amount of the parjawat is very small only 2 pice per mensem for each house. Probably the landlords did not care to collect it regularly and by degrees gave up collecting it altogether.

On the whole, I am of opinion that the decisions of the Courts below are right upon this point and that it should not be inferred from the facts that the defendants have been in adverse possession of the sites of their houses. But from this it follows that the plaintiffs have not been ousted from such possession as they are entitled to and should not be given a decree for possession. The plaintiffs will have a decree for the parjawat, the rest of the claim is dismissed.

The parties will pay their own costs throughout.

Appeal dismissed.

PUNJAB CHIEF COURT.
SECOND CIVIL APPEAL NO. 723 OF 1911.
November 7, 1912.
Present:—Mr. Justice Rattigan.
NIDHAN SINGH—DEFENDANT—APPELLANT
versus
SHAM SINGH AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Construction of deed—Adoption—Power to widow to adopt son—Reversioner acceding assent for consideration.

The deeds and contracts of the people of India should be liberally construed. The form of expression, the literal sense, is not to be so much regarded as the real meaning of the parties which the transaction discloses.

In construing such deeds and contracts, regard must be had to all the attendant circumstances of the transaction.

A. died leaving a widow B. and a mother C. After A.'s death, B. and C. executed a deed of adoption, by which they adopted one D., as the son of A., reciting in the deed that the adoption was in compliance with the expressed wishes of A. E., one of the reversionary heirs of A., sued for a declaration that the deed of adoption was invalid against his reversionary interests and obtained a decree to that effect. Subsequently, E. executed an agreement by which he gave B. and C. authority to adopt any one they liked (mutbanna apna muqarrir kar leven) and, as a consideration for this concession, E.

NIDHAN SINGH v. SHAM SINGH.

received immediate possession of a large portion of A.'s estate. Accordingly, B. and C. again adopted D., saying "mutbanna apna qarar de kar iqrar karte hain ke D. mazkur hamara mutabanna hai."

After the death of E., B. and C., E.'s grandson, F., sued for possession of his share in the estate of A.:

Held, (1) that the intention of the parties must not be gathered from the strict terms used in the agreement and the deed of adoption but that the circumstances of the case must also be considered;

(2) that the intention of the parties was that the widows should appoint an heir to the last male-holder of the estate, A;

(3) that the adoption was binding on E. and his heirs.

Second appeal from the order of the Divisional Judge, Ferozepore Division, dated the 19th May 1911, reversing that of the Munsif of the 1st class, Ferozepore, dated the 7th February 1911, dismissing plaintiffs' claim.

Rai Sahib Pandit Sheo Narain, for the Appellant.

The Hon'ble Mr. Shadi Lal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This judgment will also dispose of Civil Appeal No. 724 of 1911 (Nidhan Singh v. Dip Singh).

The pedigree table of the parties is set out in the judgment of the Divisional Judge and is admittedly correct. The facts, so far as they are material for present purposes, are as follows:

One Sher Singh, son of Bhup Singh, died in 1881, leaving a fairly large estate. After his death, his widow, Musammat Mahtabo, and his mother Musammat Mano, appear to have succeeded to the estate on the usual life-tenure. On the 9th October 1884, the two ladies executed a deed of adoption which recited that defendant, Nidhana, had been adopted by the deceased Sher Singh during his life-time and that the executants drew up the document in question in order to give effect to the expressed wishes of the deceased by whose authority they purported to be acting. Two of the reversionary heirs, Sarup Singh, the grandfather of the present plaintiff, Sham Singh, and Mangal Singh, the father of the plaintiffs, Dip Singh etc., thereupon sued for a declaration to the effect that the deed of adoption was invalid as against their reversionary interests, and on the 27th of August 1887, they obtained a decree to that effect. Previously to this, mutation in respect of Sher Singh's estate had been effected in the name of defendant, Nidhana, and the Revenue Authorities refused to accede to the prayer of the reversioners to cancel the entry, on the ground that it was competent to the widows to allow any one they liked to have possession of the land during their life-time. On the 26th of April 1889, one of the above mentioned reversioners, viz., Sarup Singh and another reversioner, viz., Sawan Singh, the paternal uncle of Nidhana, executed a written agreement, in which after reciting the facts of the previous alleged adoption and the litigation which ensued thereon, they gave Musammat Mano and Musammat Mahtabo authority to adopt any one they liked, and, as consideration for this concession, the said two reversioners received, in immediate possession, 80 kanals out of the estate of the deceased Sher Singh. The exact terms in which this authority was granted are as follows:

"Is liye ab ham bazaria tahrir haza ke ikhtiar dete hain ke in Musammatan Mano wa Mahtab Kaur ko ikhtiar hai ke khah kisi ko mutbanna apna muqarrir kar leven. Ham ko babat taqarri mutbanna ke kisi kism ka uzr nahin hoga, na aur kisi kism ka ham ko dawa hoga".

In pursuance of the authority thus given to them, the two widows, on the 27th April 1889, executed a deed whereby they purported to adopt Nidhana, and the terms of this document are as follows:

"Ab barue ikhtiarnama tabniat musaddaqa 26th April 1889, Musammian Sarup Singh wa Sawan warisan nazdiki ne ham ko ijazat mutbanna karne ki de di hai, lihaza muqiran bakhushi khud Nidhan mazkur ko mutbanna apna qarar de kar iqrar karte hain ke Musammi Nidhana muzkur hamara mutbanna hai."

It appears that the other reversionary heir, Mangal Singh, who sued successfully in 1887, was not a party to this transaction, and that he subsequently appeared before the Revenue Authorities and protested against the deed of gift executed by the two widows on the same day on which they had executed the deed of adoption. The Revenue Authorities, however, refused to interfere and it is in evidence that subsequently Mangal Singh, on two occasions at least, accepted Nidhana as the representative and agent of the widows during their life-time. On one occasion, an exchange of land was made by Mangal Singh and the other sharers in the khata including Nidhana, and on another occasion, Mangal Singh temporarily cultivated a part of Sher Singh's land and paid rent therefor to Nidhana.

Within twelve years of the death of the survivor of the two widows, the grandson of Sarup Singh, viz., Sham Singh, and the sons of Mangal Singh, viz., Dip Singh and others, brought two suits claiming possession of their respective shares in the estate of the deceased Sher Singh, to which in the ordinary course of things they would respectively be entitled to one-third, Nidhana and his uncle Sawan Singh being entitled, as reversionary heirs, to the other third. Nidhana, however, claimed to be entitled to the whole of the estate as the adopted son of Sher Singh, and his claim is supported by his said uncle. The Court of first instance dismissed plaintiff's suits on various grounds, whereupon they appealed to the Divisional Judge, who accepted both appeals and granted plaintiffs a decree with costs in the terms prayed for. Defendant has appealed to this Court from the decrees of the lower Appellate Court, and I have heard Mr. Sheo Narain at considerable length on his behalf.

The contention of Nidhana is that the two widows, in adopting him as a son, adopted him to the deceased Sher Singh, and that this adoption, being made with the consent of the reversioners, Sarup Singh and Sawan Singh, was equivalent to an adoption made by the widows with the authority of the deceased Sher Singh. Next, it is argued that if this contention fails as against all the plaintiffs, it should be held to prevail at least against Sham Singh, whose grandfather gave express consent, for valuable consideration, to the action of the widows. Mr. Sheo Narain also urged that after the death of Sher Singh, Nidhana acquired, at various times, about 17 kanals of land which formed no part of Sher Singh's estate and that that area should in any event be excluded from the area of 227 kanals which is stated in the plaint to represent the estate left by the deceased, Sher Singh.

As regards the appeal against Dip Singh and others, I have no hesitation in holding that it must fail. Mangal Singh never consented to the adoption by the widows and the only point that can be urged against him and his descendants is that Mangal Singh by his subsequent conduct acquiesced in what the widows had done. Mr. Sheo Narain, however, candidly admitted that this plea of acquiescence could not be supported, and that the Divisional Judge had given sound reasons for rejecting it. So far then as the appeal against those plaintiffs is concerned, the only question is whether they are entitled to a third of 227 kanals or to a third of the 227 kanals minus the 17 kanals alleged to have been acquired by Nidhana. Mr. Shadi Lal, on behalf of all the respondents, conceded that it was possible that Nidhana had acquired certain land for himself, and he was quite willing that the area of Sher Singh's estate should be taken to be 210 kanals and not 227. The result, therefore, will be that the appeal as against Dip Singh etc., is accepted to the extent of altering the decree of the lower Appellate Court into one for possession of the 210 kanals left by Sher Singh. In all other respects, that appeal is dismissed with costs.

Turning now to the appeal against the decree in favour of Sham Singh, I find considerable force in the arguments addressed to me by Mr. Sheo Narain. The Divisional Judge, in holding that the result of the agreement of the 26th April 1889 and of the deed of adoption of the 27th April 1889 was merely to make Nidhana heir to the personal property of the two widows, lays great stress on the literal wording of the two documents which he construes as meaning that the widows were given authority merely to adopt a son to themselves and did, under the terms employed by them in their own deed, actually adopt a son to themselves and not a son to Sher Singh. It has been laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council that "deeds and contracts of the people of India ought to be liberally construed. The form of expression, the literal sense, is not to be so much regarded as the real meaning of the parties which the transaction discloses." Hannoomanpursshad Panday v. Musammat Babooee Munraj Koonweree (1). And it has been frequently laid down both by their Lordships and by the Courts of this country that in construing such deeds and contracts, regard must be had to all the attendant circumstances of the transaction, [see, inter alia, Janardana v. Anant (2) and Udai Raj Singh v. Bhagwan Bakhsh Singh (3)].

Accepting this canon of construction, I can have no hesitation in holding that the intention of Sarup Singh and Sawan Singh and of the two widows was that the adoption should be not to themselves but to Sher Singh. To hold otherwise would mean that the widows surrendered a large portion of Sher Singh's estate to Sarup Singh and Sawan Singh for no conceivable benefit either to themselves or to Nidhana. The widows were in possession for their life-time, and the adoption, if so it can be called, of a son to themselves would have been meaningless and of no practical benefit to any one, and it is difficult to believe that they would have given 80 kanals of land in return for a concession of no value whatever. That they were anxious to adopt a son to Sher Singh is clear from the deed which they executed in 1884, and I have little doubt that after their failure in 1887, they endeavoured to persuade the reversioners to agree to Nidhana being adopted as Sher Singh's son and that it was with full knowledge that this was their intention and their object that Sarup Singh and Sawan Singh executed the agreement of the 26th April 1889.

I cannot, therefore, agree with the Divisional Judge that the intention of the parties must be gathered from the strict terms used in the agreement and in the deed of adoption, and that the circumstances of the transaction must be ignored. In my opinion, all the parties concerned were well aware that the intention of the widows was to appoint an heir to the last male-holder of the estate, and in arriving at this conclusion, I am influenced by the facts that this was obviously the real wish of the widows and that the deeds were drawn up in all probability by some village scribe of scanty knowledge of legal terms and expressions.

I hold, accordingly, that so far as the plaintiff, Sham Singh, is concerned, the adoption of Nidhana as the son of Sher Singh had the express approval of his grandfather, Sarup Singh, who received valuable consideration for acceding his assent to the action of the widows, and that this adoption is binding upon Sham Singh. I, therefore, accept the defendant's appeal against the decree of the Divisional Judge in favour of Sham Singh and reversing the decree, I dismiss Sham Singh's suit with costs throughout.

Caste, ex-communication from—One section refusing to invite plaintiff without his undergoing some expiatory ceremonies, but not outcasting him—Cause of action—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 9.

An allegation that defendants insisted that the plaintiff should undergo certain expiatory ceremonies, required to be performed by members of a caste after pollutions of certain kinds, before he could be invited to certain functions in defendant's houses, affords no cause of action against the defendants.

Refusal to invite the plaintiff and his friends to auspicious occasions would not in itself give the plaintiff a cause of action, provided his enjoyment of right as a member of the caste has not been obstructed.

Appeal against the revised decree of the City Civil Court, Madras, dated 8th August 1910, in Original Suit No. 64 of 1910.

Mr. T. Rangachariar, for the Appellant.

Mr. K. S. Krishnasawmy Iyengar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff gave his daughter in marriage to Mr. Venugopaul Chetty, a High Court Vakil. Both of them belong to the Vaisya caste but are members of different divisions of that caste. As might be expected, some members of the sub-caste to which the plaintiff belongs disapproved the marriage on the ground that it was opposed to custom with the result that on occasions of marriages, funeral ceremonies etc, in their families, the plaintiff and those who took his side were not invited and they also refused the invitations of the plaintiff and his friends to attend at similar functions in their houses. The defendants are among those who disapproved the marriage. They and their friends form a separate faction; some members of the plaintiff's faction were admitted by the defendants into their faction only on the performance of certain expiatory ceremonies required on account of their association with the plaintiff and his friends in social and religious functions.

It is the plaintiff's case that the defendants have proclaimed him to be an outcaste and that these expiatory ceremonies were intended to show that he was an outcaste. The defendants denied that they ever called the plaintiff and those who agreed with him outcastes. They further denied that the plaintiff was an outcaste and alleged that the nature of the ceremonies was not such as to show that the plaintiff was one. The Judge first held that the suit was not maintainable as the plaint did not disclose a cause of action. We reversed his judgment on the ground that if the defendants said anything which was capable of being understood to imply that the plaintiff was an outcaste or if as a condition for admission into religious and social communion, he insisted on the performance of any ceremonies which implied that the plaintiff was an outcaste, the plaintiff would have a good cause of action. The Judge has now found that there is no evidence to prove that the defendants called the plaintiff an outcaste. He also finds that the plaintiff's evidence to prove that the defendants used certain words which, according to him, implied that the plaintiff was an outcaste, is totally unreliable, and in appeal reliance is not placed upon that evidence. The main question, that was argued, is that the defendants insisted upon the plaintiff and those who are associated with him performing certain ceremonies which are performed only by those persons who have lost their caste when they seek re-admission into it. With reference to this contention, the Judge finds that according to the evidence adduced in this case there are two kinds of prayaschittams performed. Those who leave their caste by imprisonment and those who have gone beyond the seas have to undergo a prayaschittam in which 'homam' is performed. For instance, the plaintiff's 4th witness sates that he was in Jail for 3 days and for taking the food prepared in Jail, though cooked by Brahmins, he performed a prayaschittam which consisted of changing his sacred thread, and performing homam and punyahavachanam. There is another prayaschittam according to the witnesses in which the homam is omitted. This is performed, according to the uncontradicted evidence in the case, even by those who remain in caste on certain occasions. The plaintiff's 3rd witness, who was doing the duties of a Purohit to the caste to which the parties belong, during the absence of his brother, says that punyahavachanam is performed and panchagavayam is given on sradha days, on the day when a woman takes a bath after her confinement and on the 17th day after the death of a person.

The evidence in this case is quite clear that all that the defendants insisted upon was not performance of ceremonies which should be performed in the case of re-admission of a person who has lost his caste but only the minor ceremonies which have to be performed for purification after pollution of the kinds described above.

Refusal to invite the plaintiff and his friends to marriage would not in itself give the plaintiff a cause of action. The fact, therefore, that the plaintiff and his friends were not invited to religious and social functions at the defendant's houses is immaterial. It does not show that the plaintiff and his friends are outcastes any more than any refusal on their part to invite the defendants and their friends to similar functions in their houses would show the defendants are not in caste. It is admitted by the plaintiff that he has not been obstructed in the enjoyment of any right which he has as a member of his caste. He admits that he is attending temple worship and that nobody objects to his going to temples We are, therefore, of opinion that the Judge is right and dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Regina v. Heyworth, (1866) 14 L. T. N. S. 600, relied upon.

Emperor v. Mirza Mahomd Shirazi, 4 Bom. L. R. 943, distinguished.

JUDGMENT.

SCOTT, C. J.—The finding of the Magistrate is that the accused is one of the joint owners of the land in question on which about a hundred bullocks are kept, some in huts and some in the open, the bullocks being plied for hire; that the place is not licensed by the Municipal Commissioner under section 394 of the Bombay Municipal Act. The accused was charged with using the place without having taken out a license. The defence was that the bullocks did not belong to the accused and that he did not keep them or use the place for keeping them; that the bullocks belonged to tenants who had hired different pieces of the ground and put up huts and were keeping the bullocks. The Magistrate finds that the accused knew ever since March 1910 that bullocks were kept on the land and allowed it, and actually contemplated building a bullock stable, and that such rent as was received for the land was taken by him.

The matter comes up on revision before us upon conviction of the accused on these facts.

It is contended for the petitioner that the bullocks are kept upon certain vacant ground forming part of a large area belonging to the accused, and that they are not actually kept upon the plots which are leased out to tenants.

That contention does not appear to be consistent with the finding of the Magistrate that some of the bullocks are actually kept in the tenants' huts. I will, however, deal with the case upon both assumptions; first, that the bullocks are kept upon the land leased out to the tenants, and, secondly, that they are kept upon waste land not leased out. In either case, we must assume that they were so kept with the knowledge of the accused. Upon the first assumption, we have the authority of a Bench of this Court, in a case decided on the 2nd December 1897 [Criminal Reference No. 105 of 1897 (1)] that if the owner of premises without a license allows such animals to be kept therein, whether on payment of a fee or otherwise, he should be considered to use his premises for that purpose. This appears to be in accordance with the decision in Regina v. Heyworth (2), where the question was as to the liability for using a place as a slaughter-house without a license under section 126 of 10 and 11 Vic. c. 34. That section provided that "Every person who, without having first obtained such license as aforesaid, uses as a slaughter-house any place not so used at the passing of the special Act, shall for each offence be liable." It was held by Mr. Justice Lush that "The owner uses the place by letting it out. The license is not to the person, but to the place, and the penalty is not imposed on every person who shall slaughter cattle in an unlicensed place, but on every person who uses a place without a license."

We have been referred to a decision of another Bench of this Court in Emperor v. Mirza Mahomed Shirazi (3), in which the Court held that where the owner of premises has leased them out for a term of three years, he would not be liable under the

*The section runs thus:—

Section 394. (1) Except under a license granted by the Commissioner, no person shall—.....

(c) keep or allow to be kept, in or upon any premises, horses, cattle or any other four-footed animals,

(i) for sale,

(ii) for letting out on hire.

(iii) for any purpose for which any charge is made or any remuneration is received, or (iv) for sale of any produce thereof.....

(1) 4 Bom. L. R. 945, note.

(2) (1866) 14 L. T. N. S. 600.

section for the acts of his tenants which he could not control. Those are very different facts from the facts of the present case.

The alteration in the section, when re-enacted in the Act of 1888, which is referred to in Emperor v. Mirza Mahomed Shirazi (3), has been relied upon for the petitioner. We are not prepared to adopt the view of this Court in that case as to the reason for alteration, for upon the facts of this case the decision in Criminal Reference No. 105 of 1897 (1) is directly in point and is supported by the English case above cited. Therefore, if the petitioner let out the land upon which bullocks were kept, he would be liable under the section having taken rent with the knowledge of the purpose for which the land was used by his monthly tenants. On the other hand, if the land used was waste land for which the tenants were not paying rent, but which the landlord (the petitioner) permitted to be used out of kindness to the tenants, we think he would clearly be using the land for bullocks, without a license, and would, therefore, be liable to conviction under the Act.

We discharge the Rule.

RUSSELL, J.—I agree. One of the uses to which this land was put, to the knowledge of the accused, was for keeping bullocks without a license which were let on hire, and that being so, in my opinion, he "used" the premises and so brought himself within section 394 of the City of Bombay Municipal Act, 1888.

Rule discharged.

Practice—Jurisdiction—Magistrate seeking advice of District Magistrate—Magistrate bound to decide question himself.

A Magistrate, before whom an accused was placed on trial, felt a doubt as to his jurisdiction to try the accused. He thereupon sought the advice of the District Magistrate and, on the receipt of the latter's opinion on the question of jurisdiction, proceeded to try the case:

Held, that the Magistrate was not justified in seeking the advice of the District Magistrate in the way he did. The Magistrate was bound to finish his inquiry, complete his record by the reception of all evidence of relevant facts, including the facts which bore upon the question of accused's amenability to his jurisdiction, and then as a Magistrate pass such order as seemed to him to be legal and proper.

Criminal Reference made by the Sessions Judge of Satara.

Mr. S. R. Bakhle, for the Accused.

Mr. L.A. Shah, Acting Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—We think that the procedure by which this matter has ultimately found its way to this Court is open to objection. The accused was placed before the second class Magistrate on an accusation that he, being a subject of the Aundh State, had within the limits of that State dishonestly received certain property which had been stolen in British India. Those circumstances, no doubt, raise a point of law as to whether the accused would be amenable to the jurisdiction of the British Court; and that is a question which could only be decided by a Tribunal placed in full possession of all the facts bearing upon that question. The second class Magistrate, however, seeing this legal question looming before him, instead of completing his inquiry, getting upon the record all the evidence that was available and then deciding the point of law, right or wrong, for himself, proceeded to address an official communication to the District Magistrate seeking his advice in the matter. The District Magistrate replied, stating his opinion on the question of jurisdiction, but, in our opinion, the best reply would have been to direct the second class Magistrate to complete his inquiry, and as a Magistrate pass such order as seemed to him to be legal and proper. That is the direction which we must now make. The second class Magistrate must finish the inquiry, completing his record by the reception of all evidence of relevant facts, including the facts which bear upon this question of the accused's amenability to a British Court's jurisdiction. With this record thus complete, the Magistrate must consider for himself the question of law which arises and must decide it for himself. If he decides it rightly, so much the better; if he decides it wrongly, there are Tribunals constituted for the purpose of correcting his mistake.

Criminal appeal from the order of acquittal passed by the Honorary Magistrate, 1st Class, Ahmedabad City.

FACTS :—The licensee of a public conveyance was required by a Police officer, while his carriage was standing at the carriage stand to produce his list of fares. He was unable to do so.

He was proceeded against under section 18 of the Public Conveyances Act but was acquitted by the Magistrate. The Magistrate's order stated :—"The section quoted is apparently very clear and makes a licensee, driver, or other attendant liable to the punishment provided therein, only if he fails to comply with the demand for producing the list etc. made by any hirer of or passenger by the public conveyance. In this case, no such demand was made by any hirer or passenger and the section does not, therefore, apply. From the accused's statement, he seems to have left at home through oversight the list of the fares etc. His consequent inability to produce the same to Mr. Gillispie, Sargeant, is not punishable under section 18 quoted above."

Mr. L. A. Shah, Acting Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—We are of opinion that the Magistrate has come to the right conclusion with regard to the construction of section 18 of the Public Conveyances Act (VI of 1863).

We think the object of the section was to provide that the licensee or driver of a public conveyance shall have a clean list of fares with him in order that he may be in a position on demand to produce the same for the benefit of the hirer or passenger. The provisions of the section are framed solely for the benefit of the hirer or the passenger, and it is when the list is not produced on demand by the hirer or passenger that the penalty can be imposed.

The case for the prosecution cannot be put higher than this that the section is capable of two constructions. In a case of such ambiguity, the Court ought to lean in favour of the accused.

We dismiss the appeal and affirm the order of acquittal.

Appeal dismissed.

* The section runs thus :—

Section 18. Every licensee, driver or other attendant in charge of any public conveyance shall have with him, when plying for hire, a clean and legible list in English and such vernacular language or languages as the Commissioner of Police or Master Attendant may order, bearing the name in full of the licensee, and showing the rates and fares fixed and appointed to be taken for the fare or hire of his conveyance, with an abstract of the law relating to public conveyances, and shall, on demand, produce the same for the information of any hirer of, or passenger by, such public conveyance, under penalty, on conviction before a Magistrate of Police, of a fine not exceeding rupees twenty, and, in default of payment of such fine, he shall be liable to simple imprisonment for a period not exceeding two months.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 35, 411—Sentences to run concurrently—Sentence of six months' imprisonment on each of two counts by Presidency Magistrate—Right of appeal—Aggregate sentence.

Two sentences, each of six months' imprisonment passed simultaneously under section 35 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and directed to run concurrently, cannot be held to be a single sentence of one year's imprisonment, but would be considered as a single sentence of six months' imprisonment.

If such a sentence is passed by a Presidency Magistrate, it will not be appealable under section 411 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Appeal against the conviction and sentence of six months' rigorous imprisonment, passed on each of two counts, the sentences to run concurrently, by the fifth Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta on August 13th, 1912.

Mr. K. N. Chaudhri and Babu Manmatha Nath Mukherjee, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—Two sentences, each of six months' imprisonment, passed simultaneously under section 35 of the Criminal Procedure Code of 1898 and directed to run concurrently cannot, in our opinion, be held to be, in the aggregate, a single sentence of one year's imprisonment. The word "aggregate" in sub-section (3) of the section connotes the combined effect of the different sentences passed and, if two concurrent sentences could properly be said to be aggregated in the sense of being merged together, the result of the so-called aggregation would, we think, be a single sentence of six months' imprisonment. The intention which is to be gathered from, for example, section 411 of the Code, is that a person who is to suffer by being imprisoned for more than a certain period shall have the privilege of an appeal. If he is, in fact, to be imprisoned for a shorter period, whether under one or two sentences, we do not understand how the privilege can, or why it should, be extended to him.

This appeal is, therefore, incompetent and dismissed accordingly.

Appeal dismissed.

Bombay City Municipal Act (III of 1888), s. 394—Keeping bullocks for hire by tenant with owner's knowledge—Liability of owner.

A. let out certain premises to B. For several years, to the knowledge of A., the premises were used by B. or his sub-tenants for the purpose of stabling bullocks used for hire in contravention of section 394 of the Bombay Municipal Act. In the lease given by A. to B., there was a clause restraining B. from putting the land to any use not sanctioned by Municipal Regulations:

Held, that A. was guilty of an offence under section 394 of the Act, as despite the terms of the lease, he allowed the unwarranted use of the premises.

Imperator v. Tyebali Curimji Barodawalla, 14 Bom.L. R. 885, note; 17 Ind. Cas. 529, followed.

Regina v. Heyworth, (1866) 14 L. T. N. S. 600, relied upon.

Criminal Application for revision from conviction and sentence recorded by the Third Presidency Magistrate of Bombay.

Mr. Robertson, instructed by Messrs. Forbes and Co., for the Accused.

Mr. Jardine, Acting Advocate-General, instructed by Messrs. Crawford Brown and Co., for the Municipality.

JUDGMENT.—The petitioner here has been convicted of allowing to be kept, on his premises, bullocks used for hire, without a license from the Municipal Commissioner, in contravention of section 394 of the Bombay Municipal Act (Bom. Act III of 1888), and has been sentenced to a fine of Rs. 15. The question before us is whether the lower Court has committed any error of law in finding the petitioner guilty under this section.

The facts found are that the premises in question belonged to the petitioner; that he has let them out to one Kondiba; and that for many years, to the petitioner's knowledge, the premises have been used by his tenant or sub-tenants for the purpose of stabling bullocks used for hire in contravention of this section. The only question is whether upon that state of facts, the petitioner was rightly convicted under section 394. That section provides that "Except under a license granted by the Commissioner, no person shall, inter alia, keep or allow to be kept, in or upon any premises, cattle for letting out on hire." It is urged by Mr. Robertson for the petitioner that the responsibility for stabling the cattle, without Municipal permission lay upon the petitioner's tenant and upon him only. And Counsel has referred to the lease given by the petitioner to his tenant and to the clause in the lease which restrains the tenant from putting the land to any use not sanctioned by Municipal Regulations. It appears to us, however, that these terms of the lease make rather against the petitioner than in his favour, for they show that with the knowledge at his disposal, he had the power to eject his tenant. This he did not do, but stood by, and offered no obstruction or impediment to his tenant's unlawful use of the land. It seems to us, therefore, that it may rightly be said that despite the terms of the lease, he allowed the unwarranted use of the premises.

The case falls within the decision of this Court in Imperator v. Tyebali Curimji Barodawalla (1), where in a similar state of facts a conviction was affirmed, and reference was made to Regina v. Heyworth (2). That was a case which involved liability for using a place as a slaughter-house without a license under section 126 of 10 and 11 Vic. c. 34. That section provided that "Every person who, without having first obtained such license as aforesaid, uses as a slaughter-house any place not used as such at the passing of the special Act, shall for each offence be liable to a certain punishment." In considering that section, Mr. Justice Lush said: "The owner 'uses' the place by letting it out. The license is not to the person, but to the place."

So upon these facts, we think, that under section 394 of the Municipal Act, the petitioner must be held to have allowed his cattle to be stabled by his tenant in contravention of the provisions of the law. It may well be, as Mr. Robertson has suggested and we are quite prepared to accept the suggestion, that the petitioner has acted throughout in good faith, and under a mistaken belief as to his legal responsibility. But however that be, he has, in our opinion, rightly been convicted under section 394 and we must, therefore, discharge the Rule.

Rule discharged.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 145, scope of—Absolute continuous possession dealt with—Party claiming right of easement not to be made party to section 145 proceedings—Jurisdiction of Magistrate—Public, if may be declared to be in possession.

Section 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure only deals with rights of absolute continuous possession of immoveable property, and proceedings under that section are entirely without jurisdiction unless they are directed to the decision of absolute continuing possession of either party.

The right of a party, who does not claim anything beyond the right to worship on one day in the year and the right to make due and proper preparations for the holding of that worship by erecting huts for the purpose of holding the puja, is in the nature of an easement and not in the nature of possession, and, therefore, such a party cannot be made a party to a proceeding under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code.

The public cannot be declared to be in possession of any piece of land, for if that be done, then both parties to the dispute are included in that term and the possession, therefore, is joint possession and the jurisdiction of the Court under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, is ousted.

Rule against the order of the Deputy Magistrate of Howrah, dated May 11th, 1912, declaring the Opposite Party to be entitled to possession of the land in dispute.

Babus Atulya Charan Bose and Bir Bhushan Dutt, for the Petitioners.

Mr. K. N. Chaudhuri and Babu Manmatha Nath Mukherjee, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This was a Rule calling upon the District Magistrate of Howrah and on the opposite party to show cause why the order passed under section 145, Criminal Procedure Code, should not be discharged on the grounds, firstly, that the public who claim the right of easement for one day in the year cannot be a party to section 145 proceedings, and secondly, that constructive conditional possession is not known to the law.

We are of opinion that this Rule must be made absolute on both the grounds on which it was issued. It is clear that if the public are declared to be in possession of any piece of land, then both parties to the dispute are included in that term and the possession, therefore, is joint possession and the jurisdiction of the Court under section 145 is ousted. But this is an academical question. The principal question is whether a party, who do not claim anything beyond the right to worship on one day in the year and the right to make due and proper preparations for the holding of that worship, by erecting huts for the purpose of holding the puja, can be admitted to proceedings under section 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which only deals with rights to absolute continuous possession of immoveable property. What the learned Magistrate means by constructive conditional possession we cannot conceive. If he means their right to be in possession for one day in the year or to take such steps as are necessary to prepare for the puja, that is in the nature of an easement and not in the nature of possession at all and this is what the second party themselves ask for in their petition. They say that the first party is likely to disturb them in their public worship on the last day of Baisakh, inasmuch as the first party claims the land to be his ancestral property and desires to hold a private worship of his own apparently of the same goddess Bhadrakali on that very day: and they pray that considering the emergency of the matter, the Magistrate may be pleased to take proceedings under section 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code. And they rely upon the case of Belagal Ramacharlu v. Emperor (1). Now, had the Magistrate taken such proceedings, all these troubles would have been avoided. He had only to prohibit any person claiming either as proprietor or in any other capacity from interfering with the public and with the public's designated priest whose name was given in the proceedings in conducting this puja or in preparing for it. This would have settled the whole dispute; and this can easily be done year after year, if it be necessary. The proceedings can be taken a month beforehand. It would be ample for all that is necessary to meet the ends of justice. But as we have already indicated, proceedings under section 145 are entirely without jurisdiction unless they are directed to the decision of the absolute continuing possession of either party until they are ousted by the order of the Civil Court. We, therefore, make the Rule absolute and set aside the proceedings in the lower Court. Costs ordered will be refunded.

Rule made absolute; Case remanded.

JUDGMENT.

BATCHELOR, J.—In this case, the accused was charged under section 43 of the Bombay Abkari Act (Bom. Act V of 1878), with

---

*The section runs as follows:—

Section 43. Whoever, in contravention of this Act, or of any rule or order made under this Act, or of any license, permit or pass obtained under this Act—shall be punished for each such offence with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months or with both.

(a)imports or exports liquor, hemp or any intoxicating drug into or out of any part of the Presidency of Bombay,...

EMPEROR v. CHIMANLAL JAGJIVAN.

importing an intoxcating drug into the Presidency of Bombay. The fact proved is that the accused brought twenty tolas of bhang from Wadhwan Civil Station to Viramgam. Viramgam admittedly is British territory. It is further admitted that the importation of twenty tolas of bhang into British territory from foreign territory would be punishable under section 43.

The only question which arises, therefore, is whether Wadhwan Civil Station is within the Presidency of Bombay or not. The Abkari Act extends to the whole of the Presidency of Bombay (see section 1); and by the Bombay General Clauses Act (Bom. Act I of 1904) 'Presidency of Bombay' means the territories within British India for the time being under the administration of the Governor of Bombay in Council. 'British India' is by the same Act defined to mean all territories and places within His Majesty's Dominions which are for the time being governed by His Majesty through the Governor-General of India or through any Governor or any other officer subordinate to the Governor-General of India.

In the Court below, the learned Magistrate has held that Wadhwan Civil Station is within the limits of British India, and for that view, he has relied upon Mr. Justice Bayley's decision in Triccam Panachand v. The Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway Company (1). That decision is clear authority for the Magistrate's decision, and the real question now before us may be said to be whether Triccam Panachand's case (1) was rightly decided. It was the decision of a single Judge and as such is not binding upon us. It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider the reasoning upon which that case proceeded but it is material to say, with great respect, that the grounds upon which Mr. Justice Bayley based his determination do not appear to my own mind to carry conviction.

While we are not bound by Mr. Justice Bayley's decision, there is a decision of this Court which is binding upon us, and that is the decision of the Bench in Queen-Empress v. Abdul Latib valad Abdul Rahiman (2), where Mr. Justice Birdwood and Mr. Justice Jardine, have held that the Civil Station at Rajkot is not part of British India within the meaning of Statute 21 & 22 Vic. c. 106.

It is urged on behalf of the appellant that the position of Rajkot Civil Station is, for our present purposes, indistinguishable from that of Wadhwan Civil Station; and upon reference to the agreements made with these two States, and recorded in Aitchison's Treaties, I am of opinion that this argument must be allowed. So far as the material clauses in the two agreements are concerned, they are couched in identically the same language, nor has any attempt been made before us to distinguish the language in the one agreement from the language in the other. It follows, therefore, that if in the case of Rajkot, the true construction of the agreement is that Rajkot Civil Station remains outside British India, the same construction must be placed upon the agreement with Wadhwan. Therefore, following the decision in Abdul Latib's case (2), which for the rest commends itself to my own mind, we must, I think, hold that Wadhwan Civil Station is outside the limits of British India. It is true that in Abdul Latib's case (2) what the Court decided was that Rajkot was not part of British India, as that term is defined in the Indian Penal Code, and that the definition of 'British India' in the Indian Penal Code is framed in different words from the definition which occurs in the Bombay General Clauses Act. It appears to me, however, that so far as regards our present purposes, this difference in language is not a difference of substance. Reference may also, I think, be made to the Privy Council decision in Hemchand v. Sakar Lal (3), which seems to me to lend support to the view that Wadhwan Civil Station is not a place within His Majesty's Dominions which for the time being is governed by His Majesty through the Governor-General of India or through any Governor subordinate to the Governor-General. It may be observed further that, as was admitted in argument, the laws which prevail in the Bombay Presidency do not prevail proprio vigore in Wadhwan Civil Station, and it is irrelevant to the present point that some of such laws are extended to the Civil Station by recourse to other powers than those vested in the Bombay Legislature.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that, notwithstanding the decision in Triccam Panachand v. The Bombay, Baroda and Central India Railway Company (1), we ought now to hold that Wadhwan Civil Station is not part of British India. If that is so, then it follows that the accused must be convicted of the offence with which he was charged, and I would suggest that he be punished with a nominal fine of one rupee, seeing that the object of the appeal is not to secure this particular accused's punishment so much as to have a definite pronouncement as to the legal position of Wadhwan Civil Station.

HEATON, J.—I agree in the conclusion that the Wadhwan Civil Station is not part of British India, and I also agree that the decision in Queen-Empress v. Abdul Latib valad Abdul Rahiman (2) is in reality a binding authority in this case. Since that decision was pronounced, matters have progressed a good deal, arguments have been rife and decisions have been obtained. The subject is one which from time to time has occupied my attention, and I could, were I so disposed, deliver a very lengthy, however imperfect, judgment on the point now in dispute. But it seems to me quite unnecessary to do this; unnecessary for me to say more than that, I think, the decision given in Queen-Empress v. Abdul Latib valad Abdul Rahiman (2) was absolutely right.

I would only say a word or two about one argument which was advanced by Mr. Desai. He said: "It cannot be that the people who all their lives have supposed they were living in British India, who are governed by British Officials and subject to British laws, are in truth not living in British India at all but in a Native State."

Happily or unhappily it may be so. There are many places in other parts of the world where British laws are in force, where there are British Courts and British Officials, where there are people living to all intents and purposes under British Dominion, but which are in truth not part of His Majesty's Dominions. I would point out one more thing, and that is that, as a fact, these British laws, under which the inhabitants of the Wadhwan Civil Station are living, are applied to that particular place by a special process and do not apply of themselves; and I can imagine no more cogent circumstance for showing to thoughtful minds that Wadhwan Civil Station is in truth not a part of British India.

Appeal allowed.

GANPAT RAI—PETITIONER

versus

EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Petroleum Act (VIII of 1899), ss. 11, 15—Possession and transport of petroleum—Illegal possession by agent without principal's knowledge—Liability of principal.

Even though the Petroleum Act provides a personal penalty, the only person that can be punished is the one who keeps petroleum or carries it about or puts more than 500 gallons at one place.

There is no provision in the Act, as there is in the Excise Act and in the Motor Car Act, which makes the principal responsible for the acts of his agents or servants.

Therefore, if an agent of several persons in the sale of petroleum keeps more than 500 gallons in contravention of section 11 of the Petroleum Act, his principal is not responsible for this unless the latter knew that more than 500 gallons of petroleum was illegally kept on his license and allowed this to take place with such knowledge.

Rule against the order of the Deputy Magistrate of Palaman, dated April 4th, 1912, convicting the petitioner under section 15 (a) of the Petroleum Act, VIII of 1899, on each of three counts, and sentencing him to pay a fine of Rs. 50 on each count.

Babu Rajendra Prasad, for the Petitioner.

Babu Srish Chandra Chowdhury, Junior Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—We are of opinion that this Rule must be made absolute upon the grounds on which it was issued.

The law (Act VIII of 1899) lays down in section 11: "No quantity of petroleum exceeding 500 gallons shall be kept by any one person, or on the same premises, or shall be transported, except under, and in accordance with, the conditions of a license granted under this Act."

Now, it is found that a person, named Sheo Bhagwan, who was an agent of the petitioner and also apparently agent of several other persons in the sale of petroleum, imported or rather transported (for, we donot know how this petroleum was imported into this country) more than 150 tins at a time, and we are told that 150 tins is equal to the maximum allowed, viz., 500 gallons. If, therefore, Sheo Bhagwan transported more than 150 tins, he is guilty of transporting petroleum in contravention of the Act. But we are unable to see that the principal, Ganpat Rai, is responsible for this, unless there is a finding that he knew that more than 150 tins were being transported at one time on his license and allowed this to take place with such knowledge. Now, there is no finding to that effect.

The agent, Sheo Bhagwan, seems to have been allowed to give evidence and, of course, being himself the guilty person, he would naturally try to shift the balance on to his principal. He says that he did transport more than 150 tins for his principal at one time and despatched them in parcels of 150 gallons to the dealers. Still we are unable to say, there being no finding to that effect, that the petitioner was in any way responsible for this illegal proceeding.

The second point depends upon the first and has already been decided by us, namely, that the petitioner cannot be held criminally liable for any illegal act of the said agent. There is no provision, as far as we can see, in this Act, as there is in the Excise Act and in the Motor Car Act, which makes the principal responsible for the acts of his agents or servants and nothing can be read into the law which is not to be found in the law.

As regards the third ground, we have already referred to that. It relates to the contention of the petitioner that Sheo Bhagwan was agent for other firms as well as for the petitioner and that it is impossible for the petitioner to know how much petroleum was imported for his use and how much for that of the others. It is argued by the learned Vakil for the Crown that as Ganpat Rai took commission or profit of one pice per tin on every tin sold, he must have been aware of how many tins were in the possession of his agent at one time. This does not seem to us to be at all a necessary conclusion. A stock of 150 tins may be sold out gradually and be replenished from time to time and it is impossible for the absent principal to know whether at one time his agent had 150 tins on his behalf or on behalf of the other firms. Even though the Act provides a personal penalty, we think the only person that can be punished is the one who keeps petroleum or carries it about or puts more than 150 tins at one place.

For these reasons, the Rule must be made absolute and the conviction and sentence set aside. The fines, if paid, must be refunded.

Rule made absolute.

BUDHANKHAN INAYATKHAN—ACCUSED.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 414—Concealing stolen property—Owner of property not traced—Offence.

Section 414 of the Penal Code does not impose on the prosecution the requirement to trace in all cases the owners of the property stolen. All that is needed is to show that the accused voluntarily assisted in concealing or disposing of property which he had reason to believe to be stolen property. The latter fact may be proved from the accused's own conduct and actions.

Criminal Reference made by the Assistant Sessions Judge of Thana.

Mr. L. A. Shah, Acting Government Pleader, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—This is a Reference made to us by the Assistant Sessions Judge of Thana, who found himself unable to accept the verdict of the Jury. The accused Budhankhan valad Mithekhan alias Nathu Inayatkhan was committed for trial on charges under sections 414 and 75 of the Indian Penal Code. On the motion of the Public Prosecutor, a charge under section 411 was added in the Court of Session. The Jury by a majority acquitted the accused on the charge under section 411, but by a majority of 4 to 1 they found him guilty under section 414. It is because the Assistant Sessions Judge is unable to agree with the Jury that the charge under section 414 is proved that this Reference has been made.

EMPEROR v. BUDHANKHAN.

We do not understand the Assistant Sessions Judge to express any real dissent from the view which the Jury took of the effect of the evidence as to the matters of fact. We understand his reference to show that he doubted whether on the facts as stated by the prosecution witnesses, a conviction can legally be had. We are unable to share that doubt.

The facts stated for the prosecution were mainly these: the accused arrived at Palghar Station about 4 o'clock in the morning from the Surat train and crossed over from the up-platform to the down-platform. He was found to be without a ticket, and was, therefore, directed to stay in the passengers' shed outside the Station until the morning when the Station Master would arrive and see into the matter. The witness Keshav, the third class Head Constable, inquired of the accused what things he had in his possession, and the accused showed him a few annas and a knife, and that was all that could be found in his possession. About an hour later, the accused jumped over the railing of the passengers' shed and moved along towards the north. On being questioned as to where he was going, he said that he wanted to drink water. The porter showed him the water-pipe towards the south, but the accused, as if bent on something other than drinking water, went on towards the north. His conduct excited suspicion specially when he was seen to be searching for something near the railway track. Questioned by Keshav as to what he was looking for, he said he was looking for a rupee which he had thrown away. It was obviously unlikely that a Pathan cooly in possession of only a few annas should throw away a whole rupee; and the explanation naturally did not satisfy the mind of Keshav. Keshav called other men to his assistance, and they all searched about the railway line, pretending to assist the accused to recover what he had lost. Suddenly one of the searchers came upon two gold bangles, and cried out that he had found them. At that moment, the accused took off his shoes and ran away. He was, however, pursued and captured and the discovery of the bangles was recorded in a properly executed panchnama. The value of the bangles was Rs. 38. They were made of gold and were such as would be appropriate to children of the wealthier classes. They were obviously singular and inappropriate as part of the personal belongings of a poor Pathan cooly. This, indeed, was recognized by the accused himself, who throughout has laid no claim to be entitled to the bangles. His defence has been that he has no connection with them whatever.

We see no reason to distrust the evidence, of which the purport has been given above, and which rests upon witnesses against whom no motive for false statement can reasonably be assigned. It is noteworthy that the bangles were not casually dropped about the railway track, but were found carefully placed one on each side of the railway line. The inference is that they were so placed by the accused in the hope that, after he had been released in the matter of his travelling without a ticket, he could return to the spot and recover the ornaments from their place of concealment. His whole conduct appears to us conclusively to show that it was he who deposited the bangles by the railway line, and that he was conscious that he had no title to the property. That being so, we are unable to perceive the force of the Assistant Sessions Judge's objection that there is no affirmative evidence in the case to show from whom or in what circumstances the bangles became stolen property. It is clearly impossible to expect in all cases, including cases of petty losses, that the Police should be able to trace the owners of the property stolen; nor, we think, does section 414 impose any such requirement on the prosecution. All that is needed is to show that the accused voluntarily assisted in concealing or disposing of property which he had reason to believe to be stolen property. Here the accused's own conduct from the beginning to the end clearly indicates that he had reason to believe, and did believe, that these ornaments were stolen property. It is, moreover, proved that he was in possession of the property: this consists of valuable gold ornaments of which accused would not ordinarily be in honest possession; and he has declined to explain or justify his possession. Further, his actions in connection with the ornaments amounted to voluntarily assisting in conealing or disposing or making away with this property; and we, therefore, agree with the majority of the Jury that the charge against him was proved.

The accused being thus convicted under section 414, it will be necessary that he should be tried further under section 75, Indian Penal Code, and an appropriate sentence passed having regard to the results of that trial. For this purpose, we record a conviction under section 414 and remand the case for further disposal to the Sessions Court.

Case remanded.

MISCELLANEOUS APPEAL No. 431 OF 1912.
November 19, 1912.

Present:—Sir Henry Richards, Kt., Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Tudball and Mr. Justice Chamier.

In the matter of HAR PRASAD SINGH, VAKIL.

Legal Practitioners Act (XVIII of 1879), s. 13—Professional misconduct—High Court Rules, Chapter XV, rule 25—General Civil Courts Rules, 1911, Chapter XXI, rule 37—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, r. 73.

If a Pleader, acting for a decree-holder, purchases the property sold in execution of his client's decree, he is guilty of professional misconduct. The evil is equally great if he purchases the property for other persons.

Therefore, where, in execution of his client's decree, a Pleader made apurchase on behalf of his father, the Court held him guilty of misconduct.

Per Chamier, J.—Rule 37 of Chapter XXI of the General Rules, Civil, 1911, applies even to a Pleader of the High Court, when he is practising in the Subordinate Courts.

Reference made by the District Judge of Banda.

Dr. Sunder Lal (with him Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru, Messrs. Peare Lal Banerji, Damodar Das and Umashanker Bajpai), for the Vakil.

Mr. Ryves, in support of Reference.

JUDGMENT.

RICHARDS, C. J.—This is a Reference with regard to the alleged misconduct of one Har Prasad Singh, a Vakil practising in the Court of the Subordinate Judge at Banda. It appears that the Delhi and London Bank obtained a decree and that Har Prasad Singh was acting for the Bank. Certain property was put up to sale. The first sale proved abortive. On the same day, the property was put up a second time and portion of it was purchased by Har Prasad Singh on behalf of his father. There can be little doubt that Har Prasad Singh who was living with his father must in a sense have been interested in the purchase. He might possibly succeed and naturally he would desire to obtain as good a bargain for his father as he reasonably could. He has been reported by the learned Subordinate Judge as having contravened rule 25 of the High Courts Rules, Chapter XV and rule 37 of the Civil Courts Rules Chapter XXI. Rule 25 of the High Courts Rules, provides that "No Advocate, Attorney or Vakil shall, in his own name or in the name or names of any other person or persons, purchase any property or any share or interest in any property sold in the execution of a decree or order in any suit, appeal or other proceeding in which he was in any way professionally engaged." Rule 37 of the Civil Courts Rules is as follows:—"Except in the case permitted by clause (13) of Rule 10, no Legal Practitioner shall, at a sale in execution of a decree in a suit in which he has been professionally engaged, bid for or purchase, whether in his own or in any other name for his own benefit or for the benefit of any other person any property sold in execution of such decree.

"Any Legal Practitioner contravening this rule will be held guilty of misconduct within the meaning of Act XVIII of 1879 and be dealt with accordingly."

It will be observed that rule 25 differs very slightly from rule 37, except for the provision at the end. There can be little doubt that the evil of an Advocate, Attorney or Vakil purchasing for other persons is practically as great as if he purchased on his own behalf. It must, however, be admitted that rule 25 is possibly open to the construction that it only prohibits purchases being made by an Advocate, Attorney or Vakil on his own behalf. There is no doubt whatever that the matter is specifically dealt with by rule 37 of Chapter XXI of the Civil Courts Rules. There it is expressly laid down that a purchase cannot be made for any one and that the legal practitioner, which includes, of course, a Vakil, is even prohibited from bidding at the sale. It has not been seriously contended that the High Court was not empowered to make this rule under its inherent jurisdiction or under section 15 of the Charter Act. However, having regard to the facts set forth in the affidavit, which has been filed on behalf of Har Prasad Singh, the testimonials of his previous good conduct, I think that his action in contravening the rule was either done in forgetfulness or on the spur of the moment, and I think that under all the circumstances of this particular case, it is unnecessary for this Court to take any action under section 8 of the Letters Patent.

I wish to say that I hope that this will be a warning not only to Har Prasad Singh but also to other Legal Practitioners that the rules of the Court must be implicitly obeyed.

TUDBALL, J.—I agree with the Chief Justice that in the circumstances of the present case, it is unnecessary to do more than to warn the Vakil concerned. I have personally, no doubt whatsoever, that he knew he was breaking a rule of the Court, which he was bound to obey, but that he did so on the spur of the moment as he was unable to make any other arrangement for the acquisition of the property by his father. It is only in view of his character and the fact that he has only five years' experience at the Bar that I remain content with warning him and taking no further action against him. In my opinion, rule 37 of Chapter XXI of the Civil Courts Rules and rule 25 of the High Courts Rules, Chaper XV have practically one and the same meaning, and I should like it to be well understood by all the members of the Bar that that is so, and that the action of which the Vakil in the present instance has been guilty, was an action which in the future will not go unpunished.

CHAMIER, J.—I agree that it is unnecessary to do more than warn the Vakil in the present case. But I wish to add a few words in view of the discussion which has taken place in regard to rule 37 of Chapter XXI of the General Rules, Civil, 1911. It has been suggested that a Vakil of this Court when practising in the Subordinate Courts is not bound by this rule. It seems to me that there is no force whatever in this suggestion. The rule applies to all Legal Practitioners practising in the subordinate Courts. Then, it was contended that this Court had no power to make such a rule. It seems to me that if statutory or legislative authority is required to support this rule, it is to be found in section 15 of the Indian High Courts Act, 1861. But whether the rule is valid or not as a rule, it has been in existence for about 30 years and it shows that for that period this Court has considered that conduct of the kind now in question is most objectionable and will be dealt with as misconduct under the Legal Practitioners Act. I am of opinion that the rule contains a most salutary provision and that serious notice should be taken of any deliberate disregard of it. In the present case, I am prepared to accept the affidavit of the Vakil that he acted on the spur of the moment and in view of his previous good character, I agree that no further action need be taken.

BY THE COURT.—Let the papers be filed.

CRIMINAL REFERENCE No. 83 OF 1912.

August 26, 1912.

Present:—Mr. Justice Batchelor and Mr Justice Rao.

In re, RAMJIBHAI WAGHJIBHAI—APPLICANT.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 87, 88, 110, 112, 114—Warrant for arrest of person who had left Court's jurisdiction—Proclamation—Attachment of property.

A Magistrate cannot legally issue a warrant under section 114, Criminal Procedure Code, for the arrest of a person who has already left the local limits of the Magistrate's jurisdiction. The person proceeded against must be actually and physically present in the district in which the Magistrate exercises jurisdiction.

Where a warrant under section 114 was issued for the arrest of a person who had left the district and subsequently a proclamation against the person was issued and proceedings taken under sections 87, 88, Criminal Procedure Code:

Held, that the warrant, proclamation and attachment were all illegal.

Reference made by the Sessions Judge of Ahmedabad.

GROUNDS OF REFERENCE.

I am of the opinion that the Magistrate could not legally issue a warrant. I do not mean that he had no power in a Chapter

VIII case to issue a warrant under section 114 without a formal finding as to the desperate and dangerous nature of the accused. But it does seem to me that when a Magistrate is informed that a person has left the district, this cannot possibly be information that the same is in the local limits of his jurisdiction as required in section 110.

It will be observed that section 110 does not say a person "residing" in his district whereby technical "residence" on the lines of the Civil Procedure Code might give the Magistrate jurisdiction. But the person proceeded against must, I think, be actually and physically present at the district. I suppose the object of the Chapter being to prevent commission of future crime and not to punish past crime, this object is equally subserved by the person who is hostile to public order voluntarily banishing himself as by his being bound over. I think then the Magistrate could not legally issue a warrant under section 114. If so, he could not legally issue a proclamation: (vide section 87); and that the proceedings under sections 87 and 83 are, therefore, illegal and should be set aside.

I am not able to interfere directly as matters have not yet reached the stage where section 405, Criminal Procedure Code, applies. The "accused" has not come in and surrendered, and is not, I suppose, likely to do so both for general reasons and because his co-accused have been ordered to be bound over under section 112 with a condition as to the quality of sureties which is of doubtful legality.

I might have had some doubts as to whether any Court could interfere under the Criminal Procedure Code but vide the case of Imperator v. Jina Badhar (1). The only question in my mind is, whether a proclamation cannot be issued when a warrant even if illegal has been issued and evaded.

Mr. G. N. Thakore, for the Applicant.

JUDGMENT.—There is no appearance in this case for the District Magistrate though notice has been served upon him. In these circumstances, we have not had the advantage of arguments in support of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate's proceedings. But upon the best consideration we can give to the matter, we take the same view as the learned Sessions Judge has expressed in his reference; and for the reasons there appearing, we hold that the warrant, proclamation and attachment in this case were illegal. We, therefore, set them aside, and direct the attachment to be raised.

Order accordingly.

CRIMINAL REVISION PETITION NO. 803 OF 1912.

November 30, 1912.

Present:—Mr. Justice Tudball.

JABBAR SINGH—APPLICANT

versus

EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

U. P. Municipalities Act (I of 1900), s. 128, cls. (h), (i)—Municipal Rules—"Dandidar," meaning of—Seller.

A dandidar, who only weighs things brought to a market to be sold, is not a seller of those things.

Application to revise an order of the Magistrate of Cawnpore.

Mr. Purushottam Das Tandan, for the Applicant.

Mr. Malcomson, for the Crown.

ORDER.—The applicant, Jabbar Singh, has been convicted of a breach of the Municipal Rules made by the Municipality of Cawnpore and has been sentenced to fifty rupees fine, the maximum punishment allowed. The rule is one, which purports to have been made under section 128 clauses (h), (i), for the regulation of the Collector Gunj market, in the Cawnpore Municipality. Rule 2 of these rules recites: "No retail transaction shall be permitted in the market except in the street known as the 'Pharyas street' and on a strip of land lying on both sides of and extending back eight feet from the pacca road traversing the market and leading from the Kotwali to the Bawan Dukan. Retail sales are only permitted subject to the payment of rent at the rate of eight annas per square yard per month for the area occupied and subject also to the condition that neither grain nor vegetables shall be sold.

For the purpose of these rules any transaction in which less than a cart load of produce is sold shall be considered retail transaction. The fees shall be collected and brought to account in accordance with the provision of the Municipal Account Code. Rule 4 says:—"Any person who sells retail in the market otherwise than in accordance with rule 2 shall be punishable with fine which may extend to Rs. 50." The case which was brought against the appellant was that he had sold gur retail on that portion of the market which was restricted to wholesale transactions. The Bench Magistrates, before whom the case came, found, as a matter of fact, that the transaction in regard to which the accused was charged had taken place on that portion of the land specially set aside for "retail" transactions. But the Court convicted him because he had not paid rent at the rate of eight annas per square yard per month prior to the transaction in question. Among other defences, the applicant pleaded that he was a mere dandidar or a weighman and that as such he was neither a seller nor a buyer nor an agent of either. The Bench Magistrates held that he was a dandidar, but they held that because the dandidars frequently arrange a sale between the seller and the buyer or rather they frequently bring the buyer and the seller together, therefore, the man who weighs produce in the market is a person who sells. I may note here that certain points of law are raised on behalf of the applicant which go to the root of these rules and the validity and the legality thereof. But I do not propose to waste time in deciding any question of law, when clearly upon the facts of the case the applicant has not committed any breach of the rule itself. Rule 2 says that retail sales are only permitted subject to payment of rent. The rule is cumbersome and unwieldy and I should think most difficult indeed to work. It is urged that the applicant should have gone and paid rent at the rate of eight annas per square yard per month prior to carrying out the sale. It was alleged that he had sold in this manner previously and was warned. But the Bench Magistrates very much doubted the truth of that evidence. It seems to me extremely doubtful that rule 4 of these Rules was ever intended to be used in the manner in which it is being used in this case, that is to say, to fine a man because he has not paid a fee which was due to the Municipal Board. There is nothing to show that any demand was ever made for payment or that he ever refused to pay. The definition of retail sale is quite unworkable. It is according to the rule a sale of anything less than a cart load of produce. Carts vary in size, from a hand cart to a camel cart and bullock cart carrying forty maunds. It would almost be open to any one to say that he sold within the meaning of this rule if he carried a toy cart load of produce to the market and sold it there. Even if the applicant had been the actual seller in the present case it would be difficult to hold, in the face of these rules, that he sold less than a cart load. But it is quite clear that the applicant was neither the seller nor the buyer. In the present transaction, he sold neither retail nor wholesale. He may or may not have brought the buyer and the seller together. The only part he took in the transaction was the weighing of the produce and receiving of payment for his services as a weighman. It was not his duty to pay rent for the land nor was he liable to pay any such rent. He has committed no breach of rules and, therefore, ought not to have been convicted. I, therefore, accept the application and set aside the conviction and sentence. The fine, if paid, will be refunded. In my opinion, the Municipal Board would be wise if it revised its rules and brought them a little more in accordance with common sense.

Application accepted.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 304-A—Injuries inflicted intentionally—Section not applicable.

Section 304A of the Penal Code deals with the causing of death by a rash or negligent act. It does not apply to a case where injuries are inflicted neither rashly nor negligently, but intentionally and designedly.

Queen-Empress v. Nidamarti, 7 M. H. C. R. 119, followed.

Messrs. S. Karnad and V. R. Sirur, for the Accused.

JUDGMENT.—We are of opinion that the Magistrate, Mr. Kittur, has failed properly to understand the nature of this offence. He finds that the three accused severely beat the deceased man with a piece of stone and with a stick; that they kicked him with their sandalled boots in the stomach. Within a week of the injuries thus inflicted, peritonitis supervened and the deceased died of that malady after seven days. It is just possible on the record to suggest a doubt whether the peritonitis was the consequence of the injuries, and for this reason we have refrained from ordering the accused's commitment for trial on a far more serious charge. It is certain, however, that the injuries were such as to endanger life within the meaning of section 320 of the Indian Penal Code, and the three accused are, consequently, guilty of voluntarily causing grievous hurt under section 325. But the Magistrate has convicted them under section 304-A or in the alternative under section 323 of voluntarily causing simple hurt.

Section 304-A deals with the causing of death by a rash and negligent act, and on its very face has nothing in the world to do with a case where injuries are inflicted, not rashly, not negligently, but intentionally and designedly as was the case here on the Magistrate's own finding. The meaning of section 304-A is well explained in the case of Queen-Empress v. Nidamurti (1), where Mr. Justice Holloway, in dealing with a similar case, to which section 304-A had been mistakenly applied, said: "This section is, in our opinion, wholly inapplicable to the facts of this case. Culpable rashness is acting with the consciousness that the mischievous and illegal consequences may follow, but with the hope that they will not, and often with the belief that the actor has taken sufficient precautions to prevent their happening. The imputability arises from acting despite the consciousness. Culpable negligence is acting without the consciousness that the illegal and mischievous effect will follow, but in circumstances which show that the actor has not exercised the caution incumbent upon him, and that if he had, he would have had the consciousness. The imputability arises from the neglect of the civic duty of circumspection. It is manifest that personal injury, consciously and intentionally caused, cannot fall within either of these categories."

Reference may also be made to the decision of this Court in King-Emperor v. Heera Joceta (2).

We must set aside the conviction and sentences of the lower Court and convict each of the three accused persons of the offence of voluntarily causing grievous hurt under section 325, Indian Penal Code, and direct that each of them be rigorously imprisoned for a term of two years. The fines, if paid, should be refunded.

Order accordingly.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), s. 401—Association for the purpose of habitual theft.

The essential requisites for a conviction under section 401 of the Penal Code are:—(1) proof of association, and (2) proof that the association was for purposes of habitual theft.

The accused, in company with three others, whose whereabouts were unknown, came to a village. They were regarded with suspicion, and on being challenged ran away, but in the pursuit, the accused was caught. It was not shown who the others were, or whether they had before been seen together in the neighbourhood, or at some other place under suspicious circumstances, or that any one of them had ever been suspected or found guilty of theft or robbery:

Held, (1) that the conviction under section 401 of the Penal Code could not be sustained;

(2) that the fact that the accused had at one time been bound over under section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code, was immaterial.

Afridi v. Emperor, 9 P. R. 1880 Cr. and Nankura v. Emperor, 27 C. 139, followed.

Appeal from the order of the District Magistrate, Jhelum, dated the 7th April 1912, convicting the appellant.

Mr. Nand Lal, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—The appellant, Ishar Das, a Khatri of Tal in the Kohat District, has been convicted by the District Magistrate of Jhelum of an offence under section 401, Indian Penal Code, and has been sentenced to seven years' rigorous imprisonment, including three months' solitary confinement.

The facts, as found by the District Magistrate, are not disputed. On the 21st February last, at mid-day the appellant was seen in company with three Pathans near a tank, known as the Loharanwali Band, not far from the village of Chumbi, Tahsil Chakwal. Later in the afternoon, he and his companions were discovered sitting by the roadside on the top of the hill overlooking the Kallar Kahar plateau, and shortly afterwards the four men followed a goat-herd, Bakhsh, towards Chumbi. Bakhsh informed the villagers of the suspicious character of this gang of Pathans, and the villagers accordingly formed themselves into two parties, one setting out in pursuit of the Pathans and the other going up the high ground close to the village to watch the operations of their friends. The first party saw the Pathans following two Musallis of the village, and on their inquiring from the latter as to who the men were that were following them, the Pathans, including the appellant, who was dressed as a Pathan, at first halted, and thereafter, on being challenged, fled away. The villagers gave chase, upon which the Pathans fired three shots at them, but one of them, Allah Dad, overtook and knocked down with a stone the appellant and secured him until the other villagers came up and he was then taken to the village and searched. No arms were found in his possession, but he had some matches and wax and string.

The Police investigation followed and in due course, the appellant was sent up for trial under section 400, Indian Penal Code. The District Magistrate, however, framed a charge against him under section 401, Indian Penal Code, and he has convicted him under the same section. The question for decision in this appeal is whether upon the facts as stated above the appellant has been rightly convicted of an offence under section 401, in other words, whether upon these facts it can be held that the appellant belonged to a wandering, or other gang of persons associated for the purpose of habitually committing theft or dacoity. In my opinion, the appellant's case does not fall within the purview of section 401, and he has been wrongly convicted under that section. I agree with the District Magistrate that the explanation of his movements given by the appellant is not very satisfactory, and that his presence and behaviour in the neighbourhood of Chumbi, on the day in question, in the company of three Pathans were certainly suspicious. But it has not been shown at all what sort of men those Pathans were and whether they had ever been seen together in that neighbourhood or at some other place under suspicious circumstances, nor is it proved that either the appellant or any one of his Pathan companions has ever been suspected or found guilty of theft or robbery. The whereabouts of those Pathans are unknown, and the only thing against the appellant's character is that he was once, as admitted by himself, bound over under section 110, Criminal Procedure Code. I fail to see how, under these circumstances, section 401, Indian Penal Code, applies to the appellant's case. The essential ingredients of an offence under that section have been explained in Afridi v. Emperor (1) and Nankura Pasi v. Emperor (2) and following those decisions, I hold that it has not been proved that Ishar Das, appellant, belonged to a wandering gang of persons associated for purposes of habitually committing theft or robbery.

I, accordingly, accept this appeal and setting aside the conviction and sentence of the appellant, acquit him.

suit—Evidence—Admissibility of judgment in civil suit between parties relating to same subject-matter—Whether conclusive proof—Pleader engaging in trade—Carrying on family trade—Misconduct—Failure to report to High Court—Punishment.

A Pleader is amenable to the disciplinary jurisdiction of the High Court for failure to appear for his client at the trial of the cause after receiving the fees thereof or, in the event of unavoidable circumstances precluding his appearance, for failure to make the necessary arrangement for his client.

The judgment in a civil suit between the Pleader and his client, relating to the subject-matter of the inquiry against the Pleader under the Legal Practitioners Act, is admissible in the latter inquiry to establish at least a prima facie case against the Pleader but such judgment will not be conclusive proof and the Pleader is entitled to adduce additional evidence in such proceedings in rebuttal of the charges against him.

The purchase of an actionable claim by a Pleader amounts to professional misconduct, the more so when the claim has been put in Court and is ripe for judgment.

Failure to obtain the sanction of High Court before a Pleader engages in trade, is in contravention of rule 27 of the rules under the Act.

Per Sundara Aiyar, J.—In the absence of an agreement that the fee promised should be previously paid, it is doubtful whether a plea of non-payment of a part of the fee would be of any avail in an action against the Pleader under the Legal Practitioners Act.

Mere negligence, as the omission by a Pleader to do his duty, may not amount to misconduct. But where the negligence is gross or where the Pleader falsely repudiates an agreement that he had entered into with his client, he is amenable to the disciplinary jurisdiction of the High Court.

The judgment in the civil suit will be relevant under section 11 of the Evidence Act.

The judgment will not be admissible where the conduct of the Pleader was not the direct issue in the Court which found him guilty of misconduct, but only arose incidentally in a litigation between other parties.

In the matter of Rajendro Nath Mukerji, 22 A. 49; 26 I. A. 242; 3 C. W. N. 736, referred to.

A Pleader, who belongs to a trading family should not be regarded as trading simply because other members carry on the trade, the benefit of which would go to all the members of the family, including the Pleader. But if all the members enter into a partnership and carry on a family trade as partners, then all of them must be regarded as carrying on the trade.

Per Sankaran Nair, J.—A Vakil is bound to appear in Court and conduct his client's case even if the fee or any portion thereof remains unpaid, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary or at least notice to that effect to the client in sufficient time to enable him to make other arrangements.

The High Court has not declared, under section 13 of the Legal Practitioners Act, that it is unprofessional for a Pleader to follow any trade or business, especially where Pleaders belong to a joint family which is carrying on a family trade, but the omission to report this circumstance under rule 27 of the High Court Rules brings the defaulting Pleader under clause (b) or (f) of section 13 of the Legal Practitioners Act and renders him liable to punishment.

JUDGMENT.

REFERRED CASE NO. 9 OF 1912.

SUNDARA AIYAR, J.—This is a case of misconduct against a first grade Pleader practising in Bellary. One Muni Reddi lodged a complaint against the Pleader charging him with the misconduct for which he has been tried by the District Judge of Bellary. He subsequently withdrew his complaint, but as the District Judge had, before the withdrawal, already framed a charge against the Pleader, he proceeded with the inquiry, found him guilty of the misconduct charged, and made a report to this Court under section 14 of the Legal Practitioners Act.

The facts that led up to the charge are briefly as follows:—An inquiry into a charge of dacoity was going on about June 1908 in the Sub-Magistrate's Court of Tadpatri against Muni Reddi. The Pleader was engaged, according to Muni Reddi's case, to defend him both in the Magistrate's Court and in the Sessions Court of Bellary in the event of the case being committed to the Sessions Court for trial, and a fee of Rs. 350 was settled and paid for the Pleader's services in both Courts. The Pleader appeared in the Magistrate's Court but did not defend Muni Reddi in the Sessions Court. He left the District for Rangoon without making any arrangement for Muni Reddi's defence at the Sessions trial. Another Pleader had to be engaged for the defence. Muni Reddi was acquitted at the trial. He subsequently instituted a suit for the recovery of the fees paid by him with interest. It was transferred to the Subordinate Judge's Court of Bellary for trial. The Pleader defended the suit contending that his engagement with Muni Reddi was only to defend him in the Magistrate's Court and to put in a petition for bail in the Sessions Court, and did not include Muni Reddi's defence at the Sessions trial; that only Rs. 268 and not the whole of the Rs. 350 stipulated for was paid to him by Muni Reddi; that although Muni Reddi afterwards asserted that he had undertaken the defence in Sessions Court also, he repudiated any such agreement and that he had not failed to fulfil the engagement actually entered into by him. The Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit upholding the Pleader's defence. On appeal, the District Judge, Mr. Phillips, reversed the judgment of the Subordinate Judge and found the defendant's contentions to be untrue. He passed an order, under section 476 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, directing the prosecution of the Pleader for making a false statement on a comparatively unimportant point. The order was set aside by this Court in revision and it is unnecessary to refer to it further. Muni Reddi afterwards put in a petition against the Pleader under the Legal Practitioners Act, requesting that an inquiry should be made into the Pleader's conduct, but as already stated, he subsequently withdrew the petition. The charge framed against the Pleader was that having agreed to appear for Muni Reddi in the Sessions Court and received the fee for such appearance, he failed to appear, and, when asked to return the fee, he failed to do so, and that in defending the suit, filed by Muni Reddi, he denied receipt of part of the fees, and also denied that he was engaged to work in the Sessions Court; and that, therefore, he was guilty of fraudulent and improper conduct in the discharge of his professional duty, an offence under section 13 (b) of the Legal Practitioners Act. No fresh evidence was recorded in support of the charge and indeed there was no one to let in evidence as Muni Reddi had withdrawn his complaint. The Pleader evidently relied on the evidence he had already adduced in the civil suit but he also adduced some fresh evidence. He examined two witnesses and gave evidence again himself. He also put in his account books and diary which he had not filed in the civil suit. The District Judge, after considering the fresh evidence, adhered to the conclusions he had arrived at in his judgment in the appeal from the Subordinate Judge's decision in the civil suit.

Mr. Rangachariar, who has appeared for the Pleader at the hearing of the charge against the Pleader in this Court, has raised an objection which, if well founded, would go to the root of the whole proceedings before the District Judge and vitiate his report. That objection is that the Judge was wrong in considering the judgment or the evidence in the civil suit, that the proceedings in the suit were not admissible in evidence at all in the inquiry under the Legal Practitioners Act, which, he contended, was in the nature of a criminal trial and that the charges should have been established by evidence adduced at the inquiry. He argues that a judgment is not admissible in evidence in any judicial proceeding except in the cases covered by sections 40, 41 and 42 of the Indian Evidence Act, and that none of these sections is applicable to the present case. This contention I am entirely unable to accept. In In the matter of Rajendro Nath Mukerji(1), a Pleader, who had been convicted of fraudulently using as genuine a document which he knew to be forged, was proceeded against for misconduct under paragraph 8 of the Letters Patent of the Allahabad High Court. That Court not only regarded the judgment convicting the Pleader as good evidence of his misconduct but refused to allow the propriety of the conviction to be questioned at the inquiry, and removed his name from the rolls of the Court. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council upheld its procedure. Counsel, who appeared for the Pleader before the Privy Council, did not indeed question the admissibility of the criminal judgment in evidence but merely contended that the Court would not in consequence necessarily disbar him and that the learned Judges of the High Court went too far in not allowing the propriety of the conviction to be questioned which Counsel maintained was not justified either in law or in fact. The Privy Council dealing with this argument observed: "It is plain that the object of the present appeal is to have the judgments of the Sessions Judge and of the High Court on appeal reviewed and reversed in substance if not in form. This ought not to be allowed. In effect, the appellant would indirectly have an appeal against the conviction when, if he had petitioned for leave to appeal against it, the leave would certainly have been refused." These observations show that their Lordships treated the conviction as conclusive evidence of the offence of which the Pleader had been convicted. Their Lordships refer to the judgment of Lord Mansfield in In re Brounsall (2), where that learned Judge observed with reference to proceedings taken against a Solicitor who had been convicted of stealing a guinea. "This application is not in the nature of a second trial or new punishment, but the question is whether after that conduct of this man (that is in stealing the guinea, it does not say when, where or how), it is proper that he should continue a member of the profession which should stand free from all suspicion.....and it is on this principle that he is an unfit person to practise as an attorney." Lord Mansfield evidently appears to have regarded the conviction as evidence of the man having committed the offence of theft. Mr. Rangachariar contends that the case before the Allahabad High Court and the cases referred to in the Privy Council judgment therein are distinguishable from the present case, for in those cases the practitioner had been convicted of a serious criminal offence and that such a conviction apart from the question of his being really guilty of the offence or not, would be a sufficient ground for his being regarded as unfit to be a practitioner in a Court. It is, no doubt, true that a conviction for felony or other serious offence has been regarded as a sufficient ground for punishing a Solicitor or an Advocate for misconduct, and section 12 of the Legal Practitioners Act recognises and gives effect to this view. But what is the principle underlying it. The conviction itself is certainly not misconduct on the part of the Pleader convicted. Can it be said that whether the Pleader be guilty or not, he having been subjected to the infamy of a conviction, he must be further punished by the Court in its disciplinary jurisdiction over its practitioners? I do not think that this is the reason for punishing a Pleader. The Court is not bound to, nor does it always altogether, remove a Pleader from the exercise of his profession on the ground of his conviction of a criminal offence. It may inflict a lighter punishment by suspending him for a period. If the infamy due to conviction be the ground of punishment, one would suppose that it it makes him unfit to practise; he must be regarded as unfit to do so for ever and not for a period only. But as already observed, the Court, having regard to the gravity of the offence, the extenuating circumstances, if any, and taking all the facts of the case into consideration, has the power, in the interests of the public and of the profession, to award such punishment to the Pleader, or no punishment at all. I am of opinion that the reason for punishing a person who has been convicted is that the conviction is good evidence of the commission by the Pleader of the offence in question. But assuming that the conviction itself is regarded as good cause for punishing the Pleader, would not a similar principle apply where a Civil Court has found the Pleader guilty of grave misconduct which requires that he should be dealt with by the Court under its disciplinary jurisdiction? I see no reason why it should not. The principle would, of course, not apply where the conduct of the Pleader was not the direct issue in the Court which found him guilty of misconduct but only arose incidentally in a litigation between other parties. Such was the case in In re Lubeck (3). In this case, the suit related to the very misconduct charged against the Pleader in the present proceedings and I see no reason for holding that the judgment and the proceedings in the civil suit are not admissible in evidence. With respect to the contention that the judgment would not be relevant on the question of the Pleader's guilt under any of the sections of the Indian Evidence Act, I do not think it presents any serious difficulty. It appears to me, on the other hand, to be a rather bold argument to urge that the finding in proceedings against the Pleader in which the question was exactly the same as at the present inquiry should be regarded as irrelevant. There is no reason why it should not come within the provisions of section 11 of the Indian Evidence Act, which lays down that "Facts not otherwise relevant are relevant if by themselves or in connection with other facts they make the existence or non-existence of any fact in issue or relevant fact highly probable or improbable."

I have more doubt whether the finding of the Civil Court can be regarded as conclusive. In a criminal trial, the guilt of the accused has to be proved by the prosecution beyond all reasonable doubt and a Court convicting a Pleader of a criminal offence must be taken to have found the offence proved conclusively against him. But in a civil suit, the finding on the issue does not proceed on the conclusiveness of the evidence adduced on either side but on the balance of the evidence adduced on both sides. It might, for instance, be said that in this case, the District Judge could not be held to have decided in the civil suit that the plaintiff had proved by his evidence beyond all reasonable doubt that the Pleader had agreed to defend the plaintiff in the Sessions Court and that he had been paid his fee for doing so. It is unnecessary to decide this precise point in this case, for the District Judge did not treat his own previous judgment in the civil suit as conclusive against the Pleader, but allowed him to adduce any evidence he might choose. No complaint has been made before us that the Pleader was not allowed to let in any specific evidence or that he was prevented from further cross-examining any particular witness examined in the civil suit on any specific matter. I must, therefore, disallow this objection of Mr. Rangachariar.

The learned Vakil reviewed the evidence adduced in the civil suit and the fresh evidence adduced at this inquiry at considerable length and attempted to show that the findings of the Judge cannot be sustained. I have given to both the evidence and to Mr. Rangachariar's arguments the anxious consideration which any case against a professional gentleman deserves, but I am unable to differ from the conclusions of the Judge. I do not consider it necessary to repeat the reasons given by the Judge in his careful and elaborate judgment and shall only deal with the principal points urged by Mr. Rangachariar. The first question for decision is whether the Pleader undertook to defend Muni Reddi at the Sessions trial also, or whether he merely agreed to put in a bail petition so far as the Sessions Court was concerned.

[The learned Judge then considered the evidence on the point and held that he had no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the Pleader agreed to defend Muni Reddi in the Sessions Court also.]

Mr. Rangachariar's next contention is that assuming that the engagement included Muni Reddi's defence in the Sessions Court, as the whole of the Pleader's fee was not paid but only Rs. 268 out of Rs. 350, the Pleader was absolved from the duty to appear in the Sessions Court. Here again the Pleader starts with the initial difficulty that Exhibit B2 furnishes evidence against him in his own handwriting.* * * * * * I must hold on the evidence available to the Court that the sum of Rs. 95 was paid to the Pleader. Having regard to this finding, it is unnecessary to deal with the further question whether the non-payment of a portion of the fee would absolve the Pleader from his duty to appear for the client. In the absence of an agreement that the fee promised should be previously paid, it is, to say the least, very doubtful whether a plea of non-payment of part of the fee would be of any avail. * * * * * * A client is not generally in much haste to take proceedings against a Pleader of standing. It may be that Muni was prompted by others to make his complaint, but in the circumstances I do not think that any inference adverse to the truth of Muni's case can be drawn from his delay. I, therefore, hold it to be satisfactorily proved that the Pleader, after undertaking the defence of Muni at the Sessions trial and receiving payment for it, deliberately failed to make any arrangement for the defence on a false plea that he had not agreed to conduct the defence at the Sessions trial.

Mr. Rangachariar argued that if it should be found that the Pleader did undertake to appear for Muni in the Sessions Court, his default must have been due to forgetfulness on his part as he had arranged for his other cases during his absence. The District Judge was inclined to take this view in his judgment in the civil suit but this view is absolutely inconsistent not only with the Pleader's own contention both in the civil suit and at this inquiry but also with the evidence of his brother that he told Muni Reddi on the 14th October 1908 that the Pleader had not agreed to defend him at all in the Sessions Court. It is very difficult to believe that a Sessions case of so grave a nature in which the Pleader had appeared in the Magistrate's Court would have been forgotten. In Civil Revision Petition No. 321 of 1911 preferred by the Pleader against the judgment of the Judge in civil case, his Counsel stated that the Pleader might have forgotten the engagement. As this was inconsistent with the case that his engagement did not include the Sessions trial, Mr. Rangachariar was asked to explain the inconsistency and the Court was told that the statement in the memorandum of civil revision petition was made by Counsel without instructions. In the circumstances, I am unable to accept the suggestion made as a last resort that forgetfulness might have been the reason for the Pleader not arranging for the defence.

It is argued for the Pleader that even if all the facts are found against him, they amount only to negligence and that the Pleader cannot be punished for mere negligence not amounting to fraud. I am of opinion that what is proved amounts to something worse than negligence; nor am I prepared to accept the contention that a Pleader who is wilfully and grossly negligent in the discharge of his duties cannot be punished for his misconduct in the exercise of our disciplinary powers. The Pleader was not guilty of a mere omission to do his duty in this case. He repudiated the agreement into which he had entered with his client and he did so deliberately and without justification. I cannot say that this amounts to anything less than fraudulent conduct on his part.

A passage in Cordery on Solicitors, page 180, was referred to on behalf of the Pleader. I do not think that that passage lays down anything more than that it is not all negligence which would furnish a cause of action to a client that would be punished by the Court. Certainly that is so. For instance, a Pleader may not have acted with sufficient diligence in the discharge of his duties. He may not have instructed himself in the facts or the law of a case as he should. He may have acted contrary to the client's instructions in some particular matters, or he may have acted without instructions. In such cases, the Court would generally be content with leaving the client to his remedy in an action for damages. But negligence may also be so gross and amount to such a violation of the duties of a Pleader as an officer of the Court and to the litigant and as a member of a responsible and honourable profession as to require that the Court should punish him in the exercise of its powers over its officers. The rule to be followed has been very recently laid down by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in its judgment in a case in which a Vakil of this Court was concerned. See the judgment dated 20th June 1912, In the matter of G. Krishnaswami Aiyar (4). In that case, the Pleader was acquitted of all direct and personal fraud, but he was found guilty of not exercising any control over his clerks who omitted to discharge their duties and wrote false letters to the client and misled him, and of a grave omission in not informing the Court and the client of the true state of things after he had discovered the improper conduct of his clerks. Lord Shaw in delivering the judgment of the Privy Council observes: "Their Lordships, while not interfering, as stated, with his acquittance of direct and personal fraud, do not see their way to acquit him of conduct in the management of the appeal and of his client's affairs which caused the procedure of the Court to be the very opposite of what all such procedure should be, namely, first, responsible, secondly, orderly, and thirdly, pure. In all these respects, there has been a violation of the proprieties which attach to legal procedure." And their Lordships expressed the hope that the Vakil 'in the management by those under him of affairs committed to his charge, would, in future, see to it, that such improprieties as those referred to do not recur.' These statements clearly show that their Lordships were of opinion that gross negligence, which interfered with the responsible, orderly and pure conduct of proceedings in Court, would be punishable. The same rule has been laid down in America. "Professional misconduct or neglect of duty as an attorney is a good ground for suspension or disbarment."—Cyclopædia of Law and Procedure, Vol. IV, page 911. The jurisdiction of the Courts in punishing improper conduct on the part of Pleaders is expressed in very wide terms in the Legal Practitioners Act. Section 13 clause (f) provides that a Pleader may be punished for any other reasonable cause. It is not in the interest of clients whose interests Pleaders are bound to protect, or of the profession to which they belong, or of the pure administration of justice, to attempt to define exhaustively the different kinds of misconduct which are punishable. Any conduct, which contravenes the orderly and pure administration of justice, would be within the disciplinary jurisdiction of the Courts. The Pleader in this case is a person of long experience, and his defence to the charges against him has only aggravated his misconduct. It is not necessary to deal separately with the charge that he made a false defence in the civil suit. I wish to say nothing which would deprive Pleaders of the privileges in the conduct of their own suits which other litigants possess But it is impossible not to regard the Pleader's defence as a serious aggravation of his prior misconduct.

I agree with the learned Chief Justice as to the punishment that should be imposed on the Pleader.

REFERRED CASE NO. 10 OF 1912.

SUNDARA AIYAR, J.—In this case, two charges were preferred against the 1st grade Pleader; first that he trafficked jointly with one Marwadi Vannajee in an actionable claim put into Court obtained by Yadalla Pichayya and Papayya against the minor heirs of one Virabhadrappa in a suit in which he was plaintiff's Vakil; secondly, that he had been and was engaged in trade under the name of K. V. S. Ramchander and Co. The District Judge, Mr. B. C. Smith, in his report to this Court has found both the charges proved. After full consideration of the evidence on record, I concur in the findings arrived at by the District Judge. It is not necessary to do more than to refer very briefly to the evidence in support of the charges.

First charge.—On the 7th September 1909, an agreement was entered into between Pichayya and Papayya, the plaintiffs in Original Suit No. 3 of 1910, on the file of the Subordinate Judge's Court of Bellary, on the one hand and Vannajee on the other hand for the transfer of the claim of the former in Original Suit No. 3 of 1910, which was then pending for a sum of Rs. 4,750. The amount claimed was about Rs. 10,000. The evidence in the suit had been recorded but judgment had not been delivered. The transferee Vannajee was to take all risk of loss in case the suit was dismissed. The 1st grade Pleader represented the plaintiffs in the suit. According to the evidence of Papayya, one of the transferors, his fee for the suit had been paid prior to the transfer. The case of the petitioner, who made the complaint against the 1st grade Pleader, is that the transfer was wholly or partially for the benefit of the Pleader himself. The most important fact proved against the Pleader is that half of the profit which Vannajee made out of the bargain was paid to him. Vannajee sold his claim to one Veerabhadrappa, the 2nd witness for the petitioner, for Rs. 6,392-8-0. The profit made by Vannajee, according to himself, was Rs. 1,571-4-0 and of this amount, exactly one half, i.e., Rs. 785-10-0 was received by the Pleader. A sum of Rs. 70-12-0 was deducted out of the total amount of Rs. 6,392-8-0 as the interest on the loan contracted by Vannajee at 6 per cent. per annum for the consideration paid by him for the transfer. The amount was borrowed from the firm of a banker S. Donga Chand. It is not denied that the Pleader became responsible to the banker for the payment of the amount. The Pleader's case is that he merely became surety to the banker for the loan which Vannajee took from him. Vannajee was the gumastah of one Kannajee. The Pleader gave a letter or chit to Vannajee addressed to the banker. This letter was dated 9th September 1909. It is stated on behalf of the Pleader that the money had been paid by the banker to Vannajee on the 7th before he gave the letter. The 1st witness for the petitioner, Sivaraj, a partner of the banker, states the banker's account contains an entry, dated 7th September 1909, debiting Kannajee through Vannajee with Rs. 4,000. On the 9th September, the debt was transferred to the Pleader, Kannajee being credited with the amount on the date. This might go to show that the Pleader's connection with the loan commenced only after it was actually advanced by the banker but the inference does not necessarily follow. The reason for the alteration of the entry was that Vannajee objected to the entry in the name of Kannajee as he claimed the benefit of the transfer of the claim himself. It is quite clear that on the 9th, it was agreed that the Pleader should be regarded as the person mainly responsible to the banker for the payment of the loan. Now why did the Pleader agree to make himself responsible for the amount? The answer suggested by the payment of half the profits to him undoubtedly is that it was understood that he and Vannajee should go shares in the bargain. The Pleader in his written statement does not give any explanation of his receipt of Rs. 785-10-0. He merely denies the allegation that he was interested in the purchase of the claim and states that there was nothing against law, rules or public policy even if he was interested in it. After the witnesses in the present proceedings were examined, the Pleader made another short statement (not on oath) and offered himself for cross-examination. He gave no explanation of the receipt of Rs. 785-10-0 in this statement either. In cross-examination, he admitted his receipt of the amount (the payment being made directly to his father-in-law). He also stated:—"This Rs. 785-10-0 might have been partly remuneration for spending my time in negotiating the transaction and preparing the necessary documents. I have no account to show the sum due for each piece of Work done." This affords no satisfactory explanation. He does not say that the whole amount was paid for his services in bringing about the transfer. He admits that the amount was not entered in his accounts as fees and gives an extraordinary explanation that only remuneration for work done in Court is entered as fees in his accounts. He entered the amount under family earnings. Papayya, the transferor of the claim, says that he had paid to the Pleader the fee due to him for the conduct of the suit. This is likely as the case was almost ripe for judgment when the transfer was made. If the amount was not paid as fees due for professional work, then the payment must have been on account of a half share possessed by the Pleader in the claim by virtue of the transfer. Vannajee, who tries to support the Pleader as much as he can, is equally unable to show how the amount of Rs. 785-10-0 was made up. He tries to make out that he promised to pay the Pleader his fee and a present but he could not give any explanation as to how the fee would amount to Rs. 785-10-0. He admits that that amount was paid to the Pleader. He says that the interest payable on the loan was $7\frac{1}{2}$ annas and not 6 per cent. so as to throw doubt on the amount available for division between him and the Pleader. But he admits that the profit made out of the transaction was Rs. 1,571-4-0 and he also admits that he charged the Pleader 8 annas per Rs. 100 interest on his whole account including the sum of Rs. 4,000. There is absolutely nothing to support his statement that $7\frac{1}{2}$ annas and not 6 per cent. was the interest payable on the loan. In the absence of any explanation forthcoming from the Pleader, I have no doubt that the Judge was justified in coming to the conclusion that it was agreed between him and Vannajee that he should receive half the profits arising from the transfer of the claim. It is immaterial to consider whether he became interested in the transfer on the 7th September, or only on the 9th. The Judge's conclusion is strongly supported by the evidence of the petitioner's 2nd witness who purchased the claim from Vannajee. He states that he negotiated the purchase with the Pleader without any reference to Vannajee and that the payment of the consideration was made to the latter at the instance of the former. Papayya, who does not admit that the Pleader had a share in the claim, admits that the negotiations for the transfer to Vannajee took place at the Pleader's house.

The next question is whether the Pleader's act in purchasing the claim amounts to grossly unprofessional misconduct within the meaning of section 13 of the Legal Practitioners Act. The claim was then the subject-matter of a suit in which the Pleader appeared for the plaintiff. The defendants in the suit possessed large properties but were in involved circumstances. Papayya says that it was broadly rumoured that his suit would fail and the Pleader admits that his client told him that the defendants were giving out that the suit would be dismissed. There can be no doubt that the plaintiffs were apprehensive of failure. The Pleader, on the other hand, was in a far better position than his client to judge of the chances of success. There can be no doubt that the transfer was a highly speculative one. There is no force whatever in the contention that the claim ceased to be actionable because a suit had been instituted for its enforcement. That fact is absolutely immaterial according to the definition of 'actionable claim' in section 3 of the Transfer of Property Act. The old definition contained in section 130 of Act IV 1882 and clause (d) of section 135, as it originally stood, put this beyond a doubt. Mr. Rangachariar on behalf of the Pleader contends that a purchase of an actionable claim is not necessarily unprofessional conduct. Mr. K. Srinivasa Aiyangar, who appears on behalf of the Vakils' Association supports this argument. I am quite unable to accept this contention. Section 136 enacts as follows: "No Judge, Legal Practitioner or Officer connected with any Court of Justice shall buy or traffic in or stipulate for, or agree to receive, any share of, or interest in, any actionable claim, and no Court of Justice shall enforce at his instance or at the instance of any person claiming by or through him, any actionable claim, so dealt with by him as aforesaid." It does not merely make purchases of actionable claims by the classes of persons named in it unenforceable in law. It expressly prohibits them from being interested in any transfer of an actionable claim. The prohibition is based on the ground of the offices held by them. I cannot doubt that the doing of an act, which a Legal Practitioner is forbidden to do on the ground that he is a Legal Practitioner, is a violation of the conduct that he should pursue as a practitioner and, therefore, unprofessional conduct. It is urged that the Legislature could not have intended to make the purchase of an actionable claim by a Pleader under all circumstances unprofessional conduct, that in other countries there is no such absolute prohibition, that the New York Civil Procedure Code forbids purchases of actionable claims and negotiable instruments only where it is made, "with the intention and for the purposes of bringing a suit thereon," and that in the French Civil Code the prohibition is confined to claims falling within the jurisdiction of the Court where the Pleader is practising. The language of section 136 of Act IV of 1882, is, in my opinion, absolutely clear. It is quite immaterial that the Indian Legislature considered it expedient to enact the rule in wider terms than the Legislatures of some other countries have done. It being clear that the Pleader's act amounted to professional misconduct, was it grossly unprofessional? I have no doubt that it was. I have already referred to the circumstances under which the transfer was made. The Court of first instance, as a matter of fact, passed a decree for about Rs. 11,000 though the amount was reduced to Rs. 6,000 and odd in appeal. The purchase amounted in this case to trafficking in litigation. It is unnecessary to decide the question whether the purchase of an actionable claim, though unprofessional, must amount to grossly unprofessional misconduct in every case. Undoubtedly, the onus would be on the Pleader who purchases an actionable claim to show that in the circumstances of any particular case it does not amount to gross misconduct. I think that it would not be improper to hold that Pleaders should not be permitted to do acts that are liable to subject them to severe temptation. I am of opinion that this charge has been proved against the Pleader. I agree with the learned Chief Justice as to the punishment that should be imposed.

The 2nd charge.—The facts relating to this charge are practically undisputed. The Pleader belongs to a wealthy family, possessed of various kinds of properties including landed estates, houses, directorships in companies, Secretaryship in one Company, an agency under the Oriental Life Insurance Co., some other trade agencies, shares in Joint Stock Companies and a mill at Bellary known by the name of Medum Seshanna Cotton Manufactory. The evidence of Srinivasa Row, the Pleader's brother, and himself a Pleader, shows that in 1894 the members of the family entered into a partnership. A fresh partnership deed (Exhibit G) was executed in 1900. According to this deed, each member of the firm is authorised to sign the name of the firm, and the partners of the firm are responsible jointly and severally for the acts of the firm as well as for the acts of each partner and for monies reaching the hands of any one of them. The Pleader tates in his written statement:—"The members of the firm supervise the work of the managers and agents whenever they have leisure and during holidays." He denies that he has engaged himself in trade. In the face of the admitted facts, I am of opinion that the denial is absolutely untenable. It is contended that the actual work of the trade is done by clerks and agents and that, therefore, the Pleader cannot be said to be personally carrying on trade. I am quite unable to agree that the mere appointment of servants or agents is sufficient to show that the trade is not carried on personally by the Pleader. In that case, any trader, who is able to engage clerks and to dispense with attending to customers himself, may say that he is not personally engaged in his trade. It is not denied that the agents and managers could be dismissed at pleasure by the Pleader and his partners. The admission that the members of the firm supervised their work puts an end to all doubt on the matter. It is contended by Mr. Rangachariar that a Pleader who belongs to a trading family should not be regarded as trading, simply because other members carry on trade, the benefit of which would go to all the members of the family including the Pleader. I agree with him so far. It is quite true that every member of an undivided Hindu family cannot be said to be carrying on a trade, the benefit of which would go to the family. One member of it alone may be carrying on the trade but he may do so with family funds. Although as between the members of the family, the profit or the loss must be shared by all of them, it would not follow that every one of them is conducting the trade. Again two or more members may alone carry on a trade as partners and the outside public may be dealing with them alone, though, as amongst the members of the family inter se, all might be responsible for the result of the trade. But if all the members enter into a partnership and carry on a family trade as partners, then all of them must be regarded as carrying on the trade. This is a distinction well understood in law. In the present cas , the Pleader, who is the senior member of his family, has entered into a partnership with the other members. He as much as any other member of the family is trading with the outside public whatever may be the actual amount of work done by him in connection with the management of the trade. I hold, therefore, that the Pleader must be held to be personally engaged both in trade and in the other business referred to in the deed of partnership. It is then argued that carrying on a trade is not professional misconduct within the meaning of section 13 of the Legal Practitioners Act and that there is no rule framed by this Court under that Act which has declared it to be misconduct. Clause 27 of the rules framed under the Act is in these terms: "If any person, having been admitted as Pleader, accepts any appointment under Government, becomes a student of any school or college for purpose of pursuing his studies or enters into any trade or other business, or accepts employment as a Law Agent other than a Pleader, Mukhtar or Agent certified under Act XVIII of 1879 and these rules, he shall give immediate notice thereof to the High Court, who may thereupon suspend such Pleader from practice or pass such orders as the said Court may think fit." It is true that engaging in trade or other business is not definitely pronounced to be misconduct by this rule. According to it, the High Court may give permission to any Pleader, if it thinks fit to do so, to engage himself in any particular trade or business. A similar rule has been framed under the Letters Patent of the High Court with respect to High Court Vakils, although curiously enough no such rule has been framed applicable to Advocates and Attorneys. The Pleader was, undoubtedly, guilty of misconduct in not obtaining the permission of the High Court for carrying on trade or other business. He has been engaged in trading business of an important character and it was, undoubtedly, his duty to apply for and obtain the High Court's permission. No charge, however, has been framed against him of violating the provisions of clause 27 which require him to apply for permission to the High Court and I do not think we should find him guilty of misconduct in violating the provisions of this clause without his having an opportunity to explain his conduct. But it does not follow from this that he is not guilty of misconduct by being engaged in trade or other business without the permission of the Court, if his doing so is inconsistent with the profession of a Pleader. The rule enables Pleaders to avoid all risk of being pronounced guilty of misconduct by obtaining the opinion of the High Court with respect to any business they may propose to undertake but the failure to take advantage of the provisions of the rule cannot absolve them from liability to be convicted of misconduct if they act in a manner inconsistent with their profession. It seems to me that there are two reasons why carrying on trade may be inconsistent with the profession of a Pleader. One reason is that it might prevent him from devoting that attention to his work as a Pleader which his duty to the public and to the Court require that he should. But another and certainly not less important reason is that a Pleader should not be permitted to engage himself in any pursuit which is inconsistent with his status as a member of a learned and honourable profession. In England every person who wishes to be called to the Bar has to state that he is not and has never since his admission as a student "been engaged in trade and that he is not an undischarged bankrupt." I am not aware that according to the Rules of the Bar in England, a Barrister can be punished for being engaged in any trade or business inconsistent with his being actively engaged in the practice of his profession, though there are various offices the holding of which is deemed to be inconsistent with practice as a Barrister. See page 384 of Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. II. But I strongly believe that carrying on a trade would be deemed to be generally inconsistent with the active practice of the profession of either a Barrister or an attorney. To do so may not be in some cases inconsistent with the status itself of a Legal Practitioner. He would probably not be punished for having been engaged in trade or other business if he was not practising his profession at the same time although it is probable, I think, that there are some trades and businesses, which may be regarded as altogether inconsistent with the status of an Advocate. However, as the rules stand it would, be open to this Court to permit any particular trade or business being undertaken by a Pleader. There might certainly be some kinds of business which would in no way be inconsistent with either the status or the active practice of a Pleader's profession. There have been instances where engagement even in a trade has also been permitted by this Court although I take it that this would not ordinarily be allowed. It may be that there are enterprises which, having regard to the circumstances of this country, the Court would sanction a Pleader actively promoting and devoting a portion of his time to. Whether sanction should be given in any case would, no doubt, largely depend on the character of the trade or business and the extent to which it is likely to occupy the time and attention of the Pleader. But no Pleader can be permitted to derive any advantage by taking the responsibility on himself and engaging in a trade or business without the sanction of the Court. If he does so, he takes the risk of its being subsequently held that his conduct amounts to professional misconduct If permission would not have been given if he had asked for it, he must be held guilty of misconduct in having done that which the Court would not have sanctioned. This is the rule followed where a trustee acts without the sanction of the Court in a matter for which he could have obtained its permission. I do not consider it possible that the Court would have given permission to the Pleader in this case to be engaged as a partner of a large cotton mill and in the various other businesses which the Pleader admits to be included in the concerns of the partnership. It is, however, possible that he thought, as he says he did, that inasmuch as he would not have to devote much of his time personally to his work as a partner, he was not acting in violation of his duty as a Pleader. I am willing to believe that he acted bona fide and without any intention to act contrary to his duty as a professional man. I am, therefore, of opinion that it is sufficient to point out that he acted wrongly and that it is unnecessary to impose any punishment on him for his conduct in this matter.

REFERRED CASE No. 9 OF 1912.

SANKARAN NAIR, J.—I think that Mr. Rangachariar is right in his contention that any charge against the Pleader must be proved by evidence taken at this inquiry. But I do not accept the further contention that the judgment in the civil suit is inadmissible in evidence. The Pleader was the defendant in that suit. It was decided therein that the plaintiff had paid him his fee to appear for him at the Sessions; that he failed to appear without making any arrangement for the conduct of the case: a decree was passed against him on these findings. The facts found against him must be taken, prima facie, to be proved. At the same time, I think it is open to him to show that the judgment is wrong and should not be accepted as final for the purpose of this inquiry. Any evidence which should have been but was not produced in the suit will, of course, be viewed with grave suspicion. Nor is it clear to me why it is not open to us, at this inquiry, to consider whether the judgment is right on the materials on which it was based. There is no law preventing us from doing so, and I see no injustice in it.

I think, therefore, the Judge is right in allowing the Pleader to give further evidence. On the evidence, Exhibit A, the receipt given by the Pleader to Muni Reddi, makes it clear that he was bound to defend him at the Sessions. I doubt whether it is open to him to say in this inquiry after giving that receipt, unless he proves mistake or some other invalidating circumstance, anything against that receipt. Because as a Pleader it was his duty to grant a proper receipt and not one which is misleading. He has, however, failed to prove that he did not agree to appear at the Sessions. I do not attach any weight to the other contention that the Vakil was not bound to appear as his client owed him a portion of his fee. He has failed to prove that any balance is due.

I am also of opinion that a Vakil is bound to appear and conduct his case even if the fee, or any portion thereof, remains unpaid, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary or at least notice to the effect to the client in sufficient time to enable him to make other arrangements.

Mr. Rangachariar argues that a Pleader like Mr. Venkata Row would not have failed to make some arrangement about his case before going to Rangoon. There is great force in this argument. Mr. Venkata Row appears to have made arrangements about all other cases. The only explanation that suggests itself to me is that he may have really thought that he was not bound to appear for Muni Reddi at the Sessions. This is supported by the facts that the counterfoil of the receipt kept by him showed that he was to appear only before the Magistrate and this Srinivas Row told Subba Row that Mr. Venkata Row was not engaged to defend Muni Reddi. What took place at the meeting in September between Muni Reddi and the Vakil also supports this view. I think that Venkata Row believed that he was not engaged to defend Muni Reddi at the Sessions. If he had pleaded in this inquiry, after the disposal of the appeal, that he acted in this erroneous but honest belief and tendered a proper apology, speaking for myself, the result might have been different. But he has persisted in this inquiry in trying to prove a defence already found false in a civil suit. I agree accordingly to the order which will be pronounced by the Chief Justice.

REFERRED CASE No. 10 OF 1912.

The charge against the Pleader, Mr. Venkata Rao, is that he purchased the claim of the plaintiff in Original Suit No. 8 of 1909 on the file of the Subordinate Judge's Court of Bellary. That was a suit brought by Pichayya and Papayya against certain minors for the recovery of a sum of more than Rs. 1 ,000. After evidence had been heard, but before judgment was pronounced, one Vannaji agreed to purchase the claim of the plaintiffs therein for Rs. 4,750 on 7th September 1909. Now, it appears from the evidence of the vendor, who is the prosecution 4th witness in the case, that, so far as he is concerned, he had nothing to do with Mr. Venkata Rao, and that, though the negotiations for the sale took place in Venkata Rao's house, the claim was agreed to be sold to Vannaji who was his client without any consultation with Venkata Rao. Vannaji borrowed Rs. 4,000 of this amount from the firm of Satraji Dongerchund. Anadaji, who was examined as a witness for Venkata Rao, was a partner in that firm. It appears from his evidence, which there is no reason to disbelieve, that when the firm lent Rs. 4,000 to Vannaji, the amount was debited against one Bhataji Khemaji, who was the principal of Vannaji; two days later, Vannaji told this witness that it should have been debited against him and not against his principal; he refused to do so; then Vannaji got a letter from Mr. Venkata Rao asking him to debit that amount against Venkata Rao's account and that was accordingly done. Mr. Venkata Rao admits having written a letter to the firm asking them to do so. The entry was made by the prosecution 1st witness and he also gives evidence to the same effect.

On the 7th of December, Vannaji sold the decree to one Veerabhadrappa. Veerabhadrappa was a relative of the defendants in that suit and was naturally interested in them. He says that he heard a rumour that Mr. Venkata Rao had purchased the decree and that he spoke to him and arranged to purchase the decree from him; he paid Rs. 6,392-8-0 to Venkata Rao and got an assignment of the decree from the original decree-holder, Papiah, who had agreed to sell it to Vannaji. The money was actually paid to Vannaji as Vankata Rao directed him to do so. According to this witness, he never saw Vannaji at all while the negotiations were going on. If the matter had stopped here, the case would have been one of suspicion only.

But there is the following additional circumstance to be taken into consideration. The entire amount borrowed by Vannaji was Rs. 4,750. Now, this with interest at 6 per cent. per annum for three months, that is, the period between September 7, the date of agreement of sale to Vannaji and December 7, the sale of the decree to Veerabhadrappa, would come to Rs. 4,821-4-0. The difference between the two amounts Rs. 6,392-8-0 and Rs. 4,821-4-0, i. e., Rs 1,571-4-0 is the profit and half of this is Rs. 785-10-0.

Now, it appears from the evidence and it is admitted that this amount, i. e., Rs. 785-10-0, was paid on Venkata Rao's account to his father-in-law. It is not explained how this particular sum of exactly half of the profits was due to Venkata Rao. He gives no explanation; he produces no account to show that this was due to him for any fee. There is evidence that the interest payable on the sum of Rs. 4,000 was at 6 per cent. The evidence as to the rate of interest payable on the remaining Rs. 750 is discrepant and it is not clear what the real interest was; but there is nothing improbable in their setting apart interest at 6 per cent. for three months for the purpose of calculating profits on the transaction. In the absence of any explanation on the part of Venkata Rao, the only conclusion that we are justified in drawing is that he received it as his share of the profits of the transaction; and taken with the other circumstances of the case, his advancing the money to Vannaji and the facts disclosed by the prosecution 2nd witness, whose evidence is strongly corroborated by these two facts, I come to the conclusion that from the 9th September 1909 Venkata Rao must be treated as a partner with Vannaji and equally interested with him in the decree.

The question then remains for consideration whether this is grossly improper conduct in the discharge of professional duties.

An actionable claim should not be purchased by a Pleader and, in my opinion, the purchase of a claim after suit offends against public policy more than the purchase of such a claim before suit. It is trafficking in litigation and when the vendor is the client of the purchaser, the transaction, in the majority of cases, is likely to be oppressive to the client. In the case before us, however, not only no undue advantage has been taken but Venkata Rao seems to have acted fairly. Papiah offered to accept Rs. 4,000 from eerabhadrappa in full satisfaction of his claim and he got from Vannaji and Venkata Rao Rs. 4,750. Further, Venkata Rao did not deal with the client and was not in fact the original purchaser on the 7th. It is also proved that a portion of the interest due to the minor was remitted. As this is the first case of the kind that has come before this Court, a lenient view might have been taken of the case, if he had pleaded good faith and placed before the Court all the facts. He has not chosen the course. I agree to the order which will be pronounced by his Lordship the Chief Justice.

The next charge against Mr. Venkata Rao is that he has been trading in cotton and yarn with the other undivided members of his family as partners. That he is a partner with them is proved beyond doubt by Exhibit G. The Company has also bought a spinning mill in Bellary, borrowed money to pay for it and to cover working expenses; it was buying cotton and selling yarn. There are, no doubt, managers and gumastas appointed but Venkata Rao and his brother do not cease to be persons carrying on trade any the less on that account. Holding, then, that Venkata Rao and his brothers are traders, the question remains whether he is guilty of any grossly unprofessional conduct. Rule 27 of the rules framed by the High Court under the Legal Practitioners Act, XVIII of 1879, runs thus:—

"If any person, having been admitted as Pleader, accepts any appointment under Government, becomes a student of any school or college for purposes of pursuing his studies or enters into any trade or other business, or accepts employment as a Law Agent other than a Pleader, Mukhtar, or Agent certified under Act XVIII of 1879 and these rules, he shall give immediate notice thereof to the High Court, who may thereupon suspend such Pleader from practice or pass such orders as the said Court may think fit.

"Provided that when a Pleader is appointed by or under the authority of the High Court to the office of District Munsif, whether temporarily or permanently, it shall not be necessary to give the notice prescribed in the first part of this rule; but no Pleader, while employed as District Munsif, shall be permitted to practise or do any business as a Pleader before any Court."

Now it will be noticed that the High Court can take action under this rule only if the Pleader who enters into any trade or business gives notice to the High Court. Under the rule, he is bound to give such notice. Then section 13 of the Act itself empowers the High Court to punish the Pleader in certain circumstances. The words of the section run thus:—"The High Court may also, after such inquiry as it thinks fit, suspend or dismiss any Pleader or Mukhtar holding a certificate as aforesaid:—

(b) who is guilty of fraudulent or grossly improper conduct in the discharge of his professional duty, or

(f) for any other reasonable cause".

The omission to comply with rule 27 by a Pleader would probably come under clause (b). It would certainly come under clause (f). If, therefore, a first grade Pleader omits to make the application which he is bound to submit to the High Court under rule 27, then he may be suspended under section 13 for breach of that rule until he makes the application under that section or any further time the High Court thinks fit. If he makes the application under rule 27, then he can be dealt with under that rule. Apparently, therefore, the rule and the section provide adequate remedy for all cases. Whether the Pleader should be suspended or should be allowed to carry on a trade under rule 27 depends upon the particular circumstances of each case: the character of the person making the application, the nature of the trade or business, the time that the Pleader would have to devote to it. There may also arise other considerations. The trade or business may be one which it may be in public interests to foster in that locality and men other than Pleaders may not be available perhaps to carry on the trade or business satisfactorily. Under this rule, applications are being made to the High Court for sanction and they have been granted or rejected according to the particular circumstances of the case. If we lay down a definite rule under section 13 of the Act, it would be depriving the High Court of the discretion vested in it by rule 27; for, it is obvious that once a Pleader is declared to be disqualified from engaging in any trade or in any particular kind of trade, it would not be right for the High Court to give any sanction under rule 27 to any other Pleader applying for it. I am not, therefore, able to say that under section 13, the High Court should declare that it is unprofessional for a Pleader to follow any trade or business. It is not required by the conditions of the legal profession or the circumstances of the country.

It may be a question whether any rule even is necessary, because the evil to be guarded against cannot be serious as the sanads of the first grade Pleaders have to be renewed every year and the High Court may refuse a renewal. But, in any event, I do not think it necessary that we should take any action under section 13 as against any Pleaders to whom rule 27 is applicable. I am also of opinion that it is difficult now to say generally that a Pleader should not engage in any trade or business. Confining myself now only to Vakils they exercise the profession both of the Advocate and the Solicitor and they should not be debarred from performing those functions which a Solicitor is, and a Barrister may not be, entitled to discharge. Many, if not the majority, of the Pleaders are members of joint families who are engaged in trades or businesses. It would be an unnecessary interference with them now to declare that such trades or businesses are unprofessional. The notion that no trade, however honestly carried on, is worthy of a Vakil is a relic of the times that have passed away, and I should regret its introduction into India.

On the facts before us, there is no doubt Mr. Venkata Rao has been guilty of a violation of rule 27 in not having reported to the High Court his connection with the firm or with the mill. But he has not been charged with having violated that rule and we cannot take any notice of it as he has had no opportunity of making any answer to that charge. So far, therefore, as the second charge is concerned, I am not prepared to inflict any punishment on him.

REFERRED CASES NOS. 9 AND 10 OF 1912.

BENSON, OFFG. C. J.—I concur with the conclusions arrived at by my learned brothers in the judgments which have just been read, and which I have had the advantage of perusing.

With regard to the charge in connection with the criminal case against Muni Reddi, I am unable to accede to Mr. Rangachariar's contention that the judgment and evidence in the civil suit against the Pleader, Mr. Venkata Rao, is not admissible as evidence against him in the present proceedings. The question in that suit was the very question which we now have to decide, viz., whether he engaged to defend Muni Reddi in the Sessions case and failed to do so without any valid excuse. Mr. Venkata Rao was the defendant in the case and the decision was against him.

I do not think that the decision is conclusive proof against him in the present proceedings, but it has not been treated as conclusive. He has been allowed in the present proceedings to produce further evidence in support of his defence and he has produced it, and it has been duly considered by the District Judge and by us. There is no suggestion that any evidence which the Pleader wished to adduce in the present proceedings has been shut out. We have not been referred to any authority for holding that the judgment is inadmissible in the present proceedings as establishing a prima facie case of unprofessional conduct against the Pleader, or for holding that we are precluded from considering whether the judgment is right on the evidence on which it was based, nor do I see any ground in reason why we should treat them as inadmissible.

On the merits, the evidence and probabilities in all these cases have been so fully considered in the judgments of the two District Judges and of my learned brothers that I do not think anything would be gained by my reviewing them afresh. I entirely agree with the conclusions at which my learned brothers have arrived.

I do not understand how it can be seriously argued that what the Pleader is said to have purchased from the plaintiffs in Original Suit No. 3 of 1909 was not "an actionable claim," and that there was nothing contrary to law or public policy in his purchasing it, if he did do so, and, therefore, his doing so was no professional misconduct. The plaintiff's claim had, no doubt, been put in action, but that did not render it the less an "actionable claim" as defined in section 3 of the Transfer of Property Act. The claim was still sub judice. Though the case was ripe for judgment, it had not been given. The claim had not become merged in a decree. Section 136 of the Transfer of Property Act in the most stringent terms declares that "no Judge, Legal Practitioner or Officer connected with any Court of Justice shall buy or traffic in or stipulate for, or agree to receive, any share of, or interest in, any actionable claim." A Pleader holds a privileged position in connection with the administration of justice, and the law imposes on him certain restrictions and disabilities by reason of the position or office which he holds, and in order to safeguard the interests of litigants and the pure administration of justice.

It is, I think, futile to contend that it is not professional misconduct for a man to do that which the law expressly forbids him to do by reason of the profession which he exercises. The degree of misconduct will, no doubt, vary with the circumstances of each case, but I cannot doubt that a transaction such as that with which we are now concerned amounts to gross misconduct. The Pleader who is conducting a case is in a better position than his client to judge of the probability of his success or failure, and the nearer the case is to judgment, the greater will be his opportunity for correctly anticipating the event. It may be that when a case is ripe for judgment, there is no longer any temptation to the Pleader to conduct the case improperly, but to allow him at that stage to purchase his client's claim would expose him to a strong temptation to misrepresent to his client his prospects of success and the value of his claim. In the present case, the transaction was a highly speculative one. The evidence shows that the plaintiffs feared their suit would be dismissed and were willing, at one time, to sell their claim for Rs. 4,000. They, in fact, got a decree for Rs. 11,000 in the original Court, though this was reduced on appeal to Rs. 6,000. It is true there is no suggestion that the Pleader made any misrepresentation to his clients in this case, and the plaintiffs were satisfied with the price (Rs. 4,750) paid to them, but this does not prevent the Pleader's purchase of the claim, in defiance of the express provisions of law, from being professional misconduct of a very grave character.

It only remains for me to state the decision at which we have arrived as to the penalty we should impose under section 13 of the Legal Practitioners Act on Mr. Venkata Rao in respect of the charges which have been established against him. He cannot plead youth or inexperience in extenuation of his misconduct. Its gravity has certainly not been lessened by the false defences which he has put forward and maintained throughout in regard to the charges relating to his conduct in connection with the criminal case against Muni Reddi, and in purchasing his own client's claim in Original Suit No. 3 of 1909 in the Subordinate Judge's Court. We do not think that a mere warning or censure would suffice to mark our sense of the gravity of his misconduct in either of these cases. We think that we are required to impose a penalty of a substantial period of suspension in each case. We accordingly direct that Mr. K. Venkata Rao be suspended from the exercise of his profession as a Pleader for six months and three months on account of his misconduct in regard to these two cases respectively, the two periods to run consecutively.

We do not think it necessary to impose any penalty in connection with the charge against him for engaging in trade. We think it sufficient to say that he was wrong in carrying on trade without reporting the fact to the High Court under rule 27 of the Rules, made by the High Court under the Legal Practitioners Act, XVIII of 1879. The Pleader will have to pay the costs of the petitioner in Referred Case No. 10 of 1912.

The Civil Revision Petition No. 485 of 1911 is dismissed.

PUNJAB CHIEF COURT.
FULL BENCH.

CRIMINAL APPEAL No. 4 OF 1912.
November 12, 1912.

Present:—Sir Arthur Reid, KT., Chief Judge, Mr. Justice Robertson and Mr. Justice Rattigan.

EMPEROR—PROSECUTOR

versus

LIEUTENANT BRIAN BONHAM CARTER—ACCUSED.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 304—Jury trial—Verdict of majority given as verdict of Jury—No dissent by any Juror—Discovery of mistake after some days—Power of Court to disturb verdict and order—Jurisdiction—Criminal cases—Interpretation of statutes—Practice—Reference to Full Bench—Punjab Courts Act (XVIII of 1884), s. 11.

Jurisdiction in criminal case is not to be assumed, and in regard to matters for which the Legislature has made express provision, it must not be assumed in excess of the jurisdiction so conferred.

Courts in India cannot travel beyond the scope of section 304, Criminal Procedure Code.

The Court will not disturb a verdict openly given in Court, if it is satisfied that all the Jurors heard the words of the Foreman and expressed no dissent at the time.

The power of amendment of a verdict provided by section 304, Criminal Procedure Code, must be exercised before or immediately after the verdict is recorded and cannot be exercised after the Jurors have dispersed.

In a trial by Jury before a Judge of the Chief Court, the Foreman publicly announced the verdict of "not guilty" as the unanimous verdict of the Jury, in the hearing of all the Jurors and without dissent on the part of any of them. The verdict was recorded and the prisoner was acquitted. From information received some days afterwards, the trying Judge was led to believe that as a matter of fact, the Jurors were not agreed as regards the verdict. The Judge summoned the Foreman of the Jury and examined him on oath.

He deposed that the verdict given as the unanimous verdict was really the verdict of a majority of the Jurors and was given as the unanimous verdict owing to a misunderstanding that the opinion of the majority was binding upon all the Jurors.

The Judge thereupon took action under section 11 of the Punjab Courts Act and referred for the opinion of the Full Bench the question as to whether any proceedings should be taken in the matter and if so, what course should be adopted:—

Held, (1) that the Full Bench had jurisdiction to give the opinion as the question arose before a Judge, sitting as a Single Bench, in a judicial proceeding;

(2) that the Court had no jurisdiction, in consequence of the Foreman's subsequent statement, to set aside a verdict given in open Court and in the hearing of all the Jurors and the formal order of acquittal, that followed thereupon.

Case referred by the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Rattigan, for consideration of the question contained in his referring order, dated the 16th October 1912.

The Government Advocate, for the Crown.

The Hon'ble Mr. Muhammad Shafi, for the Accused.

ORDER OF REFERENCE.

RATTIGAN, J.—(16*th October* 1912). At the conclusion of the trial of Lieutenant Bonham Carter upon charges under sections 304 (2) and 304-A, Indian Penal Code, I was informed by the Foreman of the Jury that the Jury were agreed upon their verdict which was one of acquittal as regards both charges. I accordingly informed the prisoner that the Jury had acquitted him and I directed him to be discharged from custody.

Subsequently, I heard that there had been some mistake made by the Foreman of the Jury (Major F. Hyslop) and that the Jury, though unanimous with regard to the first charge, were not agreed with regard to the second charge. I accordingly sent for Major Hyslop and examined him on oath, and discovered that a mistake of the kind had been made.

The question now arises whether I should take further proceedings and, if so, what course I should adopt. This question I refer to a Division Bench.

JUDGMENT OF THE FULL BENCH.

RATTIGAN, J.—As the Judge responsible for this Reference, I would like to set forth the facts which led me to take action under section 11 of the Punjab Courts Act, 1884.

Lieutenant Bonham Carter was tried before me and a Jury upon two charges, (1) under section 304, Indian Penal Code, and (2) under section 304-A, Indian Penal Code. The Jury retired to consider their verdict and after an interval returned to the Court-room and in answer to my question whether they were agreed upon their verdict, the Foreman informed me that they were agreed with reference to the first charge but not agreed with reference to the second charge. I accordingly asked the Foreman what their verdict was upon the first charge, and he replied that the Jury were unanimously of opinion that the prisoner was 'not guilty.' I then asked him what was the verdict upon the second charge and he replied that five of the Jury were of opinion that the prisoner was guilty and four were of opinion that he was not guilty. He further stated that the Jury, as a whole, wished to be further charged with reference to the law relating to the second charge. I accordingly endeavoured to explain more fully the law relating thereto and when I had concluded, the Foreman, after consultation with the other members of the Jury, informed me that the Jury wished to retire again to consider their verdict. This request I, of course, granted. The Jury retired and later on returned to the Court. I then inquired of the Foreman whether the Jury were "now agreed upon their verdict as regards the second charge." In reply, the Foreman informed me, without any expression of dissent from any of the Jurors, that they were agreed, and that their verdict was 'not guilty' upon both charges. I assumed that this was the unanimous verdict of the Jury, and I accordingly informed the prisoner that he had been acquitted by the Jury as regards both charges, and I, therefore, had the verdict recorded and directed that the prisoner should be set at liberty.

From information which I received some days afterwards, I was led to believe that a mistake had been made and that the Jurors, as a matter of fact, were not 'agreed' with regard to the second charge. I, therefore, directed the Foreman to appear before me and I examined him, upon oath, as to the real facts of the case. He deposed that the Jury were not agreed as to the second charge; that five were of opinion that the prisoner was not guilty and that four were of opinion that he was guilty; and that the verdict of 'not guilty' as announced by him in Court was due to a misunderstanding, the Jurors believing that the opinion of the majority, if for an acquittal, was binding upon them all.

In these circumstances, and in view of the importance of the question involved, I decided to take action under section 11 of the Punjab Courts Act and to take the opinion of a Division Bench of this Court as to whether I should take any further proceedings in the matter and if so what course I should adopt. By the orders of the Chief Judge, this reference was directed to be laid before a Full Bench, and it is in consequence of that order that the Full Bench has now to give the opinion which I desired to obtain.

Before proceeding to give my own opinion upon the questions referred, I think it right to state that, despite Mr. Muhammad Shafi's objections to the jurisdiction of the Full Bench to deal with this reference, I am satisfied that the reference was one within the purview of section 11 of the Punjab Courts Act, and that this Full Bench has, under that section, jurisdiction to give the opinion and advice asked for. The questions referred to the Full Bench were not purely academic but arose before me, sitting as a Single Bench, in a judicial proceeding. Rightly or wrongly, I believed that in consequence of information supplied to me, I was bound to inquire from the Foreman of the Jury whether there was any foundation for what I had heard, and when I examined him upon oath, I was acting as a Judge in a judicial proceeding. I would hold, therefore, that Mr. Muhammad Shafi's preliminary objection to the jurisdiction of the present Bench fails and should be overruled. I might add that, though I was not at the time aware of it, there is a precedent for the course I adopted in making the reference [see Rex v. Wooler (1) discussed later on].

Coming now to the questions for our opinion, I am satisfied, after consideration, that we must reply to the reference that no further action can legally be taken by the Judge who presided at the trial. The only provision in the Criminal Procedure Code, which is directly relevant to the questions before us, is that contained in section 301, which runs as follows:—

"When, by accident or mistake, a wrong verdict is delivered, the Jury may, before or immediately after it is recorded, amend the verdict, and it shall stand as ultimately amended."

This section thus provides for an amendment of a wrong verdict delivered by accident or mistake, but it clearly contemplates that such a verdict can be amended only before or "immediately after" it is recorded, in other words, before the Jurors have left the Court and while they are still under the observance of the presiding Judge. And the reason for this restriction upon the powers of amendment is obvious, for once the Jurors have left the Court, they are liable to outside influences, and it would be in the highest degree dangerous thereafter to accept statements or affidavits on the part of individual Jurors to the effect that a verdict, publicly announced by the Foreman of the Jury, in the hearing of all the Jurors and without dissent on the part of any of them, as the unanimous verdict of all the Jurors, was in fact not their verdict but the verdict of other members of the Jury. A mistake of this kind may, no doubt, lead to a failure or miscarriage of justice, but, while such a result is to be deplored, I am decidedly of opinion that it would be far more disastrous to the course of justice if the Courts allowed verdicts, openly given, to be disturbed in consequence of individual Jurors subsequently coming forward to depose that such verdict, by accident or mistake, did not really represent their opinions. A mistake of the kind now under consideration is not likely to occur very frequently, and would be, perhaps, impossible if in practice the ancient formula used in the Courts of England were to be adopted. This was for the clerk of the Court to say "Gentlemen of the Jury, hearken to your verdict while the Court records it. You say that the prisoner is (guilty; not guilty); and that is the verdict of you all."

(1) 18 R. R. 402; 2 Stark 111.

At the same time, it is difficult to understand how a Jury could misunderstand the question, "Are you agreed upon your verdict?" The present case, however, is proof that words of every day use and ordinarily well understood may, nevertheless, be misunderstood by Jurors who attempt to import their own knowledge of law into their proceedings. But, while I regret that the view of the law which I take upon this reference may occasionally, though I believe rarely, result in a failure or miscarriage of justice, I have myself no doubt not only that it is strictly correct, but also that it is in the end far more conducive, than any other rule of law would be, to the due administration of justice. The spirit of section 304 of the Code is clearly in accordance with this view, and it has the support of English and American authorities.

In Reg. v. Vodden (2), a Juryman, by mistake, delivered the verdict "not guilty" when the Jury meant "guilty." The prisoner was thereupon discharged but some of the Jurymen interposed whereupon he was brought back immediately, and the Jury was again asked what their verdict was. They said "guilty," and the prisoner was, therefore, sentenced. The Court of Crown Cases Reserved held that the mistake was corrected within "a reasonable time and on the very occasion that it was made," and that the conviction must, therefore, be upheld. This is the class of case for which section 304 of our Code makes provision, and from the terms of the Court's judgment, the inference would certainly seem to be that the mistake could not have been rectified had it not been at once brought to the notice of the Judge. Rex v. Wooler (1) is a case very relevant to the present inquiry and was one where an erroneous verdict was given and the Court of King's Bench directed a re-trial. The defendant, Wooler, had been tried on the 5th June 1817 before Abbott, J., and a Jury, for printing and publishing a seditious and blasphemous libel. On the 6th June, at the first sitting of the Court of King's Bench, Abbott, J., addressed the Court to the following effect:—

(2) 23 L. J. M. C. 7; C. C. 229; 17 Jur. 1014; 2 W. R. 55; 6 Cox. C. C. 226.

"I take the earliest opportunity of stating to the Court some circumstances which occurred at the trial of a case yesterday before me at Guildhall. The case to which I allude was an information filed by the Attorney-General against a person of the name of Thomas Jonathan Wooler, for a libel. After the case had been gone through, the Jury retired from the Court to consider their verdict. During their absence, another case was called on, and the trial proceeded, and just as the reply was concluding, the door on my left hand was opened, in order to admit the Jury in Rex v. Wooler (1), who returned after considering their verdict; and as soon as the reply in the other case was finished, which was done in one or two sentences, the names of the Jurors in Rex v. Wooler (1) were called over by the officer of the Court in the usual way, and they were asked according to the ordinary course, whether they had agreed in their verdict, and whether the defendant was guilty or not guilty. The Foreman answered that the Jury found the defendant guilty, but three of them were desirous, or had desired him on their part to add something by way of explaining their verdict. I then interposed, and told the Jury that I could not receive an opinion or declaration coming from a part only of the Jury, that the verdict must be the verdict of all; and I asked (speaking, as I thought, in a very distinct and audible tone of voice), whether all the Jury had agreed in the verdict they had at first pronounced? The Foreman answered that they had. At that time, I did not hear any dissent expressed by any of them. The situation was, however, such, all the Jury not having come into my view from the room behind the Bench, that it is not altogether impossible that some mistake or misapprehension might have taken place, and that some of the Jury might not have heard distinctly what had been said. The Jury having retired, and the door by which they entered being closed, I proceeded to sum up the other case. When I had concluded, it was suggested by a gentleman at the Bar, that some of the Jury in Rex. v. Wooler (1) had not concurred, and did not intend to concur, in the general verdict which had been delivered; and were desirous that the verdict should be recorded with some degree of qualification. I have not the precise words very distinctly now in my mind; but I believe I have stated the substance. I was further given to understand that some of the Jury were present in or near the Court. I then said, that the verdict of the Jury having been recorded after that they had been distinctly asked if they had agreed and had replied in the affirmative, it seemed to me that sitting in that place, I could not do anything in the matter. I do not know whether I made use of the sentiment, but certainly my mind was impressed with it, that it would be extremely dangerous if the Judge after the Jury had retired from the Bar, and some interval of time had elapsed, were to receive and act upon any communication from them in the then state of the proceedings. I thought it was too late for me to interfere, and, therefore, was of opinion that the verdict must stand as recorded. I wish, however, to take the earliest opportunity of stating this occurrence to my Lord and my brothers."

"The Court cannot, according to the authorities and precedents of law, receive an affidavit from a Juryman upon the subject of the verdict; but the reason why he is precluded from making such affidavit is because, under ordinary circumstances, it must be intended that the verdict was given with his assent. But in order to imply his assent, unquestionably it should appear, that he heard what was propounded by the Foreman on behalf of himself and his fellows: and the difficulty which presents itself to my mind is whether there appears in this case a sufficient ground, upon which the Court can safely rely, to conclude that all the Jury did hear what was propounded for them, and on their behalf, by the Foreman. Now all the Jury were not at the time within the sight and view of the learned Judge, for it seems that a part were in the room behind; so that we have not, in this case, the ordinary means which exist in other cases, for presuming that every one of the Jury must have heard what was propounded on their behalf by their Foreman. If they did not hear it, they were not furnished with any means of contradiction or signifying any dissent or qualification and it cannot be considered as the verdict of all, because it is only their verdict if propounded by the Foreman with the assent of all. This circumstance affords a distinction from all the cases which have usually come before the Court, because verdicts are usually given by the Jury standing together in the view of the Judge, and with full opportunity of hearing everything which is propounded by the Foreman, and of expressing their dissent if they think fit so to do. If it could be made out satisfactorily from the position in which the Jury stood, their proximity to and being in view of the Judge, that all heard and none dissented, it would be too much to disturb the verdict and certainly the Court would not entertain a motion of that kind founded upon an affidavit of a Juryman. But the perfect evidence of all the Jury having heard, and having the means of dissenting if anything was untruly propounded on their behalf, seems to be wanting in this case."

In the course of the discussion that ensued, the suggestion was made that the Court might inform itself of the facts by requiring the Jurors who stated that they had not heard what was said, to file affidavits in support of their statements whereupon Lord Ellenborough observed :—

"The Court think that they are precluded from the means of acquiring that knowledge through an affidavit of any of the Jurors; if they cannot agree in their verdict, they ought to express dissent at the time. But if the Jurors at the time when their verdict was delivered by the Foreman had not the means of hearing what was propounded for them, there is no need of their affidavits upon that point. If the verdict had been given under such circumstances as ordinarily occur, the Court would infer their consciousness of what was propounded by their Foreman. But the danger would be infinite from allowing such affidavits to be received; and this has, doubtless, in former times deterred the Court from yielding to such applications. I do not know that an application of this kind has ever been made."

In the case cited, the verdict as erroneously announced by the Foreman was

'guilty,' and the Court of King's Bench, on being satisfied through affidavits of two by-standers that certain of the Jurors had not heard the verdict as so announced, ordered a re-trial of the defendant but by a different panel, the Chief Justice remarking, in reply to the defendant's prayer that the old panel should be recalled to try the case de novo :—

"In no instance that I am aware of can it arise that the same Jury should be suffered to re-assemble to consider the same question after they have been mixed with the multitude. If the Court were to suffer that to be done, what animadversions might well be made upon it by the enlightened part of society."

This case is authority in support of the proposition that the Court will not disturb a verdict openly given in Court, if it is satisfied that all the Jurors heard the words of the Foreman and expressed no dissent at the time.

In considering a question of the kind now before us, it is instructive to turn to not only English but also American authorities bearing upon it. In Wigmore's standard work on the "Law of Evidence" (Canadian Edition), I find the law on this subject thus enunciated :—

"The act of assent to a verdict is constituted by the express answer to the clerk at the polling in open Court, or by the silence which implies an assent. The outward act is final. Just as the act of the party to a deed is judged and determined by his outward conduct, so the act of a Juror is judged and determined by the Jury's polling, irrespective, on the one hand, of motives and belief which may have led up to the verdict's terms, and, on the other hand, of the deliberations and utterances of the Juror during retirement. The very purpose of the formality of polling is to afford an opportunity for free expression unhampered by the fears or the errors which may have attended the private proceedings. .....Sewall, J., in Grinnell v. Phillips (3), rejecting an affidavit (by one of the Jurors) "that he thought it his duty to coincide with the rest of the Jury but in his mind he had never approved of the verdict or consented to it", (observed):—"He is not to be believed or heard. The record of a verdict implies a unanimous consent of the Jury, and is conclusive and incontrovertible evidence of the fact. Besides the secret or mental act of a Juror can never be a subject of legal inquiry; and from the necessity of the case, his conduct before the Court is the best and the only evidence that can be admitted of his assent to a verdict delivered in his presence".

(3) 1 Mass. 530 at p. 542.

The learned author cites various other cases to a like purport where affidavits on the part of individual Jurors, to the effect that they had not really consented to a verdict publicly announced in their presence as the verdict of the Jury, were excluded from consideration, and he then continues as follows:

"Hence the fact that the verdict as delivered was by one or more individual Jurors not assented to by them in the Jury room, or is different from the one there informally assented to by them, is no ground for later correcting or setting aside the verdict. Much less is the fact that the Juror in his own mind was mistaken or unwilling in the assent which he confessedly gave in the Jury room; for here he has doubly committed himself to the verdict as delivered" and, in a later passage he remarks:—"After the verdict, however, has once been pronounced by the Jury and accepted by the Judge, it is final as regards its meaning and effect; and no statements by the Jurors, whether on affidavit or on examination, either unanimously or individually, can be resorted to for explaining or changing its meaning or legal effect". (Wigmore's "Law of Evidence" Canadian Edition, Volume IV, paras. 2355, 2356).

To the propositions thus laid down, there would appear to be two exceptions, and two only, namely, (1) when one or more of the Jurors, immediately after the verdict is recorded or within a very short time thereafter and while the Jurymen are still under the observance of the Judge, dissents or dissent from the verdict as announced [section 304 of the Criminal Procedure Code; Rex v. Vodden (2)] and (2), in England and perhaps in America, where it is proved by extrinsic evidence to the satisfaction of the Court that all the Jurors had not heard the announcement of the verdict by the Foreman. In every case, however, that I have consulted, the Judges have been agreed that affidavits by particular Jurors, that the verdict announced in Court by the Foreman did not represent their opinions, or that they were under a misapprehension of law or of fact in not protesting forthwith against such verdict, have invariably been rejected on the ground that it would be against public policy to permit Jurors, who have left the Court and in all probability discussed the case with outsiders, to endeavour subsequently to set aside a verdict, to which, by their silence, they have impliedly given assent. In my opinion this is a principle which is in the true interests of the administration of justice and ought not to be departed from, save only in the exceptional cases above referred to.

In the case before us, I have no reason whatever to doubt the correctness of the Foreman's statement as made before me on oath, but I do not think that the Court has jurisdiction, in consequence of that statement, to set aside a verdict, given in open Court and in the hearing of all the Jurors, and the formal order of acquittal that followed thereupon. The Legislature presumably was well aware of the case-law on this subject when it enacted the Criminal Procedure Code, and in section 304, it has made express provision for the correction of a verdict given by accident or mistake. It cannot be said, therefore, that this matter was a casus omissus or was not considered by the Legislature, and as there is express legislation thereon, I am of opinion, that the Courts in India cannot travel beyond the scope of section 304, even in cases where the facts were similar to those in Rex v. Wooler (1). Jurisdiction in criminal cases is not to be assumed, and in regard to matter, for which the Legislature has made express provision, it certainly must not be assumed in excess of the jurisdiction so conferred. I would, therefore, reply to the reference that no further action can be taken.

REID, C. J.—I concur. The power of amendment provided by section 304 of the Code of Criminal Procedure must be exercised before or immediately after the verdict is recorded and, for the reasons recorded, cannot be exercised after the Jurors have dispersed.

ROBERTSON, J:—With some hesitation after giving the question my careful consideration, I concur in the view expressed by my brother Rattigan.

CRIMINAL APPEAL NO. 656 OF 1912.

October 4, 1912.

Present:—Mr. Justice Chitty and Mr. Justice Richardson.

SAMARUDDIN—APPELLANT

versus

EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Jury—Misdirection—Questions of law—Rioting—Common object—Suggestion by Judge that real case might be between cases alleged by both sides—Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860*), ss.* 146, 147*—Violence, if includes that against inanimate object—Minutest details, whether necessary for Judge to go into—Statement by prosecution witness that accused had been bound down, whether admissible—Evidence of bad character—Evidence Act (I of* 1872*), s.* 54.

In a case of rioting in which one common object was alleged throughout, the Judge suggested to the Jury that the case might not be precisely as the prosecution alleged, nor what the defence set up, but something between the two:

Held, that there was no misdirection; that the Judge left it entirely open to the Jury as to whether they would accept his suggestion or not; and that the acceptance of it by the Jury would not destroy the case for the prosecution.

Queen v. Sabed Ali, 20 W. R. Cr. 5 (F. B.); 11 B. L. R. 347, and Wafadar Khan v. Queen-Empress, 21 C. 955, distinguished.

In section 146, Indian Penal Code, violence includes violence against inanimate objects, such as pulling down a man's house.

In his charge to the Jury, it is not necessary for the Judge to go into the minutest details in the evidence.

In a prosecution for riot, the statement by a prosecution witness that he had brought a case under section 107 of the Criminal Procedure Code against some of the accused who had been bound down, is admissible, if introduced not for the purpose of proving the bad character of the accused, but as part of the res gesæt, the events which had transpired before, and which eventually led up to, the riot with which the accused were charged.

Appeal against the order of the Additional Sessions Judge of Dacca, dated June 4th, 1912, convicting the appellant under sections 147 and 304 read with section 149 of the Indian Penal Code and sentencing him to undergo rigorous imprisonment for two years under each count, the sentences to run concurrently.

SAMARUDDIN v. EMPEROR.

Babus Dasarathi Sanyal and Debendra Narayan Bhattacharyya, for the Appellant.

Mr. Orr, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—In this case, the appellant Samar-ud-din has been convicted by the unanimous verdict of a Jury of offences under section 304/149, Indian Penal Code, and section 147, Indian Penal Code, and has been sentenced by the Additional Sessions Judge of Dacca to two years' rigorous imprisonment on each count, the sentences to run concurrently. The appeal is, therefore, open to him only on the questions of law relating to the charge of the Additional Sessions Judge.

The first point that has been urged before us is that the Judge was in error in putting before the Jury what he calls "a third alternative." It should be stated that before the trial began in the Sessions Court, the charge was amended and, as eventually framed, the common object alleged was "in order to take forcible possession of complainant Pandab's land and hut and to assault Pandab, Joydeb, Chandra Kissore and Karam Ali." The Judge suggested to the Jury that the case might not be precisely as the prosecution alleged and at the same time might not be what the defence endeavoured to set up, but something between the two, namely, that the complainant's party might have gone to turn Madhumala out of possession, that they were resisted and driven out of the land by the Kusambati Sardars that up to that point the Kusambati Sardars, might have been acting within their rights but that they went further and intoxicated with success or anger or both determined to teach the complainant's party a lesson and assaulted them. Reliance was placed on the case of Banga Hadua v. King-Emperor (1) and also on the cases of the Queen v. Sabed Ali (2) and Wafadar Khan v. Queen-Empress (3). But these cases are quite distinguishable on their facts. We can see no reason why the Judge should not have made this suggestion to the Jury. He left it entirely open to them as to whether they would accept it or not and we cannot agree in the contention of the learned Pleader for the appellant that, if it was accepted, it would entirely destroy the prosecution case. The Full Bench case of Queen v. Sabed Ali (2), cited above, was quite different from the present as was also the case of Wafadar Khan v. Queen-Empress (3). There the charge was altered at the end of the case for the prosecution and a totally different common object was alleged. Here, there has been one common object alleged throughout and it cannot be suggested that the accused did not know exactly what they had to meet.

In the second place, it is argued that the learned Judge's explanation of section 147, Indian Penal Code, is faulty and that violence cannot mean violence against inanimate objects. No authority has been cited for such a proposition and we see no reason for restricting the meaning of the word "violence" in the manner stated. It could hardly be said that if an unlawful assembly came together for the purpose, say, of pulling down a man's house and they proceeded to carry out the object, they could not be said to have used violence. Then it was urged that, as regards the appellant, Samaruddin, the Judge did not point out to the Jury exactly what the evidence against him was. We do not see that there is any force in this contention. The Judge has discussed the whole of the evidence to the Jury and this man's name is mentioned on more than one occasion. He has told the Jury that they must be satisfied as against each of the accused (there were four others tried along with Samaruddin who were found not guilty) and that their verdict must be independent as against each. The next argument that the Judge should have asked the Jury, when they returned their verdict, as to which common object they held proved has no force in this particular case because, only one common object was alleged. In the case of Wafadar Khan v. Queen-Empress (3), cited above, there were two distinct common objects which had been alleged and had been mentioned in the charges. It is said, that, in his charge in this case, the Judge has failed to give advice to the Jury on most important particulars; but the particulars to which the learned Pleader has referred are minor details in the evidence which the Jury had heard and which they were asked to take into consideration,

(1) 11 C. L. J. 270; 5 Ind. Cas. 771; 11 Cr. L. J. 245.
(3) 21 C. 955.

It was not, in our opinion, necessary for the Judge to go into the minutest details; but even if it were, there is nothing to show in this case that these particular minor points were not mentioned to the Jury inasmuch as we have only the heads of the charge before us.

Then it was argued that the Court witness Hossain Bakhsh's evidence should have been explained by the Judge. It is difficult to say what precisely is meant by this. The evidence was commented upon by the Judge and the Jury were left to form their own opinion of it.

Lastly, it was argued that the evidence which was inadmissible was admitted and that prejudiced the accused. This evidence consisted of a statement of the prosecution witness No. 5, Sanu, who stated that he had brought a case under section 107, Criminal Procedure Code, against some of the accused including the appellant and that they had been bound down while a cross-case under the same section brought against himself by the accused had been dismissed. This was not, so far as we can see, introduced, as suggested here, for the purpose of proving the bad character of the accused but as part of the res gestæ, the events which had transpired before, and which eventually led up to, the riot which was investigated in the present case.

We think, on the whole, that the charge of the learned Sessions Judge was both full and impartial and that the whole case was put before the Jury by him. We accordingly dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

CRIMINAL MISCELLANEOUS APPEAL NO. 135 OF 1912.

RAM KISHAN DAS—APPLICANT

versus

EMPEROR—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 526—Application for transfer—Materials to be considered.

What the Court has to consider on an application for transfer is not merely the question whether there has been a real bias in the mind of the presiding Magistrate against the accused but also the further question whether incidents may not have happened which, though they may be susceptible of explanation and may have happened without any real bias in the mind of the Magistrate, are nevertheless such as are calculated to create in the mind of the accused a reasonable apprehension that he may not have a fair and impartial trial.

Farzand Ali v. Hanuman Prasad, 19 A. 64, followed.

Where a District Magistrate cancelled the license for arms held by an accused and refused to grant an interview to him:

Held, that the circumstances were sufficient grounds for transfer of the case from the District.

Application for transfer.

Mr. Satya Chandra Mukerji, for the Applicant.

Mr. Ryves, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The applicant, Mahant Ram Kishen Das of Akhara Ram Bagh, sub-division Karwi, has filed three applications in this Court under section 526 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, with regard to three criminal cases pending against him in the Court of the Joint Magistrate of Karwi, praying that those cases be transferred to some other Court outside the District of Banda on the allegation that the District Authorities are prejudiced against him. The Mahant stands charged with the offences of rash and negligent driving, enticing away of a married woman with criminal intent and committing riot in the course of the abduction of the woman. The allegations on which the transfer is sought are to put briefly: (1) that on the 5th of June 1912, the Joint Magistrate at first refused to see the applicant and when on the latter's repeated request an interview was allowed, the Joint Magistrate told him that the applicant was a badmash and ordered him to go away; (2) that the Joint Magistrate has sanctioned the prosecution of the applicant for rash and negligent driving; (3) that the Joint Magistrate received information of the alleged abduction at his bungalow in the middle of the night of the 27th of June 1912, and went at once to the Railway Station and issued orders to the Police to make inquiry; (4) that the District Magistrate of Banda cancelled the applicant's license for arms and declined to see him when he called to pay his respects on the 8th of July 1912. No explanation appears to have been submitted by the Joint or the RAM KISHAN DAS v. EMPEROR.

District Magistrate in reply to the allegations of the applicant. The learned Government Advocate appears to oppose the applications for transfer. He says that he does not oppose the transfer from the Court of Mr. Muir, the Joint Magistrate, not because the allegations made against him are true, but because the defence might possibly call him as a witness in the abduction case. In the case of transfer from the District Magistrate's Court, he opposes it strenuously on the ground that no case has been made out for imputing prejudice to the District Magistrate. For the applicant, it is contended that what the Court has to consider on an application for transfer is "not merely the question whether there has been a real bias in the mind of the presiding Magistrate against the accused but also the further question whether incidents may not have happened which, though they may be susceptible of explanation and may have happened without any real bias in the mind of the Magistrate, are nevertheless such as are calculated to create in the mind of the accused a reasonable apprehension that he may not have a fair and impartial trial." The withdrawal of the applicant's license for arms and the Magistrate's refusal to see the applicant before he was found guilty by a Court of law are circumstances, it is said, which are calculated to create in the mind of the applicant a reasonable apprehension that he may not have a fair and impartial trial. In support of his contention, the learned Counsel for the applicant relies on a case of this Court, namely, Farzand Ali v. Hanuman Prasad (1). The learned Government Advocate replies that the cancellation of the license for arms is a matter purely discretionary with the Magistrate and his refusal to see a man, who is standing his trial in a Criminal Court, is not improper, and that neither circumstance implies a prejudice in the mind of the Magistrate, nor can it be said to create a reasonable apprehension in the mind of an ordinary man that he would not have a fair and impartial trial at the hands of the Magistrate. Moreover, it is said that the case of Farzand Ali v. Hanuman Prasad (1) has not, as a rule, been followed in this Court. The correctness of the order of the Magistrate cancelling the license for arms, or the propriety of his conduct in refusing an interview to the applicant is not and could not be in question in the present application. Nor is it contended by the learned Counsel for the applicant that the District Magistrate is, as a matter of fact, prejudiced against the applicant. What is advanced for the applicant and has to be considered is whether the said two circumstances would create in the mind of the applicant a reasonable apprehension of not getting a fair and impartial trial in the Court of the District Magistrate. The position of an accused person is always one of great anxiety and suspense, and incidents, though susceptible of explanation, and which would perhaps pass unnoticed, but for the trial he is undergoing, alarm him and lead him to think that his guilt is already believed and that his conviction is a foregone conclusion. It is quite possible that such an impression has been produced in the mind of the applicant by the circumstances referred to above as they very likely led him to infer that the District Magistrate was displeased with him. It would, therefore, be advisable to grant the applicant's request for transfer. The suggestion that the principle enunciated in the case of Farzand Ali v. Hanuman Prasad (1), has not been followed in this Court has no force, as I find on similar considerations transfers were allowed in the following cases, namely, Krishna Nath Tewari v. King-Emperor (2); Inayat Ali Khan v. King-Emperor (3) and Mohammad Fazal Ullah v. King-Emperor (4). I think it is expedient in the ends of justice that the three cases pending against the applicant in the Court of the Joint Magistrate of Karwi should be transferred to another District. I am told that Allahabad is as far from Manikpore where most of the witnesses live as Banda is, and that it would be convenient to both parties to have the case tried in Allahabad. I order that the three cases, against the applicant, be transferred from the Court of the Joint Magistrate of Karwi to that of the District Magistrate of Allahabad, who will either try the cases Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1893), s. 476—Action under section—When may be taken.

To justify action under section 476, it will suffice if it is taken with reasonable promptitude, i.e., so shortly after the conclusion of the proceedings as to make it practically the continuation of the same proceeding.

Petition, under sections 435 and 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, praying the High Court to revise the order of the 2nd Class Magistrate of Ramnad, dated 15th June 1912, in Mis. Order No. 7 of 1912 and to stay the proceedings in C. C. No. 60 of 1912 on the file of the Court of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Ramand, pending disposal of Criminal Revision Case No. 301 of 1912.

FACTS.—The petitioner in this case was a witness for the prosecution in C. C. No. 163 of 1912 on the file of the Sub Magistrate's Court, Ramnad, in which certain constables were charged for offences under sections 147, 323, 427, 354 and 448, Indian Penal Code. One of the facts put forward by the prosecution in that case was that when the constables were causing riot, some of the complainant's party proceeded to the bungalow of the District Superintendent of Police in order to report the occurrence to him. The accused, as the 5th witness for prosecution in that case, stated in course of his examination-in-chief that it was he and Court witness No. 2 that did so. "Immediately I and Maradu went to inform the Superintendent. We were not able to see him." In cross-examination, he said:—'As soon as the accused went away, I went home direct. At the very beginning when there was a row between the 1st accused and complainant I was present. Afterwards I was attending to my trade till the accused came in numbers. I did not go out anywhere. As soon as the accused began their rioting, I went away to my house.' The Sub-Magistrate held that the witness had perjured himself by giving contradictory statements and ordered the prosecution under section 476, Criminal Procedure Code, for an offence under section 193, Indian Penal Code, on the 15th June 1912. The judgment in calendar case was delivered on 10th June 1912. It was urged in revision that as the petitioner was examined in Court on the 6th and 7th June, judgment delivered on the 10th, there was nothing on the record to show that the Magistrate contemplated action then and that the subsequent order passed on the 15th June was, therefore, one made without jurisdiction.

Mr C. Mahadhavan Nair, for the Petitioner.

Mr. C. F. Napier, Contra.

ORDER.—Reading the deposition of the petitioner as a whole, I cannot say that the Magistrate's action requires interference of this Court under its revisional powers which are not exercised as matter of course.

As regards the delay of 5 days in taking action under section 476, Criminal Procedure Code, the Full Bench case in Aiyakannu Pillai v. Emperor (1) does not decide that the action should be taken invariably in the course of the judicial proceeding or at its conclusion. If it is taken within reasonable promptitude, that is, so shortly after the conclusion of the proceedings as to make it practically the continuation of the same proceeding, it will suffice. I hold that the action taken by the Magistrate in this case was prompt enough.

The petition is rejected.

Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), ss. 182, 211—False charge, bringing of, before Police—Recommendation by Police that informant should be prosecuted—Prosecution of informant and conviction—Irregularity—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898*), ss* 195, 532, 537—"Complaint".

The appellant lodged information before a Sub-Inspector of Police that certain persons had beat him and set fire to a house. The Sub-Inspector on inquiry did not believe the story and recommended that the appellant might be prosecuted under sections 182 and 211 of the Penal Code.

The prosecution of the appellant was then directed by a Deputy Magistrate. A preliminary inquiry was made and the appellant was committed to the Court of Session and convicted under section 211:

Held, that even if there was any defect in the initiation of the proceedings in the original Court, still when the accused had been committed for trial to the Court of Session, a conviction by that Court could not be set aside simply on the ground of some irregularity in the commitment proceedings, more specially when that point was not raised in the first Court, and that section 532 of the Criminal Procedure Code would cure such a defect.

Haibat Khan v. Emperor, 33 C. 30, 10 C. W. N. 30; 3 Cr. L. J. 125 and Abdul Rahman v. Emperor, 7 C. L. J. 371, 7 Cr. L. J. 338, distinguished.

Queen-Empress v. A. Morton and Moorteza Ali, 9 B. 288, relied upon.

Section 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code clearly contemplates prosecutions at the instance of Police Officers. In any case, when a Police Officer asks that a person should be prosecuted under section 211, Indian Penal Code, for information given to him, and gives evidence himself in support of that charge, no serious irregularity can arise in the conviction of the accused in proceedings initiated upon that report.

Appeal against the order of the Sessions Judge of Gya, convicting the appellant under section 211, Indian Penal Code, and sentencing him to undergo rigorous imprisonment for three years.

Mr. P. L. Roy, Counsel, and Babu Siva Nandan Roy, for the Appellant.

Mr. Orr, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The appellant in this case has been convicted under section 211 of the Indian Penal Code of instituting false criminal proceedings before the Sub-Inspector of Fatehpur Police Station against one Fazl Hussain and others.

It appears that there was some dispute about the possession of the village Manhona and the zemindari Kutchery therein, between Karn Singh who is one of the ticcadars of the village and Amirul Hossein who is a lessee from Kali Singh another ticcadar. The accused Dilan Singh admittedly went to the thana and there lodged information before the Sub-Inspector, Rajendra Narain Sarma, that while he was sitting in the Kutchery, Fazal Miah and others came there, caught hold of him, beat him, shut him up in a room in the Kutchery and there set fire to the thatch of the Kutchery building: that he raised an alarm and the villagers came and rescued him. The Sub-Inspector on inquiry, did not believe this story. The words of his final report are:—"I, therefore, submit the final report in the case and recommend that Dilan Singh and Karn Singh may be prosecuted under sections 182 and 211."

The prosecution of the accused was then directed by a Deputy Magistrate. A preliminary inquiry was made and the accused was committed to the Court of Session. The learned Sessions Judge, agreeing with both the assessors, has convicted the accused under section 211 and has sentenced him to three years' rigorous imprisonment.

The learned Counsel, who appears on behalf of the appellant, argues in the first place that the conviction is bad inasmuch as the first Deputy Magistrate had no jurisdiction to direct the prosecution of the accused under section 476 of the Criminal Procedure Code, and reliance has been placed on the case of Haibat Khan v. Emperor (1) and that of Abdul Rahman v. Emperor (2). The case of Haibat Khan v. Emperor (1) seems to us to be quite distinguishable, because, in that case there had been no commitment nor was the accused convicted at the Sessions Court. It seems to us clear that this makes a very considerable difference. Even if there is any defect in the initiation of the proceedings in the original Court, still when the accused has been committed for trial to the Court of Session, a conviction by the Court of Session cannot, in our opinion, be set aside simply on the ground of some irregularity in the commitment proceedings, more specially when that point was not raised in the first Court. In circumstances which are not wholly dissimilar, the Bombay High Court held that section 532 would cure such a defect [see the case of Queen-Empress v. A. Morton and Morteza Ali (3)]. In the case of Abdul Rahman v. Emperor (2), though the learned Judges purported to follow the case of Haibat Khan v. Emperor (1), they went very considerably beyond the decision in the former case. That case, however, is distinguishable from the present case because of the circumstance that the Police Officer in this case has recommended the prosecution under section 211. It has been argued that that cannot be regarded as a complaint because the complainant was not examined on oath. Certainly, it is not a complaint as defined in the Code inasmuch as that definition expressly excludes a report of a Police Officer. But it appears to us to come within the meaning of the word complaint as used in section 195, as that section clearly contemplates prosecutions at the instance of the Police Officer. In any case when a Police Officer asks that a person should be prosecuted under section 211 for information given to him, and gives evidence himself in support of that charge, we cannot see that any serious irregularity can arise in the conviction of the accused in proceedings initiated upon that report. The order of the first Deputy Magistrate purporting to be one under section 476 might in that case be regarded as surplusage. We do not, therefore, think that effect can be given to the point of law raised by the learned Counsel. We are not prepared to say that there has been any real irregularity inasmuch as the accused has been prosecuted at the request of a person who was entitled to ask for a prosecution. But if there has been any irregularity, it certainly, in our opinion, is such an one as is cured by section 532 or 537 of the Criminal Procedure Code. On the facts, the evidence is altogether one-sided. It is common ground that the Kutchery building was set on fire by one side or the other. The whole of the evidence is that it was not set on fire by Fazal Miah and indeed Fazal Miah had no apparent motive beyond the ties of friendship to burn the Kutchery and to attempt to burn Dilan Singh. There are small defects apparently in the story of the prosecution as there are in all such stories but the learned Judge has dealt with them in his judgment and his discussion of them and the conclusions that he has arrived at with respect to them appear to us to be reasonable. We, therefore, think that the conviction is right. The sentence is not excessive.

(1) 33 C. 30; 10 C. W. N. 30; 3 Cr. L. J. 125.

The appeal is accordingly dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

PAIMAL NAI—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 110 —Power of Police to detain—Suspected person.

Section 110 is not intended to afford the Police a means of keeping a suspected person under detention until they are able to work out a case against him. Action of this kind on the part of the Police tends to throw doubt upon their work generally and a Magistrate should not detain a person under section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code, unless he has the necessary information upon which he can make the order in writing required by section 112.

Criminal revision against an order of the Sessions Judge of Saharanpur.

JUDGMENT.—Paimal Nai is reported to have been arrested by the Police acting under section 54 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. He was arrested as being a person who had been concerned in a cognizable offence or against whom a reasonable complaint had been made or credible information received or reasonable suspicion existed of his having been so concerned. The offence is apparently theft or possession of stolen property belonging to one Mohan.

The value of this information or suspicion may be appraised from the fact that when he was arrested, no attempt whatever was made to charge him with the offence. The Police, instead, had resort to section 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and they placed Paimal before a Magistrate with a view of action being taken under that section. They appear to have given the Magistrate some information of the vaguest possible description that Paimal had been concerned in several cases, that he was in the habit of consorting with bad characters and that he was himself a bad character. As this information, which was given to the Magistrate before the 17th February 1912, was not substantiated by any evidence until the 11th March 1912, the probability is that this was a bow drawn to venture and that the Police had no information such as they said they had. I cannot understand how the learned Magistrate detained Paimal upon a report of this kind.

Section 110 is not intended to afford the Police a means of keeping a suspected person under detention until they are able to work out a case against him. Action of this kind on the part of the Police tends to throw doubt upon their work generally and a Magistrate should not detain a person under section 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure unless he has the necessary information upon which he can make the order in writing required by section 112. So far as I can gather from the papers on the record, and on inquiry made, I have been told that there are no further Police papers, the arrest of Paimal was not warranted by law. Then I find that on the order being read over and explained to the suspected person, he said that he had no cause to show. Assuming this to be an accurate statement of what the person suspected said, it is difficult to understand why the Police asked for further time to produce evidence and why defence witnesses were sent for. The whole proceedings are so doubtful that I direct that the order, dated the 11th of April 1912, be set aside and that Paimal be unconditionally released.

Conviction set aside.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), ss. 256, 257, 526—Transfer application to superior Magistrate—Duty of Magistrate to adjourn—Accused given opportunity to cross-examine prosecution witnesses or cite defence witnesses—Duty to give another opportunity.

There is no duty cast on a Magistrate to adjourn a case because an application is being made to a superior Magistrate for transfer; section 526, Criminal Procedure Code, confines that duty to cases where application is made to the High Court.

Once the requirements of section 256 or 257 have been complied with and the accused refuses to state that he wishes to cross-examine witnesses or cite defence witnesses, there is no provision requiring the Magistrate to offer an opportunity to the accused to have his witnesses summoned.

Petition, under sections 435 and 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1908, praying the High Court to revise the judgment of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Kumbakonam, in Criminal Appeal No. 52 of 1912, presented against that of the second class Magistrate of Papanasam, in Calendar Case No. 20 of 1912.

FACTS.—On the 15th January 1912, the complainant and another were riding their bicycles along the road when the accused, heedless of the ringing of the bells, pushed down the cycle with rider and on being remonstrated therefor slapped the complainant on the cheek. The two people took to their heels but the accused pursued them and threw stones at them. A complaint was then lodged.

On the 17th February, the accused applied to the Sub-Magistrate for an adjournment to move for a transfer. The case was adjourned to the 4th March and the accused was told the case will not be adjourned further. On the 4th, the accused again applied for an adjournment on the ground that no orders have been passed yet by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate on his transfer petition. The accused was then asked to go on and as the accused's Pleader was not present, the Magistrate adjourned the case to the 15th. On the 15th, the accused again represented that no orders have yet been passed on his transfer petition and asked for an adjournment The adjournment was refused and the accused declined to cross-examine the prosecution witnesses. He did not put in a list of the witnesses or bring any with him. The accused's Pleader said he had no instructions to proceed with the case but only to apply for adjournment. Under these circumstances, the Sub-Magistrate found the accused guilty under sections 341, 323 and 426, Indian Penal Code, and sentenced him to a fine of Rs. 75. The accused appealed: The Sub-Divisional Magistrate in ordering a re-trial said: "The procedure adopted by the Sub-Magistrate in disposing of this case is beset with many illegalities which must make his proceedings completely void. (1) There was an application before the Sub-Divisional Magistrate for transfer of this case to the file of some other Magistrate. The Sub-Magistrate, without waiting to see what was the result of the application, has proceeded with the case and disposed of it. The judgment in the case was pronounced on the 15th March last while order on the application was received by him on the 17th of that month. This procedure appears clearly illegal. (2) The prosecution witnesses in the case were not cross-examined and before the appellant was put on the defence, the witnesses for the prosecution were not offered to the appellant for further cross-examination as required in section 256, Criminal Procedure Code. (3) Further, no defence witnesses have been examined in this case. The Sub-Magistrate has asked the appellant whether he has brought his defence witnesses. In a warrant case, the appellant has a right under section 257, Criminal Procedure Code, to have his witnesses summoned by the Court. This opportunity does not appear to have been offered to the appellant."

Mr. G. S. Ramachandra Iyer, for the Petitioner.

Mr. S. T. Srinivasa Gopalachariar, for the Accused.

ORDER.—The order of the Sub-Divisional Magistrate is based on grounds which do not support it. There is no duty cast on a Magistrate to adjourn a case because an application is being made to a superior Magistrate for transfer. That duty is confined to cases where the application is to be to the High Court; section 526, Criminal Procedure Code. It appears from the record that the requirements of section 256 as to requiring the accused to state whether he wishes to cross-examine any witness were complied with. There is no provision requiring the Magistrate to offer an opportunity to the accused to have his witnesses summoned. It is his right to apply and he did not exercise it. I set aside the order for re-trial and direct the Sub-Divisional Magistrate to take the appeal on his file and dispose of it according to law.

Order set aside.

A document was tampered with during the pendency of a suit before a Munsif. The Munsif reported the fact to the District Judge, who wrote to the District Magistrate to take action in the matter:

Held, that the letter of the District Judge to the District Magistrate fell within the definition of a complaint under section 195 (b) of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Mr. Nehal Chand, for the Applicant.

M. A. E. Ryves, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—It appears that in a case pending in the Court of the Munsif of Havali in the District of Bareilly, a document was tampered with. The learned Munsif reported to the District Judge about the tampering of the document. The latter wrote to the District Magistrate to take action in the matter. The case was made over to the Joint Magistrate of the District for trial. The applicant, who is one of the accused in the case, has filed this petition under section 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, for revision of the proceedings pending in the Court of the Joint Magistrate. It is contended on his behalf that the Joint Magistrate has no jurisdiction to try the applicant and the other accused inasmuch as no complaint according to law has ever been filed. It is argued that the letter of the District Judge to the District Magistrate, in the absence of any proceedings under section 476 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, does not fall within the definition of a complaint, and that section 195, clause (b) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, has no application. In support of this contention, the learned Counsel has cited In the matter of the petition of Mathura Das (1) and In re Lakshmidas Lalji (2). A later decision of this Court, viz., Emperor v. Sundar Sarup (3), covers the present case. The application is, therefore, rejected.

Criminal reference made by the Sessions Judge of Gorakhpur.

Mr. M. L. Agarwala, for the Applicant.

JUDGMENT.—This is a Reference made by the learned Sessions Judge of Gorakhpur, under section 438 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, recommending that the conviction of one Kamla Prasad, under section 290 of the Indian Penal Code, be set aside and the sentence of fine be remitted. The circumstances which gave rise to the prosecution of Kamla Prasad are as follows:—Kamla Prasad is a karinda of the Rani of Gopalpur. A bazar is held at a place called Gola, which, it is said, is comprised in the zemindari of the Rani. In the afternoon of March 26th, 1912, the second officer of the Police Station of Gola was passing through the bazar on an ekka. He found a crowd in the bazar which intercepted his further progress. On dispersing the crowd, it was discovered that Kamla Prasad was sitting on a charpoy in the middle of the road and there were two chairs, one on each side of the charpoy occupied by the friends of Kamla Prasad. On demand by the Sub-Inspector, the charpoy and the chairs were removed and the Sub-Inspector proceeded on his way in the ekka. Kamla Prasad was subsequently prosecuted under section 290 of the Indian Penal Code on the charge of causing a public nuisance by keeping a charpoy in the middle of a road. Kamla Prasad denied the charge and pleaded that he was sitting at a place close by the shop of one Faqir Meah. The learned Magistrate, however, disbelieved Kamla Prasad and convicted him under section 290 of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced him to pay a fine of Rs. 15. Kamla Prasad applied to the learned Sessions Judge of Gorakhpur for revision. The learned Judge has submitted the case to this Court, being of opinion that the conviction of Kamla Prasad was bad in law. It may be taken as proved in this case, that Kamla Prasad was sitting on a charpoy on the road in the bazar, but the question is whether this act falls under section 290 of the Indian Penal Code. I agree with the learned Judge that the act of Kamla Prasad in placing a charpoy on the road in the bazar temporarily, did not amount to the offence of causing public nuisance. The learned Magistrate in his explanation has referred to three cases in support of his order. In re Umesh Chander Kar (1), Queen-Empress v. Virappa Chetti (2), Rex v. Lord Grosvenor (3). Those cases are not on all fours with the present case. In all those cases, the obstruction was of a permanent nature. As remarked by the learned Judge, it is a common thing in this country for persons to place their charpoys on the public roads without any intention of obstructing traffic. It is not quite clear from the record whether the passage of the ekka of the Sub-Inspector was obstructed by the crowd or by the charpoy of Kamla Prasad or by both. I, therefore, accept the Reference, set aside the conviction and sentence, and direct that the fine, if realised, be refunded.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), s. 195—Sanction to prosecute—Superior Court's duty when there is no prima facie case for sanction.

Where sanction to prosecute for any offence specified under section 195 of Act V of 1898, has been granted, the superior Court should see whether the discretion has been properly exercised, and when there is no prima facie case for the prosecution, the sanction should be revoked.

Petition for revision, under section 439 of the Criminal Procedure Code, of the order of the District Magistrate, Lyallpur, dated the 4th May 1912, upholding that of the Magistrate, 2nd class, Lyallpur, dated the 31st March 1912, sanctioning prosecution of the petitioner.

Mr. Nand Lal, for the Petitioner.

JUDGMENT.—The District Magistrate, acting under section 195 (6), Criminal Procedure Code, should have considered whether or not there was sufficient ground for granting sanction to prosecute. The question before him was not merely whether or not the Magistrate was empowered to grant sanction, but also whether or not the Magistrate had properly exercised his powers. Malang brought a complaint under section 428, Indian Penal Code, against Kiman and another, alleging Kiman had injured a pony with a gandasa. Jhandu purported to be an eye-witness of the mischief.

The pony had been injured but the Magistrate, not being satisfied that Kiman and the co-accused had done the deed, discharged them. Subsequently, on the application of Kiman, the Magistrate sanctioned the prosecution of Jhandu for giving false evidence.

Though the Magistrate was not satisfied with the evidence, the animal was injured, and it does not follow that Jhandu's evidence was false. There is certainly not a prima facie case against Jhandu and sanction should not have been given.

I set aside the order and revoke the sanction to prosecute Jhandu.

Petition allowed.

Criminal revision against an order of the Magistrate of Naini Tal.

Mr. S. C. Mukerji, for the Applicant.

Mr. R. Malcomson, Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The applicant, Hasin-ud-din, by an order of the Magistrate, dated the 11th of May 1912, was ordered to give security for his good behaviour for three years in his own bond for Rs. 500 and two sureties for Rs. 500 each. He produced two sureties, Karim Bakhsh and one other. The Magistrate has rejected this security for very peculiar reasons. His order runs as follows:—"The applicant, Karim Bakhsh, says he will keep Hasin-ud-din in his village but the other surety lives ten miles away at least from that village, and he is not present. Unless both the sureties live within a radius of five miles, I cannot allow this security." The order is by no means clear as to the centre from which the radius is to be drawn, whether that centre is to be the abode of the accused or of the sureties. Apparently there is no other defect in this security except that mentioned by the Magistrate, namely, that the sureties do not live within five miles of each other or of Hasin-ud din. This is no valid ground whatsoever for rejecting the security which is good in other respects. I, therefore, allow this application, set aside the order of the Magistrate and direct that the security offered by the two sureties produced be accepted together with the bond of Hasin-ud-din and that he be forthwith released directly the bonds are filed.

Public Gambling Act (III of 1867), ss. 3, 4—Search warrant illegal—Presumption.

A warrant issued for the search of any house, which the Police officer to whom the warrant was issued might think proper to search, is illegal and a search under it is not such as is contemplated by the Act. The result of such illegal search is, that no presumption whatsoever can be drawn in accordance with the Act such as is allowed by the terms thereof to be drawn in the case of a legal search.

Criminal revision from an order of the Magistrate, first class, of Mirzapur.

Mr. A. P. Dube, for the Applicant.

Mr. R. Malcomson, Assistant Government Advocate, for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.—The applicant in this case has been convicted under sections 3 and 4 of the Public Gambling Act and has been fined Rs. 30. The two points taken before me are:—(1) That the search carried out by the Police was entirely illegal, and (2) that it is not proved that the house in question is a gaming house. In regard to the first point after examining the warrant I find it was issued apparently for the search of any house which the Police officer to whom the warrant was issued might think proper to search. There can be little doubt that the warrant was entirely illegal and any search under it was not such as was contemplated by the Act. The result of this illegal search, however, is merely this, that no presumption whatsoever can be drawn in accordance with the Act such as is allowed by the terms thereof to be drawn in the case of a legal search. If, however, there is evidence on the record to establish that the house was a gaming house and that the present applicant was using it as such for his own profits, the legality of the conviction cannot be questioned. The evidence on the record is to the effect that the house in question belongs to one Mohan Kalwar. It was empty and unoccupied. This is to be gathered from the evidence of Bindeshri, one of the defence witnesses. The prosecution evidence shows that Zakir and Hargobind, the present applicants, with or without the permission of the owner were, as a matter of fact, using a room in this building for the purpose of gaming and that they were taking a portion of the winnings from the winners. The evidence is to the effect that when the Police arrived, gaming was going on. Sixteen couries were found on the ground. There was also a carpet on the ground. Candles and chirag were alight. A piece of chalk and a certain amount of cash was also recovered. But it is impossible to follow the train of thought in the Magistrate's mind when he said that the piece of chalk in the present case was an instrument of gaming, for there is nothing on the record to show that it was used for that purpose. It is urged that couries are not instruments of gaming per se, and unless and until there is evidence to show that they were used as instruments of gaming, the Court has no right to hold that they were such instruments. The evidence for the prosecution is to the effect that gaming was going on and that sixteen couries were on the ground. Solahi is a game which is played with sixteen couries and is a very common game in this country for the purpose of gambling, though it would have been better if the Magistrate had made the point perfectly clear by examination of witnesses. Still the circumstances of the case place it beyond doubt that the game which was being played was a game of solahi for which couries are used as instruments of gaming. In my opinion, therefore, the evidence on the record is sufficient to enable the Court to hold that the applicant was using the house in question as a gaming house deriving profits therefrom, and the couries were instruments of gaming and were being used as such. In these circumstances, I do not deem it necessary to interfere at all in this case. The application is dismissed.

Application dismissed.

BISSONATH PROSAD MALITA v. BRINDESRI PROSAD SINGH.

CALCUTTA HIGH COURT.

REGULAR CIVIL APPEAL No. 188 OF 1910.

August 16, 1912.

Present:—Sir Lawrence Jenkins, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice N. Chatterjea.

BISSONATH PROSAD MALITA AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—APPELLANTS

BRINDESRI PROSAD SINGH AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Party—Mitakshara father, mortgage executed by—Only son minor at date of mortgage—Mortgage executed before advances made—Sums borrowed for family purposes—Suit on mortgage—Son made party defendant—Liability of son to be sued on mortgage—Decree against son—Mortgagee unable to prove item expended on family purpose—Inability of son to prove item borrowed for immoral purpose—Debt of father binding on son—Alteration of law—Procedure in mortgage suit—Joinder of defendant—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882).

The plaintiffs sued on a mortgage-bond executed by J., and they made his only son B., who was a minor at the date of the mortgage, a defendant in the suit. The sums covered by the bond were expended on legitimate family purposes; but the mortgage was executed before the advances were made. J. and B. formed a Mitakshara joint family, and the mortgage purported to charge the entire interest in the property mortgaged:

Held, that J., as the managing member of the family, had implied authority to execute the mortgage so as to make it unimpeachable by his minor son against whom as well as against his father, the mortgage could be enforced.

Suraj Bunsi Koer v. Sheo Persad Singh, 5 C. 148 at p. 165; 4 C. L. R. 226; 6 I. A. 88 and Gharibullah v. Khallak Singh, 30 I. A. 165; 5 Bom. L. R. 478; 7 C. W. N. 681; 25 A. 407, relied upon.

The plaintiffs were unable to show how an item of Rs. 600 was expended and the defendants refrained from throwing any light on the point:

Held, that as the defendants failed to show that the item was used for an immoral purpose, it was a debt of the father binding on the son, and he could not be permitted to redeem the mortgage except on paying the Rs. 600.

Luchmun Das v. Giridhur Chowdhury, 5 C. 855, 6 C. L. R. 473 (F. B.) commented upon.

After the passing of the Transfer of Property Act, a mortgagee must, in a suit on a mortgage of the joint property of a Mitakshara family executed by the father, join as a party the executant's son though he was a minor at the date of the instrument. But it was not necessary to make the son a party to such a suit before that Act was passed. The son's remedy was that he could sue to recover the property provided he could show that the debt was contracted for immoral purposes and the purchaser had notice that they were so contracted.

Appeal from the decree of the Sub-Judge of Patna, dated August 27th, 1909.

Babus Provash Chandra Mitra and Susil Madhab Mallik, for the Appellants.

Babus Umakali Mukherjee and Bhudeo Chandra Roy, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

JENKINS, C. J.—The plaintiffs have brought this suit to realise a mortgage security executed in their favour by Babu Jagdip Narain Singh, defendant No. 1. They have made defendants to the suit both Jagdip Narain Singh and his only son Brindesri Prosad Singh, it being their case that the son, who was a minor at the date of the mortgage, is as much bound by it so far as it creates a security on the property comprised in it, as the father by whom it was executed. The suit was dismissed as against the son and hence this appeal.

The mortgage, Exhibit I, is dated the 21st November 1893, and to appreciate its meaning, it should be borne in mind that the mortgagees were a firm of bankers or mahajans. It begins in these terms: "Whereas I, the declarant, have taken lease of certain mouzahs and have to pay the rent thereof to the proprietors instalment by instalment; but the rent is not realised in due time from the tenants of the lease-hold mouzah and the proprietors are always making pressing demands; therefore, I have of my own accord and free-will opened, for the payment of the rent to proprietors due on account of the lease-hold mouzahs, a khata for Rs. 5,000 bearing interest at the rate of Re. 1 per cent. per mensem with the firm of Babu Bir Kishwar Lal-Parmeshur Narain at Koochi Hirnanand Sahu, appertaining to Thana Chouk Kalan, one of the quarters of Patna City as per details given below"—Then there follow provisions regulating the details of the transaction. The first clause provides for two chittas, one to be kept in the bankers' place of business, and the other to remain with the mortgagor, and then says:—"all sums paid into and received from the kothi by me shall be entered in both the chittas." The succeeding clauses deal with interest, periodical adjustments, the closing of the transaction, and then the charge is created in these terms. (His Lordship read clause 7).

The schedule to the mortgage describes the property, and from this description, it is apparent that the instrument professes to charge the entire family interest in this property. This has not been disputed before us.

It is the plaintiffs' case that the transaction has been closed, and that there is due to them on the balance of the account a sum of Rs. 5,000 for principal, after giving up Rs. 7-0-9 and Rs. 3,554-10-8 for interest.

The amounts, which go to make up this sum of Rs. 5,000, are shown in a tabular form in the judgment of the Sub-Judge, where nine items are shown totalling Rs. 6,279-10-0 in all, and extending from Jeyt Sudi 6th to Magh Badi 11th, Sambat 1952.

The first two may be left out of consideration as they are beyond the limits claimed by the plaintiffs.

The rest call for a brief explanation. Excluding for the moment the last item of Rs. 600, it has been proved to my satisfaction, not merely by oral testimony, but by documentary evidence, that is above all cavil, that all these itmes were expended on legitimate family purposes, as for instance, the payment of rent, the payment of Government revenue, and family marriage expenses.

We have been taken through the items which go to show this with minute detail, but I do not propose to do more than state, as I have done, the general result of this investigation as no argument was addressed to us in disparagement of this conclusion. The attempt to evade liability by pleading the immorality of defendant No. 1 has been as unsuccessful as it was unmeritorious, and it was particularly unmeritorious, for there is strong reason to think that defendant No. 1 is in reality the person responsible for the advancement of this defence.

It was argued that the mortgage was security only for the amounts drawn or paid on account of instalments of rent, and in support of this, reliance was placed on the recital I have read. But this (in my opinion) places too narrow a construction on the instrument: the recital explains how the mortgage became necessary, but it does not control its operative provision.

The intention and effect of the instrument was, I think, to secure the balance from time to time due on the current account.

The result then is this; the mortgage purports to charge the entire interest in the property, and, apart from the Rs. 600 with which I will later deal, the whole of the Rs. 5,000, claimed as principal, was advanced for legitimate family purposes. Why then should not the mortgage be enforced against the entire family interest?

The law on this subject is thus stated by the Privy Council in Suraj Bunsi Koer v. Sheo Parsad Singh (1). "The right of co-parceners to impeach an alienation made by one member of the family without their authority, express or implied, has of late years been frequently before the Courts of India, and it cannot be said that there has been complete uniformity of decision respecting it. All are agreed that the alienation of any portion of the joint estate, without such express or implied authority, may be impeached by the co-parceners, and that such an authority will be implied, at least in the case of minors, if it can be shown that the alienation was made by the managing member of the family for legitimate family purposes."

This formulates a clear and precise principle, and it would seem to narrow the problem of the validity of a manager's alienation to this: had he an express authority? if not, had he an implied authority? At the same time, the passage indicates the kind of condition which would justify such an implication when it is pointed out that as against a minor's co-parcener it may be implied, if there was a legitimate family purpose.

But I do not read this statement of the law as laying down that these are the only conditions under which authority can be implied: each case must be judged according to its own peculiar circumstances. It is true that the word used in this passage is alienation; but a mortgage is an alienation, and nonetheless so because it is for a particular purpose: and this is recognised by the Transfer of Property Act.

Moreover, this view has the sanction of the highest judicial authority, for a mortgage by a managing member has been upheld on this principle by the Privy Council and in illustration of this I may refer to Gharibullah v. Khallak Singh (2).

No doubt, in the present case, the mortgage was executed before the advances were made: but I fail to see that this places any obstacle in the plaintiffs' way in view of the fact that the advances were all made for legitimate family purposes and the mortgage was a necessary part of the arrangement. And I hold that in the circumstances, defendant No. 1, as the managing member, had implied authority to execute the mortgage so as to make it unimpeachable by his minor son.

(1) 5 C. 148 at p. 165; 4 C. L. R. 226; 6 I. A. 88.
(2) 30 I. A. 165; 5 Bom. L. R. 478; 7 C. W. N. 681; 25 A. 407 (P. C.).

It follows, then, that the alienation by way of mortgage is good and that it can be enforced as a mortgage against the defendant No. 2 as well as against his father, defendant No. 1.

So far I have dealt with the case apart from the item of Rs. 600: now it is necessary to consider how matters stand regarding this item.

The plaintiffs have been unable to show how it was expended: the defendants have refrained from throwing any light on the point, and yet it is difficult to suppose that they have not family books of account and available sources of information that would show what was done with this sum.

It has been forcibly argued that in view of all the circumstances, the position would appear to be one where it would be reasonable to apply the provisions of section 106 of the Evidence Act and hold that as the mode of expenditure is especially within the knowledge of the defendants, the burden of proving how it was made was on them. [See Hunoomanpersad Pandey v. Mussammat Babooee Munraj Koonweree (3).]

But even if the plaintiffs cannot show that this sum was expended for a legitimate family purpose, on the other hand the defendants have wholly failed to show that it was used for an immoral purpose. And so we have the position indicated in the case of Luchmun Das v. Giridhur Chowdhry (4).

This is a determination of a Full Bench of this Court which has given rise to much discussion, and in token of this, I need only refer to two recent but conflicting decisions reported as Moheshur Dutt Tewari v. Kishun Singh (5) and Kishun Pershad v. Tipen Pershad Singh (6). On the strength of this Full Bench determination, it is urged on behalf of the respondent that we cannot decide in the plaintiffs' favour without a reference to a Bench specially constituted. At most, however, this contention can only refer to the Rs. 600, and as to this, the plaintiffs say they would prefer to give up this amount rather than incur the delay and expense of a reference.

But, is the reference necessary having regard to the circumstances of this case? First then, it has to be seen what the Full Bench determined?

One of the questions propounded to them was this: "In the case of a Mitakshara family consisting of a father and one minor son, where the father being the manager raises money by hypothecating certain ancestral family property by bonds, and it is not proved on the other hand that there was any legal necessity for his raising the money, nor on the other, that the money was raised or expended for immoral or illegal purposes, or that the lender made any inquiry as to the purpose for which it was required, can the lender, the mortgagee, enforce by suit against the father and the son the payment of his money by sale of the property during the father's life-time? The answer which was returned by the Full Bench was in these terms:—"The mortgage itself, upon which the money was raised, could not be enforced, but the debt contracted by the father, being itself an antecedent debt, within the meaning of the rulings of the Privy Council and the son being a party to the suit, the mortgagee, notwithstanding the form of the proceedings, would be entitled to a decree directing the debt to be raised out of the whole ancestral estate inclusive of the mortgaged property."

This answer has occasioned much discussion, but it is now the accepted view that it cannot mean that the mortgage is incapable of enforcement against the father to the extent of his share.

But even with this gloss, the ruling is not free from difficulty. If in execution of a decree against the father alone for a debt unconnected with any immoral or illegal purpose, a part of the family property is sold in execution, the son's obligation to pay his father's debts would of itself afford a sufficient answer to a suit brought by a son to recover the property.

At the date of the Full Bench decision, the result would have been the same though the suit was for enforcement of a mortgage, and the son was not a party to it. Since then, however, the Transfer of Property Act has been passed, and by section 85 it is provided (read section).

(3) 6 M. I. A. 393; 18 W. R. 81 note.
(4) 5 C. 855; 6 C. L. R. 473.

(6) 34 C. 735; 11 C. W. N. 613; 5 C. L. J. 569.

In Lala Suraj Proshad v. Golab Chand (7) it was held that this section is compulsory. So a mortgagee must now, in a suit on a mortgage of the joint property of a Mitakshara family executed by the father, join as a party the executant's son, though he was a minor at the date of the instrument. Such a son, therefore, is a person having an interest in the property comprised in the mortgage, and it is on that account and on that account alone that he is a necessary party. Moreover, it is only to a suit under Chapter IV of the Transfer of Property Act, now re-produced by Order XXXIV, Civil Procedure Code, relating to the mortgage that he is a necessary party.

The purpose of so joining the son is not to obtain a personal decree against him on the strength of his obligation to pay his father's debts, but primarily to give him an opportunity of redeeming as a person interested in the mortgaged property and incidentally to resist the suit as against himself on the ground that the character of the debt absolved him from any personal obligation. In this connection, regard may be had to section 90 of the Transfer of Property Act now re-produced in Order XXXIV, rule 6 of the Civil Procedure Code.

That it was not necessary to make the son a party to such a suit before the Transfer of Property Act was passed, or where its provisions did not apply, is clear from the cases to which reference was made in Lala Suraj Proshad's case (7). And though he was not a party, a decree could be passed for the sale of the entirety of the mortgaged property. The son's remedy in such a case was that he would sue to recover the property provided he could show that the debts were contracted for immoral purposes and the purchaser had notice that they were so contracted [Suraj Bansi Koer's case (1)]. Thus it will be seen that the law has been materially modified by statute and statutory rule since the Full Bench decision. But more than that, we have in this case facts which take it outside the scope of the Full Bench decision.

Here the sums covered by the mortgage were, with the exception of Rs. 600, advanced for a legitimate family purpose, and so there is a sufficient foundation for a decree for sale on the mortgage. And though it is not shown that the Rs. 600 was for a legitimate family purpose, it certainly was not for any immoral purpose, and in the circumstances, I think, it may be regarded as a debt of the father binding on the son, and that the 2nd defendant cannot be permitted to redeem the mortgage except on the terms of paying off the Rs. 600, as well as the balance of the Rs. 5,000 which is shown to have been contracted for legitimate family purposes.

The decree of the Sub-Judge must, therefore, be reversed and a mortgage-decree passed on the footing of Rs. 5,000 being due for principal. Unless the parties agree, there must be an account of what is due for interest at the mortgage rate. On payment of the amount so found by the defendants or either of them, there will be the usual direction for delivering up of the documents and, if required, for re-transfer. In default of payment within six months of this decree or the ascertainment of interest, whichsoever may be the later date, there will be a decree for sale and application of the proceeds. The plaintiffs must have their costs of the suit and appeal which will be added to their security.

N. CHATTERJEA, J.—I agree.

If one of the plaintiffs is wrongly described in the plaint as a minor and has not himself signed and verified the plaint, he is not on that account to be considered not a party.

Want of signature and verification does not entail the rejection of the plaint as such verification and signature can be supplied at any stage of the proceedings.

The plaintiff who has not signed or verified cannot be considered to be a new party, when he signs or verifies the plaint, so as to attract the application of section 22 of the Limitation Act.

Appeal against the decree of the District Court of North Arcot, in Original Suit No. 5 of 1908.

Mr. L. A. Govindaragava Iyer, for the Appellants.

Mr. P. Venkataramana Row, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—We are unable to take the view taken by the District Judge.

The 1st plaintiff was wrongly described in the plaint as a minor but was described as a plaintiff and though he has not himself signed and verified the plaint, he is not merely on that account to be considered as no party [Mohini Mohun Das v. Bungsi Buddan Saha Das (1)]. Want of signature or verification does not entail the rejection of the plaint under Order VII, rule 11 of the Civil Procedure Code, and such verification and signature can be supplied at any stage of the proceedings under Order VI, rule 17 and section 153 of the Code. Unless then it can be held that so far as the 1st plaintiff is concerned, there is really no plaint, the respondents cannot succeed, for it is only in the view that the 1st plaintiff was not on the record as plaintiff that his addition now could be considered as the bringing in of a new plaintiff, and so attract to the case the provisions of section 22 of the Limitation Act: and but for those provisions, it is obvious that any amendment of the plaint that might be necessary would have to be made in this case.

To succeed, we think the respondents ought to show that the 1st plaintiff did not consent to the suit in his name; that so far as he was concerned, it was certainly unauthorised [as was held to be the case in Sheorania v. Bharat Singh (2)] and there is nothing to show this; and, on the other hand, he has come forward stating that he is willing to proceed with the suit thus ratifying his mother's act, if he did not authorize it before.

(1) 17 C. 580. (2) 20 A. 90.

There is no reason to suppose that his description as a minor was due to anything but a mistake, as he has said, and we find no ground for holding that his prosecution of the suit will be prosecution by a new plaintiff within the meaning of section 22 of the Limitation Act

We allow the appeal and remand the suit to the District Judge for disposal according to law.

The costs in this Court will be costs in the suit.

Appeal allowed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. II, r. 2—First suit by mortgagee to recover arrears of interest—Subsequent suit to recover both principal and interest or possession against vendee of equity of redemption—Intermediate declaratory decree.

Where a mortgagee, who has, under the terms of the mortgage-deed, a clear option on the happening of a default in regular payment of interest by the mortgagor, of either taking possession at once or of realizing interest or of accumulating interest with principal until possession is taken, sues and obtains a decree only for arrears of interest, his subsequent suit against the vendee of the equity of redemption to recover both principal and interest due or possession of the mortgaged property is barred under rule 2, Order II of Act V of 1908.

Even the fact that the mortgagee had obtained an intermediate declaratory decree against the vendee, declaring his lien against the mortgaged property both for principal and interest, is of no effect and cannot revive his rights which had once been extinguished on the first occasion under the force of the said rule by reason of his suing only for arrear of interest.

plaintiff's claim for possession of the house on payment of Rs. 1,000.

The Hon'ble Mr. Shadi Lal, for the Appellant.

Mr. Sundar Das, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The question raised in this appeal is one of considerable difficulty and I have taken a very long time to determine what course should be adopted. The essential facts are as follows:—

On the 6th September 1892, one Harbhagwan, not represented in the present suit, mortgaged a house to plaintiff's father for Rs. 450 by way of collateral security (ar rahn) with interestat 12 per cent. payable in yearly sums of Rs. 54. If the interest should not be paid, the mortgagee was given a clear option of either taking possession at once, or of realising the interest in any way he could, or, if he preferred allowing it, to accumulate with the principal until possession might be claimed.

On the 24th June 1897, the mortgagee obtained a decree for Rs 250 as arrears of interest.

On the 12th January 1898, the defendant Ram Rattan bought the equity of redemption from the mortgagor, and he is understood to have continued in possession of the house ever since. On the 23rd June 1900, plaintiff's father obtained a decree, confirmed by the Divisional Judge on the 29th October 1900, for a declaration that he had a charge on the house as against Ram Rattan for Rs. 450 and interest.

The question is, whether that decree can be now enforced by the plaintiff against Ram Rattan, to the extent of Rs. 1,000, principal and interest. The Munsif decided that it could be so enforced and gave plaintiff a decree, but the learned Divisional Judge has dismissed plaintiff's suit as barred by Order II, rule 2, Civil Procedure Code. The wording of the lower Appellate Court's judgment is not very clear, but apparently the ruling of Ganga Ram v. Abdul Rahman (1) was relied on as authority for the decision, which it certainly is. That ruling has since been approved and followed in the very elaborate judgment of Chaudhri Kundan Lal v. Sardar Alla Dad Khan (2), which is even more in point in the present case as the question whether a mortgagee can derive any benefit from an option in his deed to take possession when he pleases (exactly as in the present case) was exhaustively considered and decided against the mortgagee.

As opposed to this view of the law, which has been several times taken in this Court in recent unpublished decisions, and is supported by the Privy Council ruling of Rangayya Goundan v. Nanjappa Rao (3), Mr. Shadi Lal, Counsel for the plaintiff, has quoted an apparently very clear decision, the other way, of Raman v. Wazira (4). The precise terms of the mortgage then in question were not disclosed, but it appears to me hardly open to doubt that the decision does directly conflict with those given in 1907 and 1910. Mr. Shadi Lal pressed that the point might be referred to a Full Bench as doubt has been expressed about the soundness of the rulings of 1907 and 1910, more especially as they strangely enough make no reference to Raman v. Wazira (4). In the end, I do not see my way to making the desired reference. Whatever view of the law may have been taken, 25 years ago, there is no ambiguity in the more recent decisions of two separate Division Benches which are definitely against plaintiff. I can hardly say that the matter is now so uncertain that a Full Bench should be asked to go into it again on the present not very important case, especially as there is no explanation of the plaintiff's great delay in suing. It may be hard on him that he should lose his money in consequence of his father's previous suit for interest only, but this is largely due to his dilatory tactics.

As a subsidiary plea, it was urged on plaintiff's behalf that he should be given the benefit of the declaratory decree passed in his father's favour on the 23rd June 1900. I am unable to take that view both for the possibly correct reason given by the lower Appellate Court, and still more because plaintiff's right, if destroyed by the 1897 suit for interest alone, could not subsequently be revived by a declaratory decree.

The result is that I feel constrained to uphold the lower Appellate Court's decree dismissing plaintiff's suit. The appeal is dismissed with costs to the defendant.

CIVIL MISCELLANEOUS PETITIONS NOS. 2243, 2289 AND 2317 OF 1912.

M. K. SUBRAMANIA IYER AND OTHERS—PETITIONERS

versus

MUTHULAKSHMIAMMAL AND OTHERS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 151, O. XL, rr. 1 to 4, O. XLIII, r. 1 (s)—Receiver—Power to discharge and remove—Rules—Prayer to be put in possession of properties—Discharge or removal of Receiver—Appeal—Inherent power of Court—Execution by Appellate Court—Practice.

There is no specific provision made in the Civil Procedure Code for the discharge or removal of a Receiver, nor is there any provision for appeals against orders of discharge or removal of Receivers.

The power to discharge and remove or to give directions to a Receiver must be taken to be inherent in the Court which appointed the Receiver and the Appellate Court has got all the powers of the original Court.

A prayer for execution cannot be made to the Appellate Court direct.

The prayer in a petition to discharge the Receiver and put the parties in possession was treated as a prayer for appointment of the petitioners as Receivers of the properties they claimed possession of and was granted.

Messrs. K. Ramachandra Iyer and T. V. Gopalaswami Mudaliar, for the Petitioners.

Messrs. S. Srinivasa Aiyengar and G. S. Ramachandra Iyer, for the Respondents.

ORDER.—The prayers in the petition put in by the 1st defendant (2nd respondent) and by his sons (the 3rd and 4th respondents) are as follows: (a) that the petitioners may be placed in possession by the Receiver appointed in the suit of the lands comprised in a list which might be called list A as well as of the ploughing cattle and other agricultural implements relating thereto, and (b) that such joint family debts as had been found to be binding on all the members of the family and not in appeal in the High Court might be ordered to be paid out of the family funds in the Court deposit.

This petition is put in under section 15 of the Charter Act and section 94 of the Code of Civil Procedure. I do not think section 15 of the Charter Act has any application. Section 94 of the Civil Procedure Code is very general in its terms. So far as this petition is concerned, it is as follows:—"In order to prevent the ends of justice from being defeated, the Court may, if it is so prescribed.....(e) make such other interlocutory order as may appear to the Court to be just and convenient." The word 'prescribed' is defined in section 2 clause 16 as meaning "prescribed by rules." I do not think that the prayers of this petition come under any rules contained in, or passed in accordance with, the Civil Procedure Code. This suit is a suit for partition among three branches of a Hindu family; the suit is now nearly eight years old. The parties have been kept out of the enjoyment of any benefit out of the family property for more than 10 years past. A Receiver has been appointed for the very extensive landed and other properties of the family by the lower Court. During the progress of the suit in the lower Court, three lists were put in and accepted by all parties as effecting a fair division of about half of the family lands into three equal shares. Lots were cast and the properties in the A list fell to the share of the 1st defendant and his sons, (the petitioners in this petition), the C list fell to the share of the 6th defendant (5th respondent), and the B list fell to the share of plaintiff and the 5th defendant (the appellant). See paragraph 40 (a) of the Subordinate Judge's judgment. The properties in the B list ($\frac{1}{3}$ share) were to be divided into equal halves as between plaintiff and 5th defendant. Fifth defendant is now dead and his two widows are quarrelling about the division of his 1/6 share.

After this Appeal No. 232 of 1909 was filed in this Court by the deceased, 5th defendant, he seems to have put in an application (Civil Miscellaneous Petition No. 1277 of 1909) in this Court for the continuance of the Receiver appointed by the lower Court till the disposal of the appeal. Notice was given to the parties representing the other two shares and they raised objections to the petition. The late Mr. Justice Krishnaswami Iyer passed the following order: "I do not think that this is a fit case for a Receiver now. There is no dispute about the shares or the bulk of the properties. I do not think the successful parties should be kept out of enjoyment of their shares. Any re adjustment of the shares if the appeal succeeds must necessarily be small. I dismiss the petition." Now this order of Krishnaswami Iyer, J., is clearly binding upon the parties and myself, so far as it goes. Any orders passed by the lower Court in connection with the Receiver's duties or the rights of the parties cannot prevail against the letter or the spirit of this order of Krishnaswami Iyer, J.

The present petition, as I said before, cannot be said to fall under any specific section or rule of the Civil Procedure Code. Order XL, rules 1 to 4, prescribe the procedure as regards the appointment, duties and remuneration of Receivers and the Court's power to direct the Receiver's properties to be attached and sold when the Receiver makes default in the performance of his duties and such like matters. There is no specific provision made in Order XL for the discharge or removal of a Receiver. There is also no provision in the Code allowing appeals in respect of orders of discharge and removal of Receivers though there is a provision [see Order XLIII, rule 1, clause (s)] for an appeal against an order under rule 1 or rule 4 of Order XL, i.e., orders appointing Receivers and orders attaching and selling properties of Receivers and similar orders. See Janaki Ammal v. Narayanaswami Iyer (1).

Orders discharging or removing Receivers and giving other necessary directions to Receivers must, therefore, come under the general powers of Courts, now expressly mentioned as existing in Courts by section 151 of new Code. In Woodroffe's Book on Receivers, it is said (page 269, section 30):—"The power to terminate flows naturally and as a necessary sequence from the power to create. The power of the Courts to remove or discharge a Receiver whom it has appointed may be exercised at any stage of the litigation. It is a necessary adjunct of the power of appointment and is exercised as an incident to, or consequence of, that power; the authority to call such officer into being necessarily implying the authority to terminate his functions when their exercise is no longer necessary, or to remove the incumbent for an abuse of those functions or for other cause shown" or "because of the necessity of the appointment having ceased to exist." I take it, therefore, that the present petition is put in for the exercise of the inherent powers of the Court, though it does not come under any particular section or rule in the Code. I may, however, suggest that the Procedure Committee might take this matter into consideration and frame rules in respect of the discharge and removal of Receivers and in respect of the powers of the Court to give directions to Receivers when particular contingencies occur. A rule might also be framed that when a Receiver has been appointed by a lower Court in a suit and an appeal is pending from that decree, the Appellate Court might treat the Receiver as appointed by itself and give directions to him in the conduct of his duties. The present petition put in by the owners of one of the three shares in the properties is supported by the owner of another $\frac{1}{3}$ share and also by the owner of one moiety of the remaining $\frac{1}{3}$rd share, that is, the plaintiff, at whose instance the Receiver was originally appointed. Even as regards the owners of the other moiety of the $\frac{1}{3}$rd share, one of the widows who alleges that she owns a share in that moiety supports this petition. It is only the widow who is alleged to be the owner of a very small fractional share that is opposing this petition. One of the objections raised by this small fractional sharer is that this Court as an Appellate Court has no jurisdiction to entertain any objection in connection with the Receiver's duties just now. I cannot uphold this contention. The deceased 5th defendant, under whom this fractional sharer claims, himself treated this Court as competent to pass orders in connection with the receivership as he applied in Civil Miscellaneous Petition No. 2177 of 1909 for an order relating to the receivership and Krishnaswami Iyer, J., passed such an order. Section 107 of the Code (old section 582) gives the Appellate Court all the powers of the Court of Original Jurisdiction. The suit and all the matters connected with the litigation are now before this Court and this Court has the power to pass all the necessary and convenient orders. See Ramanadhan Chetty v. Narayanan Chetty (2); Sankara Bhatta v. Subraya Bhatta (3) and Hukam Chand Bold v. Kamalanand Singh (4). The case in Chenna Reddi v. Peddaobi Reddi (5), overruling Ramanadhan Chetti v. Narayanan Chetty (6), does not affect the general rule which is expressly approved at the bottom of page 419 in Chenna Reddi v. Peddaobi Reddi (5). The general rule gives way, of course, when the statute itself provides for orders being passed on applications by the lower Court (as in applications for review) notwithstanding the filing of an appeal, and that is the only ground on which Ramanadhan Chetti v. Narayanan Chetty (2) was overruled by Chenna Reddi v. Peddaobi Reddi (5). The preliminary objection is, therefore, overruled.

As Krishnaswami Iyer, J., has remarked, this is not a fit case for the existence of a Receiver, so far as regards the properties about which there is no dispute worth the name and the successful parties should not be kept any longer out of enjoyment of such properties, which have fallen to their respective shares. Any re-adjustment of the shares even if the appeal succeeds must necessarily be small. It is admitted that at least Rs. 40,000 out of the income is in the custody of the Court and that is amply sufficient for any such re-adjustment, as that money along with the respective shares of the parties is security for the carrying out of the small re-adjustments which may be found necessary at the end. The objections of the fractional sharer, who is one of the representatives of the deceased appellant, are most of them frivolous and I overrule them. The prayer in the petition to put the respective sharers in possession of the respective plots in lists A, B and C, after discharging the Receiver from his duties and removing him from possession in respect of those plots, looks as if it was a prayer for execution of a portion of the decree of the lower Court. A prayer for execution cannot be made to the Appellate Court direct. See Mithibai v. Limji Nowroji Banaji (6). I will, therefore, treat it as a prayer for appointment of first petitioner as Receiver of the lands in list A discharging the existing Receiver so far as those lands are concerned. In the result, I direct that the Receiver be discharged as regards the following lands:

(a) Lands in list A except the lands in respect of which objections as to the division are pending in the lower Court and which are referred to in the objection petition put in by the 5th defendant to the lower Court in regard to certain punja lands and certain items of nanja lands in Nochukudi Village.

(b) Lands in list C except those to which objections are pending in the lower Court as above.

The remaining $\frac{1}{3}$rd share in list B, about which the plaintiff and the widows of the 5th defendant are having a triangular quarrel, will continue to remain with the Receiver as also the properties not comprised in the lists A, B and C and the properties excepted out of the lists A, B and C as above. The 6th defendant is appointed Receiver as regards the properties in the C list with the exception already mentioned. The present Receiver will put the new Receivers into possession of the respective properties of which they have been appointed Receivers. He will also put the new Receivers in possession of not less than 75 per cent. in value of the ploughing cattle and other agricultural implements, etc., appurtenant to the A list and C list.

A copy of this order shall be served upon the Receiver by the petitioners. The Receiver and all parties shall be at liberty to apply to this Court as regards the future remuneration of the Receiver after he delivers possession of the properties ordered to be delivered to the new Receivers and all other matters connected with the receivership. They can also apply to the lower Court for payment of moneys out of sums remaining in Court for the discharge of common debts and the lower Court (it must be presumed) will pass the necessary orders on those petitions so far as is allowed by law. There will be no order as to costs of this petition. The party appointed

First appeal from a decision of the Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur, dated the 13th June 1911.

Mr. Haribans Sahai, for the Appellant.

Mr. Iswar Saran, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The appeal arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiffs, who alleged themselves to be the reversionary heirs of one Ramlal, for a declaration that a Will executed by Musammat Munga, widow of Ramlal, was null and void as against the interests of the reversioners on the ground that Musammat Munga had no authority to execute it. The Court below decreed the suit. In appeal, the only ground pressed for our consideration out of the six grounds in the memorandum of appeal is that the plaintiffs had no cause of action for bringing the suit and we are referred to a decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Pirthipal Kunwar v. Guman Kunwar (1). In the later case of Thakurain Jaipal Kunwar v. Indar Bahadur Singh (2), the facts of which are almost on all fours with those of the present case, their Lordships of the Privy Council held that the execution of a Will by a limited owner, such as a Hindu widow, affords, as a general rule, no sufficient reason for granting a declaratory decree. But in the circumstances of the case before them, their Lordships held that they would not interfere with the decision of the Courts below which had been passed in deliberate exercise of the discretion entrusted to them by law. In the pleadings of the present case, the defendant set up a title in the widow wholly inconsistent with the right of the reversioners. Under these circumstances, following the ruling just referred to, we think we should not interfere with the decision of the Court below. We dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), s. 539, scope of—Suit against trespasser.

Section 539 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1882, is applicable only in cases of an express or constructive trust created for a public charitable purpose.

The section applies only to a suit against a trustee and not to a suit against a trespasser.

Second appeal from the decree of the District Court of South Tanjore, in A. S. No. 291 of 1879, affirming that of the Sub-Court at Kumbakonam, in Original Suit No. 21 of 1879.

Mr. T. Rama Row, for the Appellant.

Mr. A. Ramachandra Aiyar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.

KINDERSLEY, J—In the present case, the plaintiff, as the person having hereditary right to the mangement of a public charity, sues a person whom he regards as a trespasser. This is not the case of one of the general public and suing without the authority of the Advocate-General or other officer to secure the due performance of the trust, and, I think, that section 539, Civil Procedure Code, does not apply. The decision of the two lower Courts must be reversed and the suit must be remanded to the Subordinate Courts for decision on the merits.

The costs will be disposed of by the final decree.

FORBES, J.—Section 539 is applicable only in cases of an alleged breach of an express or constructive trust created for a public charitable purpose. The restriction on the right of suing is thus confined to cases where the person sued is a trustee. In the present case, the suit is brought against an alleged trespasser, whose title to manage is denied and who, if he is without title, cannot be guilty of a breach of trust.

Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), ss. 105, 109 A, 157—Record of Rights—Person settled as raiyat by trespasser—Recorded as raiyat in Record of Right—Settling fair rent—Relationship of landlord and tenant—Whether consent of both parties essential—Decision of Special Judge in s. 105 Bengal Tenancy Act case, declining jurisdiction—Decision settling fair rent—Second appeal.

A person, who is settled on a certain land as a raiyat by a trespasser, does thereby become a raiyat of some kind, and, therefore, when the zemindari is transferred by operation of law from one zemindar to another, he remains a raiyat on the land; and if he is recorded by the Settlement Authorities in the Record of Rights as a raiyat on the land, the zemindar is entitled to treat him as a raiyat and to ask the Revenue Court to settle a fair rent with him.

Binad Lal Pakrashi v. Kalu Pramanik, 20 C. 708 (F. B.), followed.

In order that the relationship of landlord and tenant might be established between two parties, the consent of both parties is not essential under the law in this country, though it may be so under the English law.

A decision by a Special Judge that he had no jurisdiction as a Revenue Court to fix a fair rent in respect of lands held by the defendants, inasmuch as the latter were trespassers, and that the zemindar's only remedy was by the institution of a suit, under section 157 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, is not a decision settling rent, and a second appeal from that decision is not barred by section 109A.

Appeal from the decree of the Special Judge of Backergunge, dated April 23rd, 1910, reversing that of the Assistant Settlement Officer of that District, dated September 7th, 1909.

Dr. Rash Behary Ghose, Babus Akhoy Kumar Banerjee and Romesh Chandra Sen, for the Appellants.

Mr. S. P. Sinha, Counsel, Babus Jogesh Chandra Roy, Prokash Chandra Majumdar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This is a second appeal from the judgment of the learned Special Judge of Backergunge, in which he held that he had no jurisdiction as a Revenue Court to fix a fair rent in respect of lands held by defendants-respondents in the zemindari of the plaintiff-appellant, inasmuch as those tenants were trespassers and the zemindar's only remedy was by the institution of a suit under section 157 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, in which suit he can either eject the trespassers or have a fair and equitable rent determined by the Court.

A preliminary objection was raised that there was no second appeal in a case under section 105 where there was a decision settling rent. But it is obvious in this case there was no decision settling rent, that the Special Judge declined jurisdiction, and the only question before us is whether this appeal should be remanded to the lower Appellate Court to be decided on the merits or whether the learned Judge was right in declining jurisdiction.

Now, the appellant bases his appeal on two very clear grounds. The first is that on an application under section 105 of the Bengal Tenancy Act as it stood before the amendment as regards Eastern Bengal in 1908, neither the Assistant Settlement Officer nor the Special Judge had jurisdiction to decide whether the persons who are entered in the Settlement Record as ryots are ryots or not. He was bound to take the Settlement Record as he found it and if he was asked by a person who showed that he was the zemindar of the property which the ryots were occupying, he was bound to settle their rent if asked to do so; and in this connection, the case of Pandab Dowari Das v. Ananda Kishun Chakravarti (1) was cited.

His second point was that assuming that it was open to the learned Special Judge to decide whether the persons who are occupying the land were tenants or not, he was in error in holding that the respondents are trespassers and not ryots. For this proposition, the judgment of Mr. Justice Steer in Nityanund Ghose v. Kishen Kishore (2) was cited to show the distinction between the English and Indian law which has, undoubtedly, subsisted to this day. The decision of Chief Justice Garth in Surnomoyee v. Denonath Gir (3), following Lukhee Kanto Dass Chowdhry v. Sumeeruddi Lusker (4) and Rani Lalun Monee v. Sona Monee Dibee (5), was also cited for the same purpose. The case of Azim Sirdar v. Ram Lall Shaha (6) was also referred to in which Chief Justice Maclean says that tenancy in this country is created not only by contract but also by occupation in the case of agricultural land. It is true that he says that this principle of law has now been embodied in section 157 of the Bengal Tenancy Act. That, of course, does not mean that every case where tenancy is created by mere occupation must come under that section and that all other legal remedies are shut off from the landlord. The Full Bench ruling in Binad Lal Pakrashi v. Kalu Pramanik (7) seems conclusive upon that point; even if a person in occupation is settled on the land by a trespasser, such person is a ryot and whether he is an occupancy-ryot or a non-occupancy ryot will depend as usual upon the term for which he has been occupying the land. It is argued by the learned Vakil on the other side that this case can be distinguished because it held that the respondents in that case were non-occupancy ryots within the meaning of section 5 (2) of the former Tenancy Act and, therefore, protected from ejectment by that Act. But this part of the decision has, of course, nothing whatever to do with us. The part with which we are concerned is that a person who is settled on a certain land as a ryot and tenant by a trespasser does thereby become a ryot of some kind, and, therefore, when the zemindari is transferred by operation of law from one zemindar to another, he remains a ryot on the land; and if he is recorded by the Settlement Authorities in the Record of Rights as a ryot on the land, the zemindar is entitled to treat him as a ryot and is, in our opinion, entitled to ask the Revenue Court to settle a fair rent with him. The decision of the Civil Court that the plaintiff was the zemindar, was based upon the finding that the land upon which the respondents were settled was within the ambit of the village of Chalitabari and not within the ambit of the village of Delbari Debra as the respondents still allege in the present case. No doubt, the respondents, or at least not all of them, were not parties in that case, but the effect of the declaration of title of the landlord in that case plus the entry in the Record of Rights that these respondents are tenants within that zemindari concludes the question so far as the jurisdiction of the Settlement Officer is concerned.

That being so, the Special Judge could not enter upon any question except what was a fair rent for these ryots to pay, and we are further of opinion, as was argued by the learned Doctor for the appellant, that the learned Judge has clearly fallen into error in that passage in his judgment, where he says that in order that the relationship of landlord and tenant might be established between the parties before him, the consent of both sides is essential. That may be the law in England, but it is not the law in this country; and this really leads to a third and more direct argument which seems to be fatal to the respondent's case, that there was a tenancy by mutual agreement created by the zemindar of Delbari Debra while he was in possession of the land in dispute and that the plaintiff merely stepped into the landlord's shoes when the High Court reversed the decision of the lower Appellate Court, so that from whatever point of view the case be looked at, we are of opinion that the Settlement Officer is bound to treat the respondents

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 10 OF 1887.

KADAMBI SRINIVASACHARLU—APPELLANT

versus

DURLABHA SUBUDDHI AND OTHERS—RESPONDENTS.

Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882*), s.* 539, scope of—Right to sue—Founder's representatives suing for preventing abuse of trust—Suit in ejectment against trespasser by worshipper—Religious endowment—"Interested", meaning of—Adverse possession—Pujari—Limitation Act (XV of 1877*), Sch. II, Arts.* 47, 144.

Section 539 of the Civil Procedure Code, does not repeal or affect the right of a private individual to institute a suit to enforce the proper observance of a religious endowment.

The representatives of a person, who endowed the property for a religious endowment, are entitled to institute proceedings for the purpose of having abuses in the trust rectified.

Where a religious endowment is founded for carrying on the sectional religious worship of the sect of the founder, persons of the same sect and form of worship as the founder are persons interested in the due performance of the religious worship by a duly qualified person and are entitled to ask for the ejectment of an intruder.

The possession or enjoyment of a Pujari for the time being cannot become adverse to the worshipper.

In the case of a sale of the endowed property, the possession becomes adverse to a worshipper or the representative of the founder from the date of the sale-deed.

Article 47 of the Limitation Act, 1877, can be no bar to a person who was no party to the criminal proceedings which terminated in the order.

Appeal from the decree of the District Court of Ganjam at Berhampore, in Original Suit No. 20 of 1885.

Mr. V. Bashyam Aiyangar, for the Appellant.

Mr. R. B. Mitchell, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The subject-matter of this suit is a mutt in the town of Berhampore and the immoveable properties attached thereto.

The said mutt was founded in the year 1789 by one Kodra Kusannu Subudhi, a man of the Kodra caste, and of the Chaitanya sect and the idol Brindavana Chandraswami set up therein is worshipped by Uriya people according to the principles of Gowdiya.

The mutt is at present in the possession of the 1st defendant Srinivasacharyulu, a Tamil Brahmin from Mysore and a follower of the principles of Ramanuja. He has been in possession since 1873 when he obtained from 2nd defendant, Balabhadra Doss, the then Pujari or Adhikari or Archaka of the mutt, a deed of sale conveying all his (Balabhadra's) rights to 1st defendant.

The plaintiffs claim to be entitled to eject 1st defendant and to obtain possession of the mutt and its properties in order that they may appoint a proper Adhikari and Pujari to manage the affairs and conduct the worship of the mutt according to Gowdiya principle. They base their claim on three grounds:—(1) on their being the heirs or representatives of the founder of the mutt, (2) on their having always exercised the power of appointing the Adhikari, and (3) on their being worshippers in the mutt. They impeach the alleged sale by 2nd defendant to 1st defendant as fraudulent and invalid, and state that 1st defendant is totally unfit to be the Pujari or Archaka of the mutt.

The 1st defendant relied on his purchase from 2nd defendant, denied that plaintiffs had ever been Dharmakartas or managers of the mutt, and asserted that he was, according to Hindu Law, perfectly competent to hold the office of Pujari, but offered, if the Court thought otherwise, to appoint a person to officiate as such.

The 2nd defendant sided with the plaintiffs.

The District Judge found that the plaintiffs are the descendants of Kusannu Subuddhi, the founder of the mutt, but held that there was no reliable evidence to show that the family of the founder ever took any active part in the management of the institution, or in the appointment of the Pujari, which office had descended from guru to chela without interference on their part until 1868, that at the instigation of the plaintiffs, the newly appointed temple committee then called 2nd defendant who was in charge to account, and, on his refusing to give an account, dismissed him, that thereupon 2nd defendant in January 1871 attorned to the plaintiffs and executed a deed of submission (Exhibit N); that in May of the same year, the actual Adhikari or Archaka Nandi Keswara Doss returned from Nowgada and resigned his post to his chela 2nd defendant, that thereupon 2nd defendant executed or purported to execute a deed of sale in favour of 1st defendant conveying to him the mutt and its properties. The Judge held that this sale was invalid and that 1st defendant was unfit to hold the post of Archaka or Pujari of the mutt and was incompetent to appoint an Archaka on the ground that plaintiffs have a general interest in the institution as members of the Chaitanya sect as well as a special interest as descendants of the founder. The Judge, therefore, directed them, with the assistance of the Guru of the principal Chaitanya mutt at Puri, to nominate a duly qualified bairagi and accepting their nominee (who has been made 6th respondent) ordered the 1st defendant to make over the mutt and its properties to him.

The 1st defendant appeals.

The first ground of appeal is that the plaintiffs having failed to establish the title upon which the suit was based, the Court was bound, without going into the appellant's title, to have dismissed the suit. Admittedly, the suit was not one brought under the provisions of section 539 of the Civil Procedure Code. The plaintiffs did obtain the necessary permission (Exhibits J. & K.) to bring a suit under that section, but appear to have subsequently changed their mind. It is not contended, nor could it, we think, be successfully contended, that section 539 repeals or affects the right of a private individual to institute a suit to enforce the proper observance of a religious endowment. But it is argued that the District Judge, having found that plaintiffs have no direct interest in the trust, the decree, which to all interests and purposes is such a decree as might have been passed had the suit been brought under section 539, is bad. The argument might be valid if the decree could not be supported on other grounds. The suit was not brought under section 539 and the decree, therefore, was not passed under that section.

It is next urged that the suit has not, with reference to the provisions of section 30 of Civil Procedure Code, been instituted on behalf of all the worshippers of the mutt. That is conceded. It is then pointed out that in 1876 plaintiffs Nos. 1—3 and others applied to the District Court (Exhibit L) for permission to institute a suit under Act XX of 1863 against the present defendants and that sanction was refused. The suit, therefore, not having been brought under any of the above enactments, but as a mere suit in ejectment on title, and title having been negatived, the suit must, it is argued, fail. Respondents' Counsel argues that plaintiffs, as beneficiaries of the mutt which is a public institution, are entitled to maintain the suit, even if this Court should refuse to uphold their right as trustees (see memorandum of objections). The first question, therefore, for determination is whether the suit is maintainable.

The finding of the Judge that plaintiffs have failed to establish their right to, or their exercise of the right to, manage the affairs of the mutt and to appoint the Archaka, is in accordance with the evidence. But as pointed above, the plaintiffs base their claim to succeed on three different grounds. They first set forth their right to interfere as being the heirs and representatives of the original founder of the mutt. It has been found that they are so and no objection has been taken to the finding. It has been held by the Calcutta High Court in Brojomohun Doss v. Hurrolall Doss (1) that the representatives of the person who endowed the property are the persons who are entitled to institute proceedings for the purpose of having abuses in the trust rectified. We are, therefore, of opinion that the Judge rightly held that as representatives of the founder plaintiffs were entitled to maintain the suit. Another and third ground on which plaintiffs based their claim was that they were worshippers in the mutt. It was held by this Court in Fakurdin Sahib v. Ackeni Sahib (2) that apart from any pecuniary interest they might have in the income of the institution, the plaintiffs as resident Muhammadans (the suit was for the removal of defendants from the management of a durgah) were sufficiently interested therein to entitle them to maintain the suit. No doubt, as mere worshippers, the plaintiffs would not be entitled to possession but the object of the suit is not actual possession but the appointment of a proper Archaka and the management of the institution according to Gowdiya principles. The plaintiffs in their plaint pray "for such other relief as the Court may think proper having regard to the facts of the case in order to carry out the wishes of the founder". Now what are the undisputed facts of the case? The mutt was founded by a member of the Chaitanya sect and the idol consecrated therein is one worshipped by Urya people according to Gowdiya principles. After the institution had been managed for 84 years in accordance with the intention of the founder, a foreigner, a man of a different sect and religious persuasion, who is unable to perform religious services for the Chaitanya sect, suddenly through the illegal act of the Archaka for the time being, obtains possession. As persons interested in the due performance of religious worship by a duly qualified person, the plaintiffs come forward and ask for the ejectment of the intruder. They have made out that part of the case and in our judgment were entitled to maintain the suit and the Judge was justified in passing the decree he did.

(1) 5 C. 700.
(2) 2 M. 197.

In the second place, it is urged that the suit is barred by limitation. If, it is said, plaintiffs are, as they represent, trustees, the possession of 2nd defendant under whom 1st defendant claims became hostile to plaintiffs on the 16th May 1871 and the suit is out of time. If, it is further argued, plaintiffs are not trustees, the suit is barred by Article 47, Schedule II of the Limitation Act.

In our judgment, the plaintiffs' suit is not barred either by adverse possession or by Article 47. The mutt being one founded for the benefit of the Chaitanya sect, the possession or enjoyment of the Pujari for the time being cannot become adverse to the worshipper. The renunciation by Nandikeswar Doss, on 16th May 1871, of his office as Pujari in favour of his chela, 2nd defendant, created in 2nd defendant no title or possession adverse to the worshippers of Brindavana Chandraswami. The deed of relinquishment (Exhibit XVII) itself recognises the fact that the endowment was given, not for the benefit of the manager for the time being, but for the use of the mutt. Accepting the principle laid down in Kannan v. Nilakanta (3) to which we have been referred, although the facts are not on all fours with the present case, the plaintiffs' suit is not barred by Article 144, Schedule II of the Limitation Act, because the suit was brought within 12 years from the date of the sale-deed by 2nd defendant to 1st defendant, and from that time alone was possession adverse to a worshipper of the Chaitanya sect or the representative of the founder.

Article 47 also is not a bar. Subsequent to the alleged sale by the 2nd defendant, he, during the absence of the 1st defendant, re-entered and took forcible possession of the mutt. He was prosecuted, found guilty of house-breaking and etc, and sentenced to imprisonment in January 1874. On the 6th February 1874, the Magistrate, who tried the case, ordered possession to be given to 1st defendant. The order was passed under section 534, Act X of 1872 (corresponding to section 522 of the present Code). The plaintiffs were no parties to the criminal proceedings which terminated in the said order, nor can it be said that they claim under the 2nd defendant so that Article 47 has no application.

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Second appeal from the decision of the Subordinate Judge of Aligarh, dated 26th March 1912.

Mr. Durga Charan Banerji (with him Messrs. Haribans Sahai and G. L. Agarwala), for the Appellant.

Mr. Benoy Kumar Mukerji, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit to have it declared that the sale of a certain house held in execution of a decree was null and void, so far as the plaintiff's interest in the house was concerned. Gopal Das, the plaintiff, is the grandson of one Parbhu Lal against whom one Budhsen held a decree. In execution of that decree, a house was sold and purchased by Chedi Lal, respondent in this Court. The date of the auction-sale was the 22nd of September 1908. But on the 19th of September, the judgment-debtor, Parbhu Lal, had sold another house to the decree-holder and in the sale-deed, the decretal amount was set off against part of the consideration. Thus on the date of the sale, the decree had already been satisfied, although satisfaction was not certified to the Court executing the decree. When Chedi Lal sought possession of the house, he was resisted by the plaintiff. The latter's objection was disallowed by the Court on the 26th of February 1910. The present suit was instituted on the 26th of April of the same year. The plaintiff alleged in paragraph 2 of the plaint that the western portion of the house which had been sold was the joint property of the plaintiff, of his two brothers who are defendants second party and of Parbhu Lal. This paragraph of the plaint was admitted in the written statement. Several defences were raised, including one of limitation. The Court of first instance held that the Article applicable was 11 (a) of the Limitation Act and, therefore, the suit was within time and that the sale had been held fraudulently, decree-holder and the judgment-debtor being in collusion. The lower Appellate Court, while holding that the decree had already been satisfied before the sale, was unable to hold that there had been fraud or collusion or anything wrong with the sale held, although the sale-deed had been executed only three days before the auction-sale took place and although the auction-purchaser was the nephew of the decree-holder. The Court below, disagreeing with the Court of first instance, held that Article 12 of the Limitation Act was applicable to the case and that the suit was barred. The learned Subordinate Judge further appears to be of opinion that the plaintiff had failed to prove any title to the house. He apparently overlooked the fact that the plaintiff's title was not questioned. On appeal to this Court, it was contended on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant that the Court below was wrong on the question of limitation. In my opinion, the Court of first instance correctly applied the provisions of Article 11 (a) to this case. It is not necessary to construe strictly the terms of the plaint. It is apparent what the plaintiff sought was to establish his right to the house and to have the sale set aside so far as it affected his rights. I agree with the Court of first instance that the suit is not barred. While I find some difficulty in following the reasoning of the Court below which holds that the sale was not fraudulent or collusive, I find quite as much difficulty in following the argument now advanced in support of the decision of the Court below that the appellant was bound to discharge the debt of his grandfather. There was no question in the trial of the case as to the pious obligation on a Hindu son to discharge the debt of his father or grandfather. It is only a matter of common sense that no one should be made to pay a debt which has already been discharged. This is what has happened in this case. Plaintiff's share in the house has been sold to satisfy a decree. It has been shown to the satisfaction of both Courts that the decree, in execution of which the house in question was sold, had been satisfied before the auction-sale took place. I allow this appeal, set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court and restore that of the Court of first instance with costs including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908*), s.* 14—"Civil proceeding in a Court of Appeal"—Whether includes revision petition to the High Court—Plaint returned for presentation to proper Court—Appeal against order—Confirmation of original order by Appellate Court—Revision to High Court—Limitation.

A revision petition presented to the High Court under section 622, Civil Procedure Code, 1882, is a "Civil proceeding in a Court of Appeal" within the meaning of section 14 of the Limitation Act.

The expression 'Court of Appeal' in section 14 should be understood in the broad sense of a Court which has the power to bring under review the decision of an inferior Court, whatever may be the extent of jurisdiction that the superior Court may possess in reviewing the decision of the inferior Court.

A plaint was returned for presentation to the proper Court; the plaintiff, having unsuccessfully appealed against that order, moved the High Court in revision under section 622, Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), and the High Court dismissed the revision petition :

Held, that plaintiff was entitled to deduct the time during which the revision petition in the High Court was pending in computing the period of limitation for his suit.

Mr. V. Ramesam, for the Appellant.

Mr. T. Prakasam, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The question in this case is whether the plaintiff's suit is barred by limitation. The suit has been treated as one for rent. The plaintiff instituted the suit at first in the District Munsif's Court of Gudivada on the regular side and it was returned to the plaintiff for presentation to the proper Court on the ground that the suit was one cognizable by a Small Cause Court. The plaintiff did not accept the view taken by the Munsif on the question of jurisdiction, but appealed against it to the District Court, and, on that Court confirming the Munsif's view, he put in a revision petition under section 622 of the repealed Civil Procedure Code to the High Court. The High Court refused to interfere on the ground that there was no question of jurisdiction involved in the petition. If the period occupied by the plaintiff in prosecuting his suit, appeal and revision petition in the Munsif's Court, the District Court and the High Court respectively, be deducted in computing the period of limitation, this suit would admittedly be within time. The Subordinate Judge and the learned Judge of this Court, before whom the civil revision petition came on for hearing, have both held that, although the time taken up by the suit and the appeal should be deducted, the period during which plaintiff was prosecuting his civil revision petition in the High Court could not be deducted. After giving our best consideration to the case we are unable to agree with the view taken by Ayling, J. The wording of section 14 runs thus:—

"In computing the period of limitation prescribed for any suit, the time during which the plaintiff has been prosecuting, with due diligence, another civil proceeding whether in a Court of first instance or in a Court of Appeal against the defendant, shall be excluded." The exclusion, according to the section, relates to the time during which the plaintiff has been prosecuting "another civil proceeding in a Court of Appeal." The language of the Legislature is not that the time occupied in prosecuting an 'appeal' may be deducted, but the time occupied in prosecuting any "civil proceeding in a Court of Appeal." We see no reason why a revision petition in the High Court should not be regarded as a "Civil proceeding in a

ZALIM SINGH v. RADHA BAI.

Court of Appeal." We think that the expression "Court of Appeal" should be taken as being used in the broad sense of any Court which has the power to bring under review the decision of an inferior Court, whatever may be the extent of jurisdiction that the superior Court may possess in reviewing the decision of the inferior Court. There is no reason for supposing that the mischief of the statute does not extend to cases where the plaintiff was bona fide prosecuting a civil revision petition instead of an appeal. See the explanation of the term 'appeal' in Chappan v. Moidin Kutti (1). Mr. Prakasam has relied on Subramania Pillai v. Seethai Ammal (2). There, the question was whether a revision petition could be regarded as an appeal within the meaning of Article 182 of the Limitation Act. The third column of the Article deals separately with an appeal, a review and an application for amendment. It may be that a petition for revision would not be included within the meaning of the word 'appeal' in that clause; but we do not think that that decision shows that the expression "Court of Appeal" in section 14 would exclude a Court of Revision. We have already referred to the fact that what is spoken of in section 14 is not an 'appeal' but 'any judicial proceeding in a Court of Appeal.' Our view would seem to be in accordance with that which was taken by the Allahabad High Court in Seth Mulchand v. Seth Samir Mal (3), but we have not been able to see that case. There is no reason for holding in this case that the revision petition was not prosecuted in good faith. The plaintiff's mere discontent with the opinions of two Courts is not a reason for believing that he did not prosecute his revision petition in good faith. We must, therefore, hold that the suit is not barred by limitation. We set aside the order of Ayling, J., and the decree of the Subordinate Judge and remand the suit to the Court of the Subordinate Judge for disposal on the merits according to law. The costs in this Court in this appeal and the petition before Ayling, J., will abide the result.

Order reversed.

Musammat RADHA BAI—PLAINTIFF—RESPONDENT.

Pre-emption—Wajib-ul-arz—Evidentiary value of wajib-ul-arz—Custom or contract.

In pre-emption cases, the wajib-ul-arz is, no doubt, evidence and, in some cases, evidence of great importance. But the existence or non-existence of a custom of pre-emption does not and cannot depend upon the construction of a wajib-ul-arz. The wajib-ul-arz is to be taken into consideration by the Court and carefully considered; but there is no class of evidence which varies so much in its importance as does a wajib-ul-arz.

First appeal from the decision of the Subordinate Judge of Jhansi, dated the 8th of July 1911.

The Hon'ble Dr. Sundar Lal (with him Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru), for the Appellants.

Mr. Sital Prashad Ghose (with him Mr. Shankar Sahai), for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises out of a suit for pre-emption. The pre-emptor is a Marwari lady, that is to say, she belongs to the money-lending caste. The vendors are Kurmis and the vendee is also a Kurmi. It is true that the vendee was not, strictly speaking, a co-sharer but he was a resident of the village and a fellow caste man of the vendors and he was already in possession of 41 bighas odd which had been mortgaged to him by another co-sharer under a mortgage, dated the 21st of June 1903. This mortgage was in part a simple mortgage and in part a mortgage with possession. It is further noteworthy that the mortgagor was a brother of the pre-emptor in the present case. The question, of course, in this case is whether or not a custom of pre-emption prevailed in the village, under which the plaintiff was entitled to pre-empt the property, the subject matter of the suit. The onus, of course, lay on the plaintiff. In support of the existence of the alleged custom, the plaintiff adduced in evidence the wajib-ul-arz of 1869-70. The learned Pleader for the plaintiff-respondent has admitted that this is the only evidence his client was able to adduce.

In a case of pre-emption, the wajib-ul-arz is, no doubt, evidence and in some cases evidence of great importance. But we wish to point out that, in our opinion, the existence or non-existence of a custom of pre-emption does not and cannot depend upon the construction of a wajib-ul-arz. The wajib-ul-arz is to be taken into consideration by the Court and carefully considered but, as stated by their Lordships of the Privy Council, there is no class of evidence, which varies so much in its importance. The wajib-ul-arz commences with the following preamble:—"We, Peare Lal Jhumari and Devi Das Lambardars and Narainjit and other pattidars of the Mauza Chandora, have embodied in sections the practices and customs which have been prevailing in the village till now, and the agreements and contracts which we have now made with respect to our mutual affairs and the rights of the tenants of the village admitted in a subsequent writing and present them before you."

It may be noted here that the wajib-ul-arz was dealing with not only existing customs and practice but agreements and contracts for the future. As pointed out by the learned Judge, section 1 of the wajib-ul-arz shows that there were four thoks in the mauza, two thoks belonging to Kurmis, one to Muhammadans and one to Lodhis. It would appear that at the time of the Settlement, the ownership of the Muhammadan thok had passed into the hands of Jhumari Bania. It would also appear that one of the Kurmi thoks and the Lodhi thok had passed into the hands of Marwaris.

We now come to the clause dealing with pre-emption. The clause is as follows:—If any sharer desires to sell his share, the near bhai bhatija will get first, if there be no near bhai bhatija, then the share might be offered to Lambardars and pattidars, (of the patti), in case of their refusal, to the sharers of other pattis. The biggest patti in the mauza is that of Devi Das for it consists of eight annas, for the purposes of pre-emption, this patti has got the preferential right. If a share in the patti of Peare Lal or Jhumari Baqqal, Lambardar, be sold, and if the pattidars of the patti concerned do not pre-empt it, then the patti of Devi Das will have the preferential right and the pattidars of the patti of Peare Lal will have the next right, as this patti is the ancestral property of the sharers and the patti of Jhumari is smaller in comparison with that of Devi Das and non-ancestral in comparison with that of Peare Lal, for this reason the pre-emptive right of the patti of Jhumari is inferior to that of the pattis of Devi Das and Peare Lal. After the sharers of the entire mauza have refused to purchase the share, the vendor would be at liberty to sell and mortgage it to any body he likes. In case, a sharer mortgages or leases his share, it shall also be subject to the right of pre-emption in the same way "as in the case of a sale".

It will at once be noticed that this pre-emptive clause is, in many respects, peculiar. Devi Das, who certainly was not an original owner in the mauza, had become the owner of an 8-annas share. He was evidently a more or less influential man and he is given a preferential right over the owners of other pattis. It also extends the right of pre-emption to mortgages and even leases. It further appears that in the wajib-ul-arz, as originally framed, there was a further condition which was as follows:—"And the condition is that the share can be sold for the amount extending to six times the amount of the rent-roll. If any sharer of the mauza be not willing to purchase up to this value, then the vendor would be at liberty to sell the share for any sum exceeding it to the sharers of other villages." This clause, it would appear, was by resolution of the Government ten years later struck out in the Collector's copy although it remained intact in the Tahsil copy. It seems to us that there are many things to suggest that this reference to pre-emption was a reference either to contract or agreement between the co-sharers or perhaps one might almost go so far as to say that it was a record of what Devi Das wished to prevail in the village. It seems to us that the original constitution of the village in itself rendered the growing of such a custom of pre-emption as is recorded in the wajib-ul-arz extremely improbable. The mauza belonged in part to Kurmis, in part to Muhammadans and in part to Lodhis. It is not, of course, impossible that a custom might exist between proprietors of these different castes but we think it is not very probable.

On the whole, we think that the evidence afforded by the wajib ul-arz, even if it stood uncontradicted by any other evidence, would be very weak. There was, however, a considerable amount of evidence adduced by the defendants against the alleged custom of pre-emption. One document that was put in evidence was an extract from the deposition of the patwari which was filed with a Settlement Record and is dated the 26th of June 1868. This document will be found at page 4 of the appellant's book. A number of questions are set forth as having been put to the patwari at the time of the Settlement. He was asked, among other things, in what year and with whom the prior Settlement was made and whether the property was ancestral or self-acquired. His answer shows that the previous Settlement was made in Sambat 1898, equivalent to the year 1841 A. D., that 8-annas was settled with one Ram Kishen, a Marwari, 4-annas with Bhagwan Kurmi and 4-annas with Makund Kurmi. He also shows that there was only one out of the 3 pattis remaining with the original owners, the remaining 12 annas having passed into the hands of strangers. He is then asked about the sales, transfers and mortgages that had taken place and a considerable number are set forth, several of which must have been made in favour of strangers. In our opinion, these answers of the patwari go a considerable way in disproving that any custom of pre-emption was in existence prior to the year 1868. Jagannath, a Kurmi resident of the village, gave evidence His father was an old co-sharer in the village. He speaks of many transfers to strangers. It is said that he was a partial witness and had had litigation with the plaintiff. No doubt, he was speaking of matters which occurred a considerable time ago but his evidence is corroborated in many respects not only by the extracts from the deposition of the patwari but also by documents in the case.

The defendants, however, did not stop short with the evidence relating to what had happened in the village prior to the year 1868. They gave in evidence no less than five mortgages and five sales, the dates of which extend from the year 1876 down to the year 1906. These mortgages and sales were all in favour of strangers. It is said that the mortgages were simple mortgages and they, therefore, gave no occasion for a claim by the plaintiff or other co-sharers to exercise the rights of pre-emption. We do not think that this argument can be much relied upon. In the first place, the wajib-ul-arz, which, as already stated, is the only evidence upon which the plaintiff can rely, expressly says that pre emption shall extend to the case of mortgage, and the word used is quite as appropriate to a simple mortgage as to a mortgage with possession. Moreover, one of the mortgages, namely, that of the 21st of June 1903, was to a very substantial extent a mortgage with possession and, of course, in the case of sales, the argument is of no weight whatever. As against these instances of sales to strangers, the plaintiff was apparently unable to give evidence of a single case in which the right of pre-emption was claimed or exercised or even of sales to co-sharers. Indeed it is probable that there were many other mortgages to strangers besides those adduced in evidence by the defendants: for example, we find in the sale-deed of the 6th of September 1904, which will be found at page 22 of the appellant's book, that the sale was made with a view to discharging five mortgages, four of which were made in favour of strangers.

The learned Subordinate Judge seems to have lost sight of this evidence. He says at page 14:—"It is also contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the sales relied upon by the defendants referred to either sharers or their relations. In a case or two if the right of pre-emption is not asserted for certain reasons, it does not extinguish the custom of pre-emption. When a custom of pre-emption is embodied in the wajib-ul-arz and the pre-emptor is a sharer of annas 12 in the mauza, there is no reason why his pre-emptive right should not be enforced." It is a little uncertain whether the learned Judge intends in these few lines to mention the contention, which was being urged on behalf of the plaintiff, or to give his own reasons for deciding against the defendant. We, however, think that if he intended this to be a reference to the evidence of the defendants, he hardly gave it the amount of consideration which it deserved. He concludes by saying:—"The current of decisions appears in favour of the plaintiff and I hold that the wajib-ul-arz of Mauza Chandora records a custom of pre-emption and that the custom of pre-emption obtains in the mouza" We have no hesitation in saying that no custom of pre-emption is shown by the plaintiff to have prevailed in the village and we accordingly allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the learned Judge and dismiss the plaintiff's suit with costs in all Courts including in this Court fees on the higher scale.

Appeal allowed.

Trust—Investment—Unauthorisd securities—Damages—Trusts Act (II of 1882), ss. 15, 20, 23—Liability for interest—Minor's monies.

Trust monies payable to a minor are monies which cannot be applied for the purposes of the trust "at an early date" as the trustees cannot pay the money until the minor has attained majority. And even as regards money capable of being so applied at an early date, if the trustee takes the responsibility of keeping the money in investment for a long time, he is bound to make the investment in accordance with his obligation as trustee.

In the investment of trust money, a trustee is bound to comply with the provisions of section 20 of the Trusts Act, which regulates the mode in which a trustee is to make investments and such regulation is not controlled by the general provisions of section 15.

A trustee is guilty of breach of trust if he invests the money otherwise than in accordance with the provisions of the section, however well-intentioned and honest his act may have been.

The measure of prudence required of a trustee by section 15 must be regulated by any specific provisions applicable to special matters found in the other sections of the Act.

Clause 2 of section 15 must be read with other sections and does not apply where the trustee has committed a breach of trust as by acting contrary to section 20 of the Act. The broad terms of section 23, that a trustee is liable to make good the loss when he commits a breach of trust, are not controlled by section 15. The Indian Courts have not been given the powers conferred on English Courts by successive English Statutes of relieving honest trustees from their liability for breach of trust.

Where a trustee invests money in an unauthorised security, it must be treated as tantamount to failure to invest under clause (e) of section 23 and he is liable for interest on the money lost.

Mr. P. Somasundaram for Mr. P. Narayanamurthy, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The question for decision, in this second appeal, is whether the defendants have been rightly held liable by the District Judge for the damages caused to the plaintiff in consequence of the investment of the money, drawn by them from the Oriental Life Insurance Company as trustees under the Will of one Appalacharlu, with the late Messrs. Arbuthnot and Co. In consequence of the failure of Messrs. Arbuthnot and Co., most of the investment was lost and the plaintiff, who was appointed by the Court as trustee in the place of the defendants, seeks to recover from them the amount lost with interest. According to the provisions of the Will, the trustees, after realising the amount of the insurance, were to pay Rs. 200 to the testator's brother, Rs. 400 to his daughter for her bride's jewels and the remainder to his minor son. The first sum of Rs. 200 was paid to the brother by the trustees. The remaining amount was invested by them with Messrs. Arbuthnot and Co. in 1902 on fixed deposit for a period of one year. The deposit was renewed on each occasion that it fell due before the failure of the firm. The defendants handed over the deposit receipt to the plaintiff on the 19th October 1906; but before the deposit matured again, the firm failed.

Mr. T. R. Ramachandra Iyer, the learned Vakil for the appellants, has argued two contentions before us. The first is that this is not a case where the trust money could not be "applied immediately or at an early date" within the meaning of section 20 of the Indian Trusts Act and that the trustees were not, therefore, bound to invest it on any of the securities enjoined by that section and that they were, therefore, bound only to act as directed by section 15 of the Act, that is, "to deal with the trust property as carefully as a man of ordinary prudence would deal with such property if it were his own." The second contention is that as they acted with ordinary prudence, the provisions of the latter part of section 15 must be applied that "a trustee so dealing (that is, with ordinary prudence) is not responsible for the loss, destruction or deterioration of the trust property." The first contention cannot be upheld. With respect to the amount payable to the minor, the money could not be applied for the purposes of the trust at an early date as the trustees could not pay the money until the attainment of his majority. It is impossible to hold that they could discharge themselves by payment to the minor's natural guardian who was his mother. They took the place of the guardian so far as the protection of this money was concerned and could not lawfully make payment either to the infant or to the guardian. See Perry on Trusts, Volume II, section 624 and section 41 of the Trusts Act, which expressly authorises the trustee for a minor to "pay to the guardian (if any) of such minor, or, otherwise apply for or towards his maintenance or education or advancement in life, or the reasonable expenses of his religious worship, marriage or funeral, the whole or any part of the income to which he may be entitled in respect of such property." With respect to the sum of Rs. 400 payable to the testator's daughter, the money might perhaps be regarded as capable of being applied at an early date, but the trustees refused to make payment when demanded by the daughter's guardian; and having taken the responsibility of keeping the money in investment for a long time, they were bound to make the investment in accordance with their obligations as trustees. It is contended that section 15 of the Trusts Act lays down the paramount rule applicable to all dealings of trustees with trust property and controls all other special provisions in the Act including section 20, regulating the mode in which they should make investments; and as Messrs. Arbuthnot and Co., had such a high reputation for credit and solvency that any man of ordinary prudence would consider it safe to invest his money with them, there was no obligation to make the investment in one of the securities mentioned in section 20. This contention it is impossible to accept. The specific provisions contained in the other sections of the Act are as obligatory as the general provisions in section 15. The measure of prudence required of a trustee by section 15 must be regulated by any specific provisions applicable to special matters found in the other sections of the Act. There can be no doubt that the defendants were bound to comply with the provisions of section 20 and having failed to do so, they must be held to have committed a breach of trust, although there can be no reason to doubt that they acted honestly and with the prudence which an ordinary man would exercise in the conduct of his own affairs and that they were influenced merely by a desire to secure for the minor a higher rate of interest than could have been obtained by resorting to some of the other modes of investment sanctioned by section 20. In In re Speight: Speight v. Gaunt (1), Bacon, V. C., observed: "That Gaunt was full of friendly and kindly intentions towards the family of the testator, I have no doubt; and that he did his best to promote their interest preceding the 24th of February, I have no doubt. Most perfectly honest intentions alone regulated his conduct ..... but that does not help me to the solution of this question in the slightest degree. It becomes now, after the facts I have mentioned, a question of law only. The law on the subject is, and has been for centuries, too clear to admit of the possibility of doubt, and neither under Lord St. Leonard's Act, nor in any of the cases in which the Court has found excuses for trustees, and on some occasions has been able to relieve them from the burden which was sought to be cast upon them, has the Court lost sight of the plain principle that a trustee, who takes another man's money into his hands, is bound, whatever other duties he may have to discharge, to take care that that shall be preserved, and not to deal with it or to do anything with it which a prudent and reasonable man would not do with his own money. That is the test which is properly to be applied to this and to all such like cases." This observation was in no way dissented from by the Court of Appeal, Jessel, M. R. only objecting to the trustee being required to take greater precautions than a prudent man of business should and dissenting from Bacon, V. C. only in so far as that learned Judge observed that resort to a broker for purposes of investment was not justified. In Leoroyd v. Whiteley (2), Lord Watson observed: "As a general rule, the law requires of a trustee no higher degree of diligence in the execution of his office than a man of ordinary prudence would exercise in the management of his own private affairs. Yet he is not allowed the same discretion in investing the monies of the trust as if he were a person sui juris dealing with his own estate. Business men of ordinary prudence may, and frequently do, select investments which are more or less of a speculative character but it is the duty of a trustee to confine himself to the class of investments which are permitted by the trust, and likewise to avoid all investments of that class which are attended with hazard. So long as he acts in honest observance of these limitations, the general rule already stated will apply".

The next question is, whether the defendants can be relieved from the consequences of their breach of trust by anything which can be found in section 15 of the Trusts Act. Their contention is that the clause in section 15 that a trustee acting with prudence is not responsible for the loss, destruction or deterioration of the trust property, would permit the Court in a proper case not to award damages to the beneficiary caused by a breach of trust. This is clearly not the meaning of the section. Chapter III of the Trusts Act treats of the "duties and liabilities of trustees." The various duties of trustees are laid down in sections 11 to 22. Sections 23 to 30 deal with their liabilities in cases of violations of trusts. It cannot be held that provisions in section 15, exempting trustees from responsibility where they have acted with prudence, is intended to exonerate them where by not acting with prudence they have committed a breach of trust. The meaning of the 2nd clause of the section is that where a trustee has acted with prudence, he could not be held to be guilty of breach of trust. But this rule must be applied in conjunction with the other sections which regulate the measure of prudence required in particular cases. Section 23 lays down in broad terms that "where the trustee commits a breach of trust, he is liable to make good the loss which the trust property or the beneficiary has thereby sustained." This statement is followed by certain exceptions to the rule. It is impossible to hold that section 23 can be controlled by interpreting section 15 in such a manner as to exempt a trustee from liability for damages on the ground that he has acted with ordinary prudence. If this were the intention of the Legislature, it would, undoubtedly, have stated so by laying down a rule of liability far less comprehensive than that enacted in section 23. The Indian Trusts Act was closely modelled on the English Law of Trusts. There was no power in the English Courts to save a trustee from the consequences of his breach of trust when the Indian Act was passed. Thus Bacon, V. C., felt bound to award damages against the trustee in In re Speight: Speight v. Gaunt (1), already referred to, although he held the trustee free from all blame. In England, several statutes have been subsequently enacted to relieve trustees in cases where loss accrues to the estate in consequence of their acts. See sections 8 and 9 of the Trustee Act of 1893. Section 3 of the Trustee Act of 1896 gave relief to the whole extent that Mr. Ramachandra Iyer desires that a trustee should have. It says:—"If it appears to the Court that a trustee whether appointed under this Act or not, is or may be personally liable for any breach of trust, whether the transaction alleged to be a breach of trust occurred before or after the passing of this Act, but has acted honestly and reasonably and ought fairly to be excused for the breach of trust and for omitting to obtain the directions of the Court in the matter in which he committed such breach, then the Court may relieve the trustee either wholly or partly from personal liability for the same." Unfortunately, the Indian Courts have not been given the power to protect trustees in any case when a clear breach of trust has been committed. The ordinary principle must, therefore, apply that when an injury has been caused to the beneficiary by an act done by the trustee in violation of his duty, he is entitled to claim from him the damages he has sustained by his breach of trust. The District Judge's opinion that the defendants are liable for the re-payment of the amount lost by the failure of Messrs. Arbuthnot and Company must, therefore, be upheld. The only remaining point is whether the award of interest by the District Judge on the amount lost is proper. The appellants rely on section 23 of the Trusts Act, which lays down that a trustee committing a breach of trust is not liable to pay interest except in the cases mentioned therein. None of the enumerated cases would comprise this case unless it can be brought under clause (e), which applies "where the breach consists in failure to invest trust money and to accumulate the interest or dividends thereon." Where the trustee invests money in an unauthorized security, this must apparently be treated as tantamount to failure to invest, for a trustee cannot be taken to have fulfilled his duty to invest, unless he does so in the manner required by law. Besides, it may be doubted whether the rule disentitling the beneficiary to interest except in the cases enumerated could be applied where the trust money has been altogether lost. The Court should have power in such cases to award interest as damages. Illustration (e) to section 23 shows that where a trustee has failed to invest trust money in the manner directed by the instrument of trust, he is liable for interest, although he may have made some other investment. The same principle should be applicable where the failure is in making an investment in accordance with the provisions of section 20. Illustration (f) justifies the same conclusion. The District Judge must, therefore, be held to be right in awarding interest also. In Civil Suit No. 64 of 1909 (on the file of the High Court, Original Side), where certain trustees made an investment of trust monies with Messrs. Arbuthnot & Co., Sankaran Nair, J., held that they were liable for the loss caused by the failure of the firm. He also directed the trustees to pay interest. But the arguments urged in the present case with respect to section 15 of the Trusts Act and with regard to the trustee's liability for interest do not appear to have been addressed to the learned Judge.

The result is that the second appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

CALCUTTA HIGH COURT.
CIVIL RULE No. 2271 OF 1912.
November 27, 1912.
Present:—Sir Cecil Brett, KT., Judge, and Mr. Justice Richardson.

RAM CHANDRA PAL—DEFENDANT—PETITIONER

versus

KRISHNA LAL PAL—PLAINTIFF—OPPOSITE PARTY.

Arbitration—Reference—Resiling from agreement to refer—Sufficient cause—Delay in commencing arbitration proceedings, whether sufficient cause—Partnership in business—Business brought to end—Adjustment of accounts—Dissolution of partnership—Separate suit to recover sums which one partner may have realised.

Where a person has agreed with another that all matters in controversy between them should be referred to arbitration, it is not open to that person to resile from the agreement unless for good and sufficient cause.

Delay of six months in commencing the arbitration proceedings, where it is not shown that a party made any effort at all to push forward the proceedings before the arbitrators and that he was not himself responsible for the delay, is not good and sufficient cause for the party to withdraw from the agreement to refer.

Therefore, under section 21 of the Specific Relief Act, the party is not entitled to sue in respect of a debt which he had contracted to refer.

Where two parties had been partners in a business which had been brought to an end, and the only dispute between them, is with reference to the division of the property, that dispute can only be finally settled in a proper suit for dissolution of partnership and for adjustment of accounts. It is not desirable that each of the parties should proceed by separate suits in order to recover from the other any sums due to the partnership business which he alone may have realised.

Rule against the judgment and decree of the Small Cause Court of Dacca, dated January 26th, 1912.

Dr. Sarat Chandra Basak for Babu Mohendra Nath Roy and Babu Probodh Chandra Roy, for the Petitioner.

Babu Upendra Lal Roy for Babu Harendra Narayan Mitra, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This Rule arises out of a suit brought by the opposite party No. 1,

who was admittedly in partnership with the present petitioner. It is admitted before us that the partnership has been brought to an end and it seems that after the partnership was closed, the present opposite party No. 1 as well as the petitioner entered into an agreement to submit the accounts and all matters in dispute between them relating to the partnership to arbitration in order that all disputes between them might be cleared up and that their dues might be satisfactorily determined. This agreement was admittedly reduced into writing in the form of a contract and was registered. Six months after this agreement had been come to, the opposite party served the present petitioner with a notice that he did not intend to go on with the arbitration and then he instituted the suit in respect of which the present Rule has been granted to recover from the present petitioner a half share of a debt due to the firm which had been realised by the petitioner. A copy of the notice has not been produced before us, but the learned Pleader for the opposite party has been unable to indicate to us what just or good cause the opposite party set out in that notice as a ground for withdrawing from the agreement to submit their dispute to arbitration. When the present suit was instituted, the petitioner in his defence pleaded that no suit would lie on the ground that the opposite party, the plaintiff, had already agreed to submit all matters in dispute between them to the decision of the arbitrators. The suit, it is to be noticed, was brought in the Court of Small Causes, and the learned Judge, who decided the suit, appears to have considered the objection taken by the petitioner to be invalid, and to have given the plaintiff, the opposite party, a decree to recover from the present petitioner a sum representing a half share of the partnership debt which had been realised by him. The petitioner applied to this Court and obtained a rule calling upon the opposite party to show cause why the judgment and decree of the Court of Small Causes should not be set aside on the ground that having regard to the provisions of section 21 of the Specific Relief Act, it was open to question whether the Court of Small Causes had jurisdiction to try the suit. The portion of section 21 on which reliance has been placed runs as follows:—"Save as provided by the Code of Civil Procedure and the Indian Arbitration Act, 1899, no contract to refer present or future differences to arbitration shall be specifically enforced; but if any person, who had made such a contract, and has refused to perform it, sues in respect of any subject which he has contracted to refer, the existence of such contract shall bar the suit." The petitioner, in relying on the provisions of this section, has contended that the contract to refer the matters in controversy to arbitration covered all partnership debts and that it was stated in the defence filed in the suit that other debts due to the firm had been realised by the present opposite party, the plaintiff, and that he had not paid over to the petitioner his share of the sums so realised. It is contended under the circumstances that the plaintiff was not entitled to proceed with this suit in the Court of Small Causes after he had agreed to refer the matters in controversy between them to arbitration.

In opposition to the Rule, it has been argued that the plaintiff, the opposite party, was justified in withdrawing from the contract, because there had been delay on the part of the arbitrators in commencing proceedings for over six months. The learned Pleader, who has appeared for the opposite party, has referred us amongst others to the cases of Adhibai v. Cursandas Nathu (1) and of O. R. Coley v. V. A. Dicosta (2). The learned Pleader at the same time admits that the principles, which were laid down by the Privy Council in the case of Pestonjee Nussurwanjee v. Manockjee & Co (3), must be followed in cases of this description and that in fact the principles laid down in that judgment had been adopted by the Courts in India in the cases decided subsequently to the passing of the Specific Relief Act. In fact, the last case relied on by the learned Pleader for the opposite party itself lays down the same principle. The principle is that it is not in the power of a person to revoke at his mere will and pleasure a submission to arbitration after he has once agreed to the submission. It has been universally held that where a person has agreed with another that all matters in controversy between them should be referred to arbitration, it is not open to that person to resile from the agreement unless for good and sufficient cause. In the present case, the only cause, which has been suggested, is the delay of six months in commencing the arbitration proceedings. The learned Pleader has, however, failed on behalf of the opposite party to show that his client made any effort at all to push forward the proceedings before the arbitrators and that he was not himself responsible for the delay. In our opinion, therefore, it is impossible in the present case to say that the present opposite party was justified in withdrawing from the agreement or in cancelling the reference to arbitration. We think, therefore, that the Rule should be made absolute on the ground on which it has been issued, namely, that under the terms of section 21 of the Specific Relief Act, the opposite party was not entitled to sue in the Court of Small Causes in respect of the debt which he had contracted to refer with the rest, in dispute between him and the petitioner, of the matters to the determination of arbitrators.

We are of opinion that this case should not have been entertained by the Small Cause Court at all. Admittedly, the two parties had been partners in a business. That business had been brought to an end; and the only dispute between them is with reference to the division of the property. That dispute can only be finally settled in a proper suit for dissolution of partnership and for adjustment of accounts. It is certainly not desirable that each of the parties should proceed by separate suits in order to recover from the other any sums due to the partnership business which he alone may have realised.

A point was taken on behalf of the opposite party that the petitioner, when the suit was instituted, ought to have proceeded in accordance with rule 18 of the second Schedule to the Code of Civil Procedure and ought to have applied to the Court for stay of the suit. We do not think that in the present case there is much substance in this point. The present petitioner appears to have put in an objection to the suit proceeding, although, possibly from ignorance of this new provision in the law, he did not expressly apply for stay of the suit. In our opinion, the petitioner in the present case in the course of the suit did put forward the objection which he had to the suit proceeding in the Small Cause Court. We think this objection the Court ought to have accepted and the lower Court ought to have held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the sum in a suit in the Court of Small Causes in the way in which his suit was framed. We, therefore, make the Rule absolute and set aside the judgment and decree of the Court of Small Causes and direct that if any sum has been realised in execution of the decree, it should be refunded to the petitioner.

The petitioner is entitled to recover his costs in this case. We fix the hearing fee at four gold mohurs. He is also entitled to recover from the opposite party No. 1 his costs in the Court of Small Causes.

Rule made absolute.

Discretion—Declaratory decree—Fraud.

The Court will not go out of its way to help a plaintiff, who got up a number of fraudulent deeds to cheat creditors, to obtain a declaration that some portion of the alleged consideration actually passed between the parties to the fraud.

Appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Trichnopoly, in Original Suit No. 14 of 1908.

Mr. G. S. Ramachandra Iyer, for the Appellants.

Mr. T. R. Venkatarama Sastriar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—It is not attempted to be shown that the finding of the Subordinate Judge that the deeds of mortgages and sale (Exhibits A, B, C, and D) were fraudulently executed in order to defeat creditors is wrong.

But it is urged that since it is found that some money was actually due to the mortgagees under Exhibits B and C, there ought to be a declaration that those mortgages are valid to that extent. We do not think that there should be such a declaration. The transactions in question were entered into in order to defeat creditors and as such they are void against the creditors [see Chidambaram Chettiar v. Samy Iyer (1)]. Besides, in such a case when the relief sought is of a discretionary nature, we do not think the Court ought to go out of its way to help a plaintiff, who got up a number of fraudulent deeds to cheat creditors, to obtain a declaration that some portion of the alleged consideration actually passed between the parties to the fraud.

We affirm the decrees of the Subordinate Judge and dismiss the appeal with costs.

Landlord and tenant—Non-transferable holding—Transfer by raiyat*—Suit by landlord to eject purchaser—Plaintiff to prove what—Abandonment and disclaimer, whether necessary to be proved positively as fact—Inference from transfer of holding and giving possession to purchaser—Parties—Whether* raiyat necessary party to suit—Custom of transferability—Proof—Recognition by landlord without nazar or with nazar fixed by custom.

The raiyat of a non-transferable holding transferred his interest in the entire holding, and the landlord brought a suit for khas possession of the holding against the purchaser:

Held, (1) that it was not necessary for the plaintiff to prove positively as a fact that the raiyat had left the holding and disclaimed any interest in it, as this was a direct inference from the fact that he had sold the entire holding and given possession of it to the purchaser;

(2) that the raiyat was not a necessary party to the suit.

In order to prove a custom of transferability, it is necessary to prove that the transfers had been made with the knowledge and without the consent of the landlord and that they have been recognised by him either without the payment of nazar, or upon payment of nazar fixed by custom.

Babu Manmatha Nath Mukherjee, for the Appellant.

Babu Gunoda Charan Sen, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.— These are six appeals brought by defendants transferees of alleged entire holdings, which were held under the plaintiffs by the transferors who are no parties to the suit. The learned Munsif held that the landlord was not entitled to eject these transferees. The learned Subordinate Judge reversed his decision and held that the landlord was entitled to eject. He, therefore, gave a decree for khas possession to the plaintiff with costs in each case.

Three points are taken by the defendants before us in appeal, first, that the suit was not properly framed, inasmuch as it was absolutely necessary to make the original tenants parties; secondly, that on the findings of the Munsif, which have not been reversed by the learned Subordinate Judge, it ought to have been held that the holdings are transferable without the consent of the landlord; and thirdly, that although there have been transfers, no fresh tenancies have been created and, therefore, there has been no abandonment or forfeiture; the plaintiff must show positive abandonment or disclaimer by the tenant of any interest in the holding.

Taking the third point first, it is sought to distinguish the plain rule of law, laid down in the leading case of Kabil Sardar v. Chandra Nath Nag Chowdhury (1), following the Full Bench ruling in Narendra Narayan Roy v. Ishun Chundra Sen (2), by citing two rulings from Mathura Mandul v. Ganga Charan Gope (3) and Rajani Kanto Biswas v. Ekkari Das (4). Now in the first of these cases, the ryot did not give up his interest and it was held that the transfer was not intended to be operative, and if the transfer was not intended to be an operative transaction, the mere fact that the ryot went away from the holding to reside elsewhere would not be sufficient to make it a case of abandonment so as to entitle the landlord to re-enter. The case of Rajani Kanto Biswas v. Ekkari Das (4) was a case where the transferor re-entered the land as sub-lessee from the purchaser and remained in possession but repudiated his relation as tenant to the landlord: it was held that he was not entitled to hold the land as against the landlord. We do not see how this can help the appellant in this case. The test is, as pointed out by the learned Judges, laid down in section 87 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, namely, that the ryot voluntarily abandons his residence and ceases to cultivate without notice to the landlord and without arranging for the payment of his rent as it falls due. Now a person, who transfers the whole of his holding to a third person and accepts full payment for it and ceases thereby to have any interest in the land, cannot be said to have protected the landlord's interest in the way laid down by section 87 of the Bengal Tenancy Act; and in the case of Kabil Sardar v. Chandra Nath Nag Chowdhury(1), to which we have referred, it was clearly laid down that the reason why the zemindar is entitled to khas possession of the land of the holding which has been sold and of which possession had been given to the purchaser, is that the sale and transfer of possession to the purchaser conveys no title to him, and as the ryot has left the holding and disclaims any interest in it, he must be held to have abandoned it. It does not say that it is necessary to prove as a fact that the ryot has left the holding and disclaims any interest in it; on the contrary; it says that this is a direct inference from the fact that he has sold the entire holding and given possession of it to the purchaser and that seems to be the true rule of law, and we in this case are entirely governed by it. It is not necessary that there should be a repudiation or refusal to pay rent to the zemindar. We, therefore, think that the argument on the third point fails.

(1) 20 C. 590.

Coming now to the first point, the Munsif held that the transferors were necessary parties. But this is a pure question of law and we think that he is in error, although the learned Subordinate Judge has not distinctly reversed his finding on this point. If the facts show, as the Subordinate Judge says, they do, that the plea of the transferees that the transferor had any interest in the land is false, it is not only not necessary to make them parties but it would be against the trend of modern judicial practice to load the record with parties who are shown to have no interest in the suit. Order I, rule 9 of the present Code of Civil Procedure, makes this very clear. We, therefore, think that there is nothing in the first contention of the learned Vakil for the appellant. The transferees are not bound by the judgment.

Finally, we come to the second contention, that on the findings of fact by the Munsif, which have not been reversed by the Subordinate Judge, it ought to have been held that the holdings were transferable without the consent of the landlord. It is urged that as regards custom, the Munsif found that nazar was offered by the defendants to the plaintiff and refused. The Subordinate Judge has not expressly set aside his finding of fact, but his own finding certainly sets it aside by implication. It is further urged that the Munsif has found that the zemindar bound himself by a general fixed-rent. We do not think that the finding of the learned Munsif at the bottom of page 9 amounts to this. He says: "It has been proved by Mohin Chandra Mitra that the plaintiff remained there on that occasion for four or five days during which batches of tenants came to him from time to time and learnt of the settlement of fixed rate of nazar and laharis by the plaintiff." This finding is somewhat vague. It does not show that the zemindar once for all fixed the rate of nazar for such transfers, nor does it show that such a rate was fixed by custom. Indeed it shows the very reverse. It does show that more than one rate was fixed by the zemindar and that different rates were fixed for different tenants. The learned Subordinate Judge differs from this view of the Munsif, though he may be wrong in saying that it was not the defendant's case. However, whether it was the defendant's case or not that case has been found against them by the learned Subordinate Judge. The effect of the right to refuse nazar, unless it is fixed by custom, obviously gives the option to the landlord. Reliance has been placed by the defendant on the case of Buzlal Karim v. Satish Chandra Giri (5). The Court there held that it was necessary to prove that the transfers had been made with the knowledge and without the consent of the landlord and that they have been recognised by him either without the payment of nazar or upon payment of nazar also fixed by custom. Now in this case, there is no mention of any nazar fixed by custom, and there is, therefore, nothing to bind the landlord even if the defendants did offer him nazar, which appears, on the findings of the Subordinate Judge, not to be the case. The examples, which the defendants put forward in their evidence, are all cases where the transfers had been made with the knowledge of the landlord and with his consent, and no number of such cases can prove the case of custom of making transfers with his knowledge and without his consent.

(3) 33 C. 1219; 10 C. W. N. 1033.
(4) 34 C. 689; 11 C. W. N. 811; 7 C. L. J. 48.

We are, therefore, of opinion that these appeals fail upon every ground and must be dismissed with costs.

This judgment will govern Second Appeals Nos. 2483 and 3000 to 3004 of 1909.

Appeals dismissed.

Suit for damages for trespass—Setting fire to and destroying pepper vines on one's land—Limitation Act (XV of 1877), Sch. II, Arts. 36, 39.

A suit for damages for unlawfully setting fire to and destroying pepper vines on one's land is governed by Article 39 of the Limitation Act.

Trespass includes the mischief which the trespasser commits after entering on the land.

Mangun Jha v. Dolhin Golab Koer, 25 C. 692; 2 C. W. N. 265; Surat Lall Mondal v. Umar Haji, 22 C. 877, Lukhimoni Dosi v. Karuna Kant Moitro, 3 C. L. R. 509 and Boyle v. Tamlyn, 6 B. & C. 329; 9 D. & R. 430; 5 L. J. (o. s.) K. B. 134; 30 R. R. 343, relied upon.

Article 36 can apply only to cases of malfeasance, misfeasance or non-feasance not provided for by other Articles.

Second appeal against the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of North Malabar, in Appeal Suits Nos. 458 and 474 of 1909, preferred against that of the Court of the District Munsif of Taliparamba, in Original Suit No. 276 of 1908.

Mr. K. P. Govinda Menon, for the Appellant.

Mr. V. Ryru Nambiar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is a suit for damages sustained by the plaintiff by the defendants' unlawfully setting fire to and destroying pepper vines on his land. Both Courts have found that the act assigned by the plaintiff was committed at the instigation of the 1st defendant by the 5th defendant, a tenant of his. It is contended that there is no legal evidence to support the finding of instigation by the 1st defendant. This observation is only correct in the sense that there is no direct evidence of any one who actually saw the act of instigation. There was strong circumstantial evidence against the 1st defendant and we must accept the concurrent findings of the Courts below that it was proved against him. The Subordinate Judge reversing the District Munsif's decree dismissed the suit on the ground that it was barred by limitation. He applies Article 36 of the Limitation Act which provides for "compensation for any malfeasance, misfeasance or non-feasance independent of contract and not herein specially provided for." It is clear that the Article can apply only to cases of malfeasance, misfeasance and nonfeasance not provided for by other Articles. The appellant contends that the case really falls within the purview of Article 39 for compensation for trespass upon immoveable property. We are of opinion that his contention must be upheld. We are entirely unable to agree with Mr. Ryru Nambiar's argument that trespass consists only of unlawful entry upon another man's land. It certainly includes the mischief which the trespasser commits after entering on the land. The majority of the Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court held, in Mangun Jha v. Dolhin Golab Koer (1), that a suit for damages for cutting crops on the owner's land would come within Article 39. See also Surat Lall Mondal v. Umar Haji (2). Maclean, C.J., was inclined to hold that even if the crops cut were carried away, the same Article would apply. Fishing in the owner's tank without his permission was held to be trespass [Lukhimoni Dasi v. Karuna Kant Moitro (3)]. Entry of the defendants' cattle on plaintiff's land and the causing of damage thereby was regarded as trespass, Boyle v. Tamlyn (4). Rampini, J., no doubt, held in several cases that the doing of an unlawful act by a person, who has already wrongfully entered on another's land, would not be trespass within the meaning of Article 39, but a malfeasance coming within Article 36. We can only say with respect to the learned Judge's opinion that it ignores the well understood signification of trespass in law. It is unnecessary to consider whether if a trespasser carries away anything from the land, a suit for damages for the loss of what is carried away would not fall within Article 49. That Article itself provides that a suit for an injury to moveable property might be instituted within three years, such a suit would not, therefore, fall within Article 36. It would be curious if the period of limitation for suing for compensation for injury to immoveable property should be less than that for compensation for injury to moveable property. We entertain no doubt that Article 39 is the proper one to be applied in this case. Mr. Ryru Nambiar contends that the plaint does not allege that the defendants trespassed on his land. The allegation in the plaint is that the defendants set fire to his pepper vines. The plaintiff's case, undoubtedly, was that they did so, having entered on the land for the purpose. He asked for permission in the Court of first instance to make a specific allegation in the plaint. To that effect leave to amend was refused. We agree with the Court of first instance that the plaint, properly read, does charge trespass against the defendants. We do not consider any amendment is necessary. With regard to the amount of damages, we see no reason to differ from the award made by the District Munsif. The appeal will, therefore, be allowed, the Subordinate Judge's decree set aside and the Munsif's decree restored. The claim for an amount larger than that allowed by the Munsif must be disallowed. The parties will pay and receive proportionate costs in this Court and in the lower Appellate Court.

Landlord and tenant—Tenancy—Acquisition by prescription—Limitation—Central Provinces Tenancy Act (XI of 1898), ss. 39, 44, 62 (1)—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I, Arts. 142, 144.

A tenancy cannot be acquired by prescription in the Central Provinces.

A person, occupying land without the consent of the landlord, and claiming to hold it as a tenant, does not hold even the limited right of a tenant adversely to the landlord.

Article 142 of the Limitation Act does not apply if the possession taken by the defendant of even a limited interest in land is not adverse to the plaintiff landlord.

Limitation time under Article 144 does not begin to run until possession becomes adverse.

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Raipur, dated the 21st July 1911, confirming that of the Subordinate Judge, Drug, dated the 7th March 1911.

Dr. H. S. Gour, for the Appellants.

Mr. Atmaram Bhagwant, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal relates to a plot of land bearing the number 1644/12 in Mauza Balodi in the Drug Tahsil. The plaintiffs-appellants are the malguzars of the village while the defendants are joint occupancy-tenants of certain garden lands in the village. The plaintiffs' case is that the plot No. 1644/12 forms part of the waste land of the village, and that the defendants occupied the plot without the landlord's permission in 1905, and have been cultivating it without paying rent. The suit is brought for the purpose of ejecting the defendants. The case of the defendants is that the plot has been in the possession of the defendants for the last 50 years and forms part of their occupancy holding, its rent being included in the rent of the holding. The learned Subordinate Judge found on the evidence that at the last incomplete Settlement, the number 1644 was given to a large area of land measuring 88·25 acres which comprised the bed of the river Sheonath. These 88·25 acres had been entered as river bed in the previous Settlement of Mr. Carey. The whole number is sub-divided into plots bearing sub-numbers, of which the plot in dispute, No. 1644/12 is one. In Mauza Balodi, there is a large extent of garden land along the bank of the Sheonath river, portions of which garden land are held by different tenants. The learned Subordinate Judge found that the plot in dispute originally formed portion of the defendants' garden land which they held in occupancy tenure and has been in their possession for at least 40 years but that at the time of Mr. Carey's Settlement, the plot was by mistake recorded as forming portion of the river-bed. He, therefore, dismissed the suit on the ground that the plot formed part of the defendants' occupancy holding, and was not part of the village waste. He also held that even if it had been found that the plot was not part of the defendants' occupancy holding but had been excluded from the holding when the garden was planted, as a barrier in order to prevent the garden land being washed away by the stream, nevertheless the plaintiffs cannot succeed in their suit for ejectment because the suit is time-barred, the plaintiffs having failed to prove that they were in possession of the plot within 12 years prior to the institution of the suit, while the defendants have proved that they have been in continuous possession for 40 years.

The learned District Judge in deciding the appeal expressly refrained from deciding whether the plot in dispute was part of the defendants' original occupancy holding. He dismissed the appeal on the ground that the suit was time-barred. He agreed with the Subordinate Judge in finding that the plaintiffs had failed to prove that they had been in possession within the 12 years prior to the institution of the suit. In holding the suit to be time-barred, the learned District Judge has relied on and followed the ruling of Ishan Chandra Mitter v. Raja Ramranjan Chakarbutty (1), in which it was held that possession of a limited interest in immoveable property may be just as much adverse for the purpose of barring a suit for the determination of that limited interest, as adverse possession of a complete interest in the property operates to bar a suit for the whole property, though such adverse possession of a limited interest, though a good plea to a suit for ejectment, is good only to the extent of that interest. So, it was held, when a tenant takes possession of lands outside his tenancy and professes to do so in his character as tenant, the landlord is dispossessed in a limited sense, being dispossessed of khas possession, though not of proprietary possession; in such a case, a tenant, who occupies for over 12 years more of his landlord's land than is covered by the lease, should be regarded as having dispossessed him under Article 142 of the Limitation Schedule and a landlord must, if he wishes to eject, bring his suit within 12 years of the commencement of the possession of the excess area by the tenant, though his right to recover rent would never become barred, the possession of the tenant as regards this right having never been adverse. The learned District Judge, in applying this ruling, held that the suit fell under Article 142, and was time-barred, on the finding that the plaintiffs had failed to prove that they were dispossessed within twelve years prior to the suit.

Before the District Judge, it was argued on behalf of the plaintiffs that, on the authority of Gadi Kunbi v. Ramlal (2), when a tenant takes into his holding land which has not been let to him and holds it under colour of his tenancy, his possession cannot be said to be adverse and he would not be protected from ejectment. As to this argument, the learned District Judge has merely remarked that "for the purposes of the present case, the question which arises is really not one of adverse possession but of limitation," and that "the title of the plaintiffs to recover possession has been extinguished by the law of limitation." The learned Judge has failed to observe that the argument rejected by Ismay, J. C., in the case cited was that the landlord's right to recover possession was extinguished if the tenant has been in possession of the excess area for more than twelve years, and that the acquisition of a title by adverse possession is merely another aspect of the loss of the right to sue for possession unless the suit is brought within the prescribed time. Under section 28 of the Limitation Act, a prescriptive title by adverse possession is obtained by the failure of the owner of the property to bring a suit for possession within the prescribed time, and the dispossession contemplated by Article 142 is an assumption of adverse possession; under Article 142, the contemplated possession of the defendant is adverse from the first, while under Article 144, it is not at first adverse, if adverse at all. That the possession of the defendant contemplated under Article 142 is adverse is clear from the whole tenor of the Calcutta ruling cited. If the possession taken by the defendant of even a limited interest in the land was not adverse, to the landlord, then Article 142 does not apply. The only other Article that can apply to a suit for possession of land is Article 144 and until the possession becomes adverse, limitation time under that Article does not begin to run. The crux is whether the defendants' possession was adverse or not and on this point, there can be no blinking the fact that the ruling of Ismay, J. C., is in direct conflict with the Calcutta ruling, supposing the Tenancy Laws in the two Provinces to be similar, a resemblance which has been assumed by the District Judge, and which has not been denied or even alluded to by the learned Counsel for the appellant in this Court. The two Acts, however, are not identical, and it is possible that in Bengal, the view might be taken that a ryot can acquire rights otherwise than by contract with the landlord, vide Binad Lal Pakrashi v. Kalu Pramanik (3). The view taken in Ishan Chandra Mitter v. Raja Ramranjan Chakarbutty (1) has been followed and approved in the recent case of Gopal Krishna Jana v. Lakhiram Sardar (4). In Gadi Kunbi v. Ramlal (2), Ismay, J. C., upheld the view taken in the cases of Jugaraj Singh v. Ratan (5), Bhan v. Sadoo (6) and Khemchand v. Ramkisan (7). In none of these Central Provinces cases, have any express reasons been given for the view that a person, occupying land without the consent of the landlord and claiming to hold it as a tenant, does not hold even the limited right of a tenant adversely to the landlord. But the view seems to me to be based on and to follow from the policy and provisions of the Central Provinces Tenancy Act. In section 62 (1) of Act XI of 1898, it is enacted that every tenant, who is not an absolute occupancy-tenant or an occupancy-tenant or a village service tenant or a sub-tenant, is an ordinary tenant. These tenures are exhaustive and there is no other possible class of tenant. And for practical purposes in inquiring into the possibility of acquiring tenancy right by adverse possession, we need only contemplate ordinary tenancies, for the status of an absolute occupancy tenant or occupancy-tenant as defined in sections 39 and 44 of the Act is one that under the definitions cannot possibly be acquired by prescription; at any rate, if an ordinary tenant right cannot be acquired by prescription, a fortiori the right of an absolute occupancy or occupancy-tenant cannot be so acquired. In Wasudeo Gharpure v. Ganu Kunbi (8), Stanyon, A. J.C., has very emphatically pointed out that "a tenancy can, in the first instance, be created only by a contract between the landlord of the soil and a person whom he is willing to accept as his tenant." From the definition of "Tenant", he says it is clear that a landlord at his option first makes a tenant. Similarly in Ghanya v. Ukund Rao (9), the same learned Additional Judicial Commissioner speaks of an occupancy holding as "an estate created by contract and statute." Contract and prescription are the very antitheses of each other, and if a tenancy can only be created by contract, it cannot be created by something which rests on the denial that there was a contract. It appears to me that while the Limitation Act contemplates, in section 28 and in the Articles in the Limitation Schedule, applicable to suits for possession of land or of any interest in land, only such possession by the defendant as is possible under the ordinary law, the special law embodied in the Tenancy Act creates or recognises special tenures which can only come into existence in a particular manner, namely, by contract and which cannot come into existence by reason of any provisions of the Limitation Act. In so far, therefore, as the defendants in this case seek to defeat the plaintiffs through the provisions of the Limitation Act, combined with their assertion of tenancy, they are setting up a kind of tenancy which has no existence in law. It is impossible to hold what is incapable of existence, and, therefore, if there had been no agreement of tenancy, express or implied, with the landlord, the defendants never held, for however short a time, even the limited interest of a tenant in the land in dispute. They can, in the words of Mookerjee, J., in Ishan Chandra Mitter v. Raja Ramranjan Chakarbutty (1), plead their adverse possession to the extent of the interest claimed by them, but the interest claimed was incapable of existence and the claim to be tenants must be regarded as non-existent. They never held at all the limited interest of a tenant, and they can, therefore, never have held that limited interest adversely to the plaintiffs. They do not claim to have held any other interest in the land, so they have never held adversely to the plaintiffs. I am thus of opinion that while there may be adverse possession of a limited interest in land, this principle is over-ridden by the special provisions of the Tenancy Act, and there are no grounds whatever for taking a different view from that expressed in Gadi Kunbi v. Ramlal (2), a view strictly applicable to the present case. The defendants' long continued possession of the land may be evidence of an express or implied contract of tenancy or of the landlord having acquiesced in their occupancy and accepted them as tenants, but this is a very different thing from the landlord's rights being lost under the Law of Limitation. As the District Judge has dismissed the appeal on a wrong ground, I set aside the decree of the District Court and remand the appeal for re-trial under its original number. Certificate for refund of Court-fee will issue, other costs in this Court will be costs in the suit.

(1) 2 C. L. J. 125.

Case remanded.

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 1283 OF 1911.

Present:—Mr. Justice Sundara Aiyar and Mr. Justice Sadasiva Aiyar.

VEMBU IYER alias RAMANADHA IYER—PLAINTIFF—APPELLANT

SRINIVASA IYENGAR AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—RESPONDENTS.

Minor—Guardian—Power of natural guardian—Sale of minor's property—Validity discussed—Necessity—Benefit.

Per Sundara Aiyar, J.—Where the mother of a Hindu minor sells his property for the discharge of certain debts due by the minor's father, the validity of the sale must depend upon the general powers and duties of a guardian under the Hindu Law apart from the provisions of the Guardians and Wards Act.

There is a difference between the powers of a natural guardian and one appointed by the Court. The latter class of guardian is under the supervision of the Court, the powers of guardianship are in large part exercised by the Court itself and the appointed guardian can only act subject to its supervision and control. Definite restraints are put upon an appointed guardian by Statutes. These restraints will not be applicable to a natural guardian whose duties must be regulated by considerations of what should be regarded as best in the interests of the minor.

The powers of a manager for an infant heir to charge his estate not his own is under the Hindu Law a limited and qualified power. It can only be exercised rightly in the case of need or for the benefit of the estate. The question in each case would be whether any alienation or other transactions for the benefit of the minor is necessary so as to satisfy the phrase 'in a case of need.' Again, if a person dealing with a guardian acts bona fide and after due inquiry believes that the transaction is for the minor's benefit or necessary, it can be upheld against him though a ward may have good reasons to complain of the conduct of the guardian.

The words 'necessity' and 'benefit' really import two different ideas. Necessity seems to connote the idea of warding off an evil or the doing of something that cannot be avoided or of something which is one's legal duty to do, such as avoiding a sale of a minor's property for a debt, conducting necessary repairs, maintenance of a minor and performance of his father's funerals, but over and above all these acts that are necessary, there may be acts which are positively beneficial to the minor and an alienation which would conduce positively to the benefit of the minor would be upheld apart from any necessity unless, of course, it is accompanied by other evil.

Demand is not necessary to justify an alienation to discharge a debt. A debt may be a pressure on the estate even though the creditor has not yet demanded payment of it. Whether it would be so, would depend on the circumstances.

It is the duty of the guardian to pay off debts incurred by the father. As a natural guardian has in this country no right to ask the advice of the VEMBU IYER v. SRINIVASA IYENGAR.

Court like a statutory guardian, the discretion as to how the duty of discharging the debts binding on the minor should be performed, must rest with him. The question in each case would be, whether the discretion vested in a guardian has been exercised properly. He would be taken to have done so, if he acted with due prudence and caution. As to the degree of prudence required, the right view to take is, whether in the circumstances that existed at the time of the alienation, the act would be regarded as a prudent one by men of ordinary prudence in dealing with the property of a ward.

If the guardian consulted proper advisers, that would be a good test whether the act would be prudent but the mere consultation of others would not be a ground for upholding a transaction if the Court is convinced that both those consulted and the guardian made a grave mistake.

The powers of a manager of a Hindu family, a guardian of an infant and a trustee, contrasted.

Per Sadasiva Aiyar, J.—If the guardian of a Hindu minor alienates the minor's property because he considers it, after weighing all the then existing circumstances, to be in the best interests of the minor to make that alienation, the minor is clearly bound by that act of alienation.

Even if the guardian has acted wrongly, the alienee is protected if he acts in good faith after making due inquiry and if he is satisfied, on the representations of the guardian and on his own independent inquiry, that the guardian's act appears then to be clearly for the minor's benefit.

Any comparison between the powers of a natural guardian and of a guardian to whom the Guardians and Wards Act applies is of very little utility in deciding as to the powers of a natural guardian under the Hindu law. The Legislature is not bound to follow the common law and can give powers and impose restrictions on certain kinds of guardians according to pleasure.

Second appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Kumbakonam, in A. S. No. 555 of 1910, preferred against that of the District Munsif of Mannargudi, in O. S. No. 292 of 1908.

JUDGMENT.

SUNDARA AIYAR, J.—This is a suit for setting aside a sale made by the plaintiff's guardian in the year 1889. The suit was instituted on the 28th October 1908. The plaintiff was born on the 23th October 1887. He delayed the suit until the last day on which it was open to him to institute it. The sale was admittedly made for the discharge of certain debts due by the plaintiff's father.

Both Courts have upheld the sale. The District Munsif found that the sale was necessary in the interests of the minor. On appeal, the Subordinate Judge seems to have confirmed the decree with some hesitation. He observed:—"I am unable to hold that with prudent management the debts could not have been cleared from out of the income." He also held that there was no clear necessity to support the sale. With respect to a plea of the defendants that the guardian had to take into account at the time of the sale the fact that two sisters of the plaintiff had shortly to be married, the Sub-Judge says:—"The prospective marriages of daughters of the family and the consequent fear of not being able to clear off debts are too speculative reasons to justify a sale by a mother during the son's minority." He, however, confirmed the Munsif's decree on the ground that he was unable to say that the trustee did not act with due care and prudence in selling the properties and that the discretion vested in the mother as a guardian cannot be said to have been misused. He observed:—"The case falls within the discretion of a trustee and the discretion cannot be said to have been misused." He held that "the case did not fall within the words of the decisions supporting sales by a guardian." He continues:—"But the logical extension of the ideas on the subject does not exclude the present sale from the category of legally valid sales." It is not surprising that the plaintiff considered that there were good grounds for an appeal from a judgment pronounced with so much doubt. I confess I have not felt any difficulty in confirming the decree of the Subordinate Judge. I am of opinion that the circumstances show that the sale was necessary. The decision of the case must depend on the general powers and duties of a guardian under the Hindu Law, apart from any provisions of the Guardians and Wards Act. There are numerous cases in the Indian Courts which have dealt with the position of a guardian, but hardly any one in which the precise question for determination in this case was the subject of judicial pronouncement. In England, it would appear, a guardian has no power to sell or mortgage the real estate of his ward. Infants came very early under the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in that country. All power to sell or to mortgage a ward's estate was vested in the Court and the guardian could not exercise it without the consent of the Court. See the matter discussed in Dagdu bin Daud Teli Pardeshi v. Shekh Saheb valad Bahuruddin Kamble (1). In this country, on the other hand, only a guardian appointed or declared as such by a Court is under the supervision of the Court. The powers and duties of other guardians are governed by considerations, primarily, of what would be for the welfare of the minor. During the arguments, the learned Vakils on both sides cited various cases relating to the powers of a natural guardian, a guardian appointed by Court, the manager of a Hindu family and a trustee. And it was contended by Mr. Seshagiri Iyer that the powers of a natural guardian were of the narrowest kind as compared with the others. I do not propose to enter on a comparison of the powers of these different classes of persons. It is true that the manager of a Hindu family is one possessing an estate in the property that he deals with, while a guardian has no estate in his ward's property. He is in management of the property solely belonging to another. But at the same time, it may be said that it is open to a manager to obtain the consent of all adult co-parceners to any transaction which he thinks proper to undertake; and that a guardian who has no so such means open to him ought to be invested with a larger discretion than a manager. Again in some respects, the powers of a guardian must be taken to be inferior to those of a trustee, for a trustee has the legal ownership vested in him and, although his obligations to the beneficiary are no less than those of a guardian, persons who deal bona fide with him would receive larger protection on the ground that they are dealing with a person who is regarded by law as the owner of the property notwithstanding that he is under obligations to another. On this ground, it was held in Muthu Subbiah Chettiar v. Rungiah Gounden (2) that a guardian's powers were less extensive than those of a trustee. It was assumed in that case that a natural guardian's powers would be inferior to those of one appointed by Court. This seems to me to be not quite correct. The latter class of guardian is under the supervision of the Court. The powers of guardianship are, in large part, exercised by the Court itself and the appointed guardian can only act subject to its supervision and control. Definite restraints are put upon an appointed guardian by statute. Those restraints would not be applicable to a natural guardian. There is no provision in Indian Law for a natural guardian, not declared as such by the Court, to take the opinion of the Court as to the propriety of any transaction he may have to enter into on behalf of his ward. His duties must be regulated by considerations of what should be regarded as best for the interests of the minor. The leading case on the subject is Hanooman Persaud Pandey v. Musammat Babooee Munraj Koonwaree (3). The following passage, to be found at page 423, may be regarded as the text on which the subsequent decisions of the Indian Courts have been based :—"The power of the manager for an infant heir to charge an estate not his own, is, under the Hindu Law, a limited and qualified power. It can only be exercised rightly in a case of need, or for the benefit of the estate." The question then would be whether any alienation or other transaction is for the benefit of the minor or necessary, so as to satisfy the phrase 'in a case of need'. There is, of course, another rule based on considerations of equity to the person dealing with the guardian, namely, that, if he acts bona fide and after due inquiry believes that the transaction is for the minor's benefit or necessary, it must be upheld as against him though a ward may have good reason to complain of the conduct of the guardian. Prior to the enunciation of the law by the Privy Council, there appears sometimes to have been an idea in India that the creditors of a minor had no right to demand their debts during his minority and that they must wait till the minor attained age. This would, of course, affect the guardian's power to deal with the estate for the discharge of the minor's father's debts. See Menaughten's "Principles of Hindu Law", Chapter VII, page 105 ; Trevelyan's "Law Relating to Minors," page 183; Dagdu bin Daud Teli Pardeshi v. Sheik Sahib valid Baduruddin Kamble (1). This view was, however, subsequently given up and Mcnaughten himself in his 'Precedents' cites a case decided in pages 120-121, where it was held that the discharge of debts would be regarded as a 'necessity.' The word 'necessity' appears, at first sight, not to be calculated to give a clear idea of the scope of the cases coming within it. Necessity and benefit were not properly distinguished. Thus Trevelyan observes:—"Apart from necessity, it is not easy to say what is for the benefit for a minor's estate," and in an early case in Calcutta, Sudder Dewani Adawlat Reports, 1856, page 980, benefit to a minor seems to have been regarded as making the alienation necessary. The Court observed:—"It is enough for us now to say that we hold that a mortgage entered into by the mother of a minor of a portion of the minor's property for the benefit of the minor is valid under the Hindu Law, that benefit being the cause of or creating the necessity which has arisen." This confusion induced me to say in In re Krishnaswami Das Reddi (4) that it might be desirable to avoid the use of the word 'necessary' and 'necessity' and to substitute 'reasonable' and 'probable'. I am convinced, however, 'necessity' and 'benefit' really import two different ideas and that it is desirable to keep in view the distinction between them. 'Necessity' seems to connote the idea of warding off an evil or the doing of something that cannot be avoided or of something which it is one's legal duty to do. To avoid the sale of a minor's property for a debt would be warding off an evil; conducting necessary repairs would also be an act of the same class. The maintenance of the minor would be a necessity as something which cannot be avoided. Performing his father's funerals would be a necessity as an act which it is his duty to perform. But over and above all these acts that are necessary, there may be acts which are positively beneficial to the minor, and an alienation which would conduce positively to the benefit of the minor would be upheld apart from any necessity, unless, of course, it is accompanied by other evil. Mr. Seshagiri Iyer's main contention was that the discharge of debts cannot be regarded as a necessity unless the creditors pressed for the debt or at least demanded payment. The Sub-Judge has found that there was no demand in this case. It was contended that, therefore, it cannot be held that there was any necessity. No case has been cited, nor have we been able to find any, which has laid down that a demand is necessary to justify an alienation to discharge a debt. It is impossible to lay down any such broad proposition. The creditors may be quite content to allow their debts to run on if they carry heavy interest. They might wait until the whole estate might be swallowed up by their debts. It would be unreasonable to say that a guardian in such circumstances cannot sell a portion of the estate so that the remainder may be saved for the minors' benefit. There can be no doubt that it is the duty of a guardian to pay off debts incurred by the ward's father. In England, where, as I have already observed, a guardian cannot mortgage or sell a ward's estate of his own accord, the discharge of the debts binding on the minor has been recognised to be a duty. There is, no doubt, in order to fulfil that duty, the guardian should apply to the Court for permission to mortgage or sell and the Court may make an order for either according to the circumstances of the case. But as a natural guardian, not declared as guardian, has in this country no right to ask for the advice of the Court, the discretion as to how the duty of discharging the debts binding on the minor should be performed must rest with him. I do not mean to lay down that if there is an estate earning a large income and the debts could be discharged in a short time out of the usufruct, a sale by the guardian for the discharge of the debt would be always upheld. The question in each case would be whether the discretion vested in a guardian has been exercised properly. He would be taken to have done so if he acted with due prudence and caution. Mr. Seshagiri Iyer contended that the prudence which a man would exercise in the management of his own affairs would not necessarily be sufficient in the administration of the property of a ward and relied on the observations contained in Muthu Subbiah Chetty v. Rungiah Gounden (2) to that effect with respect to a trustee. I agree with him to a considerable extent. It is true that it would not be enough for the Court to say that if an adult had acted in the management of his own property in the way in which a guardian has dealt with his ward's property, the adult owner's action would not be pronounced imprudent. There are risks which an owner may take that might be consistent with the conduct of a prudent man. A trustee or a guardian has no right to take the same risk in dealing with the property of another. This is the rule which has been applied in the English Courts with respect to the acts of a trustee. At the same time, the Court has certainly to judge of the act of a guardian as it would appear to a prudent man at the time that the act was done. It will not set aside his acts on the ground that years after the act has been done, it appears to the Court that the guardian might have acted better. If the guardian consulted proper advisers, that would be a good test as to whether the act was prudent, for it would show that other disinterested persons took the same view of the propriety of the act as he himself did. The right view to lay down appears to me to be to consider, whether, in the circumstances that existed at the time of the alienation, the act would be regarded as a prudent one by men of ordinary prudence in dealing with the property of a ward. No hard and fast distinction can be made between a sale and a mortgage. See Mohanund Mondul v. Nafur Mondul (5). Where an act is sought to be supported, not on the ground that it was 'necessary' but on the ground that it was calculated to procure some benefit for the minor, there might be some difference in the application of the test to determine the validity of the guardian's act. There might also be a difference in applying this rule that a bona fide purchaser would be protected. If the act which was calculated to procure benefit for the minor was of a risky or speculative character, it would not be supported by the Court. And it may be that the Court would apply a rather strict test in deciding what should be regarded as speculative in such a case. It may also be that a bona fide purchaser would find it difficult to obtain protection on the ground that a speculative transaction appeared to be beneficial to a minor. But in deciding whether an act, which came within the purview of 'necessity', should be upheld, I think considerable latitude should be allowed for the exercise of the guardian's discretion. See Babaji Mahadaji v. Kristnaji Devaji (6). In Arunachala Reddy v. Chidambara Reddy (7), an alienation, which was made partly for the discharge of debts binding on the minor, was upheld. In the cases bearing on the question, there was generally, no doubt, some circumstance beyond the mere existence of a debt relied on to justify the alienation. Thus in Sucaram Morarji v. Kalidas Kanhayi (8), there were no other assets left out of which the debt could be discharged. In Daglu bin Daud Teli Pardeshi v. Sheik Sahib Badruddin Kamble (1), the Court found that the alienation was for the discharge of debts. But it added "and it was absolutely necessary," but no other circumstance relied on is mentioned as supporting the necessity for sale. In Kaihur Singh v. Roop Singh (9), it was observed that no immediate pressure or suit need be proved in order to support a sale for discharging a debt. In Babaji Mahadaji v. Krishnajee Devaji (6), it appears that the debt had not become due at the time of the alienation. The language of the Privy Council in Hanuman Persaud Pandey v. Musammat Babooee Munraj Kunwaree (3) does not, in my opinion, support the contention that unless there was a demand by the creditor, a sale for the discharge of his debt would not be justified. Their Lordships say:—"The actual pressure on the estate, the danger to be averted or the benefit to be conferred on it in the particular instance is the thing to be regarded." The words 'actual pressure' are relied on to support the argument that the person in possession as guardian must have been pressed by the creditor to pay the debt. I do not think that the language 'pressure on the estate' necessarily signifies this. A debt may be a pressure on the estate even though the creditor has not yet demanded payment of it. Whether it is so in any particular case would depend on the circumstances In this case, it is found that there were debts at the time of the death of the minor's father. Three sales were made in 1888 for the discharge of a portion of them. Apparently soon after the death of the father, the guardian considered it desirable to take measures to discharge all debts. The sale which is called in question here took place shortly after the previous sales. All were probably parts of one single scheme that the debts should be discharged if possible. The Sub-Judge is, in my opinion, not justified in holding that the guardian acted in a speculative spirit in having regard to the fact of the prospective expenditure on account of the minor's sisters' marriages. The District Munsif's judgment shows that about Rs. 1,000 was required for the current expenditure of the family. After making provision for Government kist, and this expenditure, there was apparently very little to save for the discharge of debts, and the prospect of having to incur further debts for the marriages of two girls would certainly influence a prudent guardian in deciding what steps should be taken for the discharge of the debts. I am of opinion that the discharge of the debts was necessary in the circumstances of the case and that the defendants need not rely solely on the fact that the alienation was an act done by the guardian honestly and after taking advice from others. The mere consultation of others would not always be a ground for upholding a transaction, if the Court is convinced that both those consulted and the guardian made a grave mistake. The conclusion arrived at by the Subordinate Judge is right and this second appeal must be dismissed with costs.

The respondent has preferred a memo. of objections against the Subordinate Judge's disallowance of his costs in the appeal. I do not think that the fact that the questions of law raised in the case were not easy of solution was a good ground for disallowing the costs of the successful litigant. The order as to costs must be set aside. The respondent will have his costs in this Court and in the lower Appellate Court.

SADASIVA AIYAR, J.—The important question of law argued in this case relates to the power of the natural guardian of a minor Hindu to effect an alienation of the minor's property so as to bind the minor. Numerous cases have been quoted on both sides in which the disputed alienation has been upheld, sometimes on the ground of legal necessity, sometimes because it was reasonable and proper, again because the guardian did not act through caprice and extravagance but in the best interests of the minor, sometimes because it was "for the minor's benefit" and so on. In a few cases, the alienation has been upheld because the alienee acted bona fide in obtaining the alienation from the guardian after making proper inquiries as to the actual necessity or as to the alienation being for the minor's benefit or as to the existence of pressure from creditors. In Mayne's Hindu Law, paragraph 218 it is said :—"He will also be bound by the act of his guardian, in the management of his estate, when bona fide and for his interest and when it is such as the infant might reasonably and prudently have done for himself, if he had been of full age. But not where the act appears not to have been for his benefit and the person who so deals with the guardian is bound to inquire into the propriety of his act. And where the act is done by a person, who is not his guardian but who is the manager of the estate in which he has an interest, he will equally be bound, if, under the circumstances, the step taken was necessary, proper or prudent." In Succaram Morarji v. Kulidas Kanhaii (8), it was said quoting from West and Buhler, that a widow managing for her infant son (like any other manager when minors are interested as co-parceners) can deal with the property only to meet existing necessities but the other party is protected by good faith and reasonable inquiry. In Mahammad Mundal v. Nofur Mundal (5), it was held that the principle of the decision in Hanooman Persaud Pandey v. Musammat Babooee Munraj Kunwaree (3), was applicable also to the bona fide manager of an infant's estate (in that case the grandmother of the plaintiff), that an alienation by sale stands on the same footing as an alienation by mortgage and that Mr. Mayne's opinion, in his Hindu Law, section 196, is correct that when the act is done by the person who is not his guardian but who is the manager of the estate in which he has an interest, the minor will equally be bound, if, under the circumstances, the step taken was necessary, proper or prudent. In Kaihur Singh v. Roop Singh (9), it was held that even without actual pressure upon the minor's estate, an act of the guardian which at the time of the alienation appeared on the reasonable grounds to be dictated by prudence and for the minor's benefit is binding on the minor. In Tejpal v. Ganga (10), the learned Judges say:—"We think that the preponderance of authority is in favour of the proposition that a Hindu mother as the natural guardian of her minor son has a right to deal with and dispose of her minor son's estate for his benefit". It will be seen that the learned Judges say nothing about "pressure" and do not use the phrase 'necessity' or 'legal necessity' which vague phrase has been interpreted in various ways in different decisions. In Subba Reddy v. Kotamma (11), Davies and Sankaran Nair, JJ., held that where a guardian has acted in the interests of the minors after consideration of the circumstances then in existence, his act, was binding on the minors, though it was afterwards found that the act was really injurious to the minors (as the minors got only 4 acres through the said guardian's act while they were really entitled, as afterwards found, to 7 acres of land). This case shows that where a guardian acts according to his best lights for the minor's benefit and his act was what an ordinary man of prudence would do where his own property was concerned, such act is binding on the minor. In the case in Arunachala Reddi v. Chidambara Reddy (7), it was held that alienations made in part for the purpose of discharging the liability incurred by the father of the minor and in part in connection with litigation in which the question of the validity of the minor's adoption was involved, was binding on the minor if there was nothing to suggest that in making the alienation, even though the alienees were her relations, the minor's mother was acting otherwise than in the interest of the minor's estate. I think the only safe and convenient rule is (a) that if the guardian of a Hindu minor alienates the minor's property because he considers it, after weighing all the then existing circumstances, to be in the best interests of the minor to make that alienation, the minor is clearly bound by that act of alienation, (b) that even if the guardian acted wrongly, the alienee is protected if he acts in good faith after making due inquiry and if he is satisfied on the representations of the guardian and on his own independent inquiry that the guardian's act appears then to be clearly for the minor's benefit. I think that any comparison between the powers of a natural guardian and of a guardian to whom the Guardians and Wards Act applies, as was done in the case of Muthu Subbiah Chettiar v. Rungiah Gounden (2), is of very little utility in deciding as to the powers of a natural guardian under the Hindu Law. The Legislature is not bound to follow the common law and can give powers and impose restrictions on certain kinds of guardians according to pleasure. In the present case, I understand both Courts to find that the alienee (the 6th defendant) acted bona fide and that he did not want to make any profit at the expense of the minor in obtaining the alienation of 1889 from the minor's mother acting as the minor's guardian. Though no specific issue as to the alienee's good faith and the inquiries made by him was raised in the suit, the first issue is generally worded as to the binding character of the alienation on plaintiff and the cross-examination of the 6th defendant (defendant's witness No. 15) by the plaintiff's Vakil was directed to the question whether 6th defendant did make proper inquiries as to the debts due by the minor's deceased father and as to whether there was pressure upon the estate and so on. The plaintiff was, therefore, not taken by surprise and I do not think it necessary that specific issue should now be raised on the question of the alienee's good faith or that an opportunity should be given to the parties to adduce further evidence in this case. I am also clear on the evidence that (as found by both Courts) the plaintiff's mother, after consulting her husband's relations and friends, considered it the most prudent course and for the clear benefit of the minor to make the sale of the property to the 6th defendant, who offered the highest price then available for it. I might state that the learned Subordinate Judge was not justified in his findings on three questions of fact, his findings being at variance with those come to by the learned Munsif. The Subordinate Judge held that a debt of only Rs. 4,000 remained due on the date of the plaintiff's father's death whereas plaintiff's own 16th witness admitted the existence of a debt of Rs. 7,000 at the father's death. The Subordinate Judge also ignored the documents Exhibits I and II which show the existence of debts to the extent of about Rs. 3,500 in addition to the

(10) 25 A. 59.
(11) 14 M. L. J. 442.

Rs. 4,000 due under Exhibits III, V, VI, VIII, IX and X. The learned Subordinate Judge also disbelieved the genuineness of documents Exhibits XI and XIII, while even the plaintiff in the ground of appeal before him (see ground 8) did not deny the genuineness of those Exhibits but only stated that they should not have been admitted in evidence as they were produced too late and that importance should not have been attached to them. On the question of pressure by creditors also, the Subordinate Judge ignored the fact that some properties had already been sold to discharge debts and erred in differing from the Munsif by brushing aside the circumstantial evidence indicating the pressure of creditors on the guardian and in practically requiring direct evidence to be given by the creditors themselves of such pressure after the lapse of twenty years. In the result, I agree that this second appeal should be dismissed with costs, and the memorandum of objections, put in by the respondents Nos. 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 10 in respect of the costs disallowed by the Subordinate Judge, must be allowed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

DEORAO—RESPONDENT.

Berar Land Revenue Code (Act of 1896), ss. 205 to 209,211(d)—Pre-emption—Decree for foreclosure against mortgagor's representative—Representative also co-occupant—Subsequent suit for pre-emption.

The right of pre-emption arising in respect of a mortgage under the Berar Land Revenue Code is quite independent of any obligation to redeem the mortgage which may fall on the pre-emptor as a representative of the mortgagor.

A. owned a certain survey number. He partitioned the field equally between his two sons, B. and C., reserving no share for himself. Subsequently, A. and B. mortgaged the half share of B. to D., who sued A. and B. for foreclosure of the mortgage. A decree nisi was passed in the usual form. Before it became absolute, A. died, and C. was brought on the record in his place. No redemption took place, and the decree for foreclosure was made absolute. C., thereupon, sued to enforce his right of pre-emption under the Berar Land Revenue Code:

Held, that the decree for foreclosure was no bar to the suit for pre-emption by C.

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, East Berar, Amraoti, dated the 27th June 1911, reversing that of the Subordinate Judge, Morsi, dated the 9th July 1909.

Dr. H. S. Gour and Mr. M. B. Kinkhede, for the Appellant.

Mr. J. Mitra, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—It is necessary to state the facts as found by the lower Appellate Court. One Raibhan had two sons, Sitaram and Deorao, and the family once jointly owned Survey Nos. 1 and 8 in a village called Simora, in the Morsi Taluq of the Amraoti District in Berar. Some 12 years before the suit, out of which this appeal has arisen, Raibhan partitioned the two fields equally between his two sons, reserving no share for himself. Thereafter Raibhan and Sitaram executed a mortgage of the half share of Sitaram in favour of the present defendant Agyaram. A suit was brought to enforce this mortgage by foreclosure. It was expressly held in that suit that Sitaram's brother Deorao, the present plaintiff, had no present interest in the mortgaged half share. A decree for Rs. 7,192-13-3 was passed against the mortgagors, in the usual form of a foreclosure decree nisi. Before it was made absolute, Raibhan died, and, though he had no interest in the mortgaged half share, and was wrongly retained on the record as a defendant and judgment-debtor, the error was perpetuated by substituting Deorao for him as his legal representative. No redemption took place, and the decree for foreclosure was made absolute. Thereupon, Deorao lodged the present suit to enforce his right of pre-emption under the Berar Land Revenue Code. It was pleaded, inter alia, that plaintiff had lost the right to pre-emption owing to his failure to exercise it by redeeming the mortgage decree before it was made absolute. This plea succeeded in the first Court, which dismissed the suit on that ground. The lower Appellate Court, however, reversed that decision, and has given the plaintiff a decree for pre-emption. Hence this second appeal by the defendant. The lower Appellate Court has held that the right to pre-emption did not arise till after the foreclosure decree had been made absolute, and this proposition is contested before me.

DHARANI MUDALI v. MEENAMBA BAI.

I am bound to say that the provisions as to pre-emption contained in the Berar Land Revenue Code, 1896, are extremely ambiguous in places, and it is not easy to answer the question raised in this appeal. Section 205 states that the right to pre-empt arises when the interest of the co-occupant "is transferred by sale, foreclosure of mortgage, or relinquishment in favour of a specified person for valuable consideration." It seems to me to be a misnomer to describe as pre-emption, a right to cancel a transfer already made and compel another transfer in favour of the so-called pre-emptor. Sections 206 to 209, which lay down the procedure to be followed by the holders, and intending purchasers and mortgagors, of shares subject to pre emption, contemplate true pre emption, namely, that before any other transfer is completed, the pre emptor shall be given his option: and in case of an impending transfer by foreclosure, the pre-emptor practically exercises the right of redemption for his own benefit. It is this that is made the bed-rock of the case for the appellant before me. It is urged that the plaintiff, as pre-emptor, received notice of the mortgage by being made a party to the mortgage suit before foreclosure absolute: that he thus had an opportunity of satisfying his right of pre-emption by way of section 208 (1) of the Berar Code, and that, having abstained from availing himself of his option, the decree absolute now restrains him from reviving that option. It seems to me, however, that this contention overlooks the provisions of section 211 of the said Code. It cannot be disputed that due notice, as required by section 206, was not given to the plaintiff. It is also clear from clause (d) of section 211 that, if a pre emptor finds the mortgage-debt in excess of the fair market-value of the property mortgaged, then he may abstain from redemption, and bring a suit under section 211. In the present case the mortgage decree was for Rs. 7,192-13 3, whereas the Courts below have found the price of pre-emption to be Rs. 3,680-9 9. The plaintiff, as a representative judgment-debtor in the mortgage suit, could not have claimed to redeem for this amount; and clause (d), of section 211, seems to me to make the right to bring a pre-emption suit quite independent of any duty of redemption, qua representative of the mortgagor.

For these reasons, I am not prepared to hold that the view taken by the lower Appellate Court is wrong. I, therefore, dismiss this appeal with costs

MEENAMBA BAI AMMANI—RESPONDENT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 146, O. XXI, r. 16—Assignment of decree—Limitation—Execution of decree—Petition by transferee decree-holder to enter up satisfaction.

A transferee decree-holder may put in a petition to enter up satisfaction of a whole or a part of a decree without puttinglin an application for execution. There is no necessity, according to the Code, for the assignee getting any previous order recognising his assignment before doing so.

It is open to a decree-holder to certify satisfaction of a decree at any time.

The date of assignment has nothing to do with the question of limitation applicable to execution of decree.

A transferee decree-holder is not precluded from receiving payment from the judgment-debtor of the amount due under the decree by the mere fact that he had not paid some portion of the consideration to his transferor.

Appeal against the order of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Tanjore, dated 30th March 1911, in E. A. No. 447 of 1910, in O. S. No. 30 of 1902.

Messrs. L. A. Govindaraghava Aiyar and G. S. Ramachandra Aiyar, for the Appellant.

Mr. T. R. Ramachandra Aiyar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—We shall deal with each of the objections to the application put in by the transferee decree-holder separately. The first point raised is that the assignee's right to execute the decree is res judicata by the orders, Exhibits G, H, I*a* and II*a*. We are of opinion that what was decided in every one of these orders was no more than that so long as an attachment on the decree sought to be executed subsisted, the assignee could not execute the decree. It is conceded that there was no subsisting attachment on the date of the present application except the attachment by Nilakanta Iyer. We are of opinion that Nilakanta Iyer's attachment had also ceased to subsist. He put in a petition to the Court abandoning the attachment. Any application, therefore, to execute the decree would not be barred by the rule of res judicata.

The most important objection argued is that the present application by the assignee is not maintainable because it does not come within the purview of Order XXI, rule 16, which lays down that an assignee of a decree in writing may apply for execution and the Court may allow execution under the same rules and subject to the same conditions as a decree-holder may execute. The application in the present case by the assignee states that the amount due under the decree had been discharged by the sale by the judgment-debtors to the assignee of the mortgaged property (the decree being one on a mortgage) and asks the Court that satisfaction may be entered in respect of the whole decree, or of a portion in case it should be found that there is any valid objection to complete satisfaction being entered. The contention is that there is no provision in any section or rule contained in the Civil Procedure Code entitling the assignee to put in such an application. There is no reason why section 146 of the Civil Procedure Code should not be applicable to a petition put in by the assignee of a decree. A decree-holder may, undoubtedly, apply for recording satisfaction of the decree without putting in an application for execution. It stands to reason that his representative, the assignee, should also be entitled to do so. There is no necessity according to the Code for the assignee getting any previous order recognizing his assignment or his right to execute the decree before actually applying for execution or putting in a petition for recording satisfaction. We should certainly be prepared to hold, even apart from section 146, that an assignee of a decree would be entitled to maintain an application of the kind in question in the absence of any provision preventing him from doing so.

In Ramachandra Aiyar v. Subramanya Chettiar (1), which has been referred to on behalf of the appellant, Bhashyam Iyengar, J., says that the only application that a decree-holder can put in, is for execution of the decree under section 232, Civil Procedure Code. The question in that case was whether an assignee of a decree could put in an application merely for getting his assignment recognised. The observation of the learned Judge was that no petition for such a purpose alone is provided for in the Code. A proceeding of that sort is quite superfluous as an assignee could apply for execution without such preliminary step. The learned Judge cannot be understood to have stated that there is no application that an assignee could put in except for execution. Any other application open to a decree-holder is equally open to his assignee. This contention must, therefore, be disallowed.

The next contention is that the execution of the decree is barred by limitation. This argument is based solely on the ground that the assignment to the petitioner was in January 1906, more than three years before his present application which was in February 1910. The argument is entirely unsupportable. The date of the assignment has nothing to do with the question of limitation applicable to the execution of a decree. The various starting points determining the question of limitation are laid down in Article 182 of the Schedule to the Limitation Act. Apart from this, the present application is not one for execution. It is open to a decree-holder to certify satisfaction of the decree at anytime.

It is then contended that the finding of the Subordinate Judge that the consideration for the assignment has been fully satisfied by the petitioner is not correct. We consider it unnecessary to go into this question inasmuch as even if some portion of the consideration has not been paid, that would not make the assignment itself incomplete, or prevent the assignee from receiving payment from the judgment-debtor of the amount due under the decree.

(1) 14 M. L. J. 393.

VELAYUDAM PILLAI v. VAITHYALINGAM PILLAI.

It is perhaps necessary to refer to a further contention that the Subordinate Judge disallowed evidence to be gone into relating to two matters, viz., (1) that the petitioner was only a benamidar for one Scindia, and (2) that there was a condition precedent agreed upon between the parties before the assignment could come into operation. Neither of these questions was definitely raised in the objection statement of the appellant in answer to the petitioner's application. The Subordinate Judge was not wrong in disallowing evidence to be given on those questions. We dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 20—Payment by a donor—How far keeps debt alive against universal donee—"Party liable."

Where a person was sought to be made liable as a universal donee on a debt contracted by his donor and payments made by the latter after the gift were relied on as saving the bar of limitation:

Held, that the debt was kept alive against the donee by the payments made by the donor.

Section 20 of the Limitation Act requires that the payer should be one liable to pay the debts and provides that the result of the payment would be to give to the creditor a fresh period of limitation from the date of payment; it does not restrict the benefit accruing to the creditor with respect to his debt to his remedy against the payer alone. The debt being kept alive, the result must be to make it enforceable against any one liable for it.

The 'party liable' includes any person or persons against whom an action on the debt could be brought whether liable originally or as representing or taking the estate, real or personal, of the obligor.

Petition, under section 25 of Act IX of 1887, praying the High Court to revise the decree of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Kumbakonam, in S. C. S. No. 627 of 1910.

Mr. T. Ramasawami Iyer, for Mr. T. R. Venkatrama Sastriar, for the Petitioner.

Mr. S. Muthia Mudaliar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The petitioner in this Court instituted a Small Cause suit in the Subordinate Judge's Court of Kumbakonam for the recovery of the amount due to him on a promissory-note executed by the 1st defendant on the 22nd June 1902. The 2nd defendant was also sought to be made liable for the debt under section 128 of the Transfer of Property Act as a universal donee, she having received in gift from the 1st defendant under an instrument, dated the 29th November 1903, a house which was the only property possessed by the latter. The 2nd defendant pleaded that as against her, the suit was barred by limitation and that the payments made by the 1st defendant, subsequent to the deed of gift and relied on as saving the suit from limitation, could not keep the debt alive against her. This plea was upheld by the lower Court. It is contended before us that this view is wrong. We are of opinion that the contention must succeed. According to section 20 of the Limitation Act, "where the interest on a debt or legacy is before the expiration of the prescribed period, paid as such by the person liable to pay the debt or legacy .....a fresh period of limitation shall be computed from the time when the payment was made." The section requires that the payer should be one liable to pay the debt and provides that the result of the payment would be to give the creditor a fresh period of limitation from the date of the payment. It does not restrict the benefit accruing to the creditor with respect to his debt to his remedy against the payer alone. According to the language of the section, the debt being kept alive, the result must be to make it enforceable against any one liable for it. In Krishna Chandra Saha v. Bhairab Chandra Saha (1), Maclean, C. J., and Mitter, J., held that a payment made by a mortgagor and an acknowledgment by him after the sale of a portion of the mortgaged property would give the mortgagee a fresh period of limitation not only against the mortgagor but also the purchaser. The learned Chief Justice observed: "In our opinion, having regard to the language of the section, we do not think the action is barred as against property No 3." We may add that the principle to be deduced from the case of Maria Chinnery v. Eyre Evans (2), is applicable to the present case, namely, that "a mortgagee cannot, by the act of the parties entitled only to the equity of redemption, be deprived of his right to resort to any estate comprised in his mortgage so long as he has not released or given it up and so long as that mortgage is legally kept alive." The learned Judge was of opinion that section 21 was not applicable to the case. In Domi Lal Sahu v. Roshan Dubey (3), the same view was taken by Maclean, C.J., and Holmwood, J.; Newbould v. Smith (4), which was relied on in support of the purchaser was not followed. The learned Chief Justice observed that the case should not be followed in construing the words of section 20 of the Indian Limitation Act. In Roddam v. Morley (5), it was held that the expression "party liable" includes any person or persons against whom an action on the debt could be brought whether liable originally or as representing or taking the estate, real or personal, of the obligor. In Howard v. Lightfoot (6), the question arose whether payment of interest by the specific devisee of part of a testator's real estate, which was subject to a mortgage created by the testator, was sufficient to keep the mortgagee's right of action alive against the specific devisees of other parts of the real estate which were not subject to the mortgage. The Court of Appeal held that it was sufficient. The question was considered at great length and the principle enunciated in Roddam v. Morley (5) was followed. Vaughan Williams, L.J., observed: "I think that in principle the decision in Roddam v. Morley (5) involves this: that payment made by a person, who is not a stranger to the transaction in interest, binds those who are interested in the payment to the extent of preventing the statute running." Farwell, L. J., said : "Roddam v. Morley (5) appears to me to rest upon the joint liability of a number of persons standing in equal peril of suit and who all benefit by the discharge of all or any part of such liability." It is unnecessary for us to discuss the question at length after the full exposition of that principle in the last case. Reliance is placed for the respondent on section 21, which lays down that payment or acknowledgment made by one of several joint contractors, partners, executors or mortgagees shall not be available to prevent the statute running against any others of them. The present case does not come within this rule. It stands to reason that where several persons render themselves liable under one contract, an act done by any one of them alone should not render the others liable. But the 2nd defendant in this case derived her right from the 1st defendant and is in privity with him. The act of the 1st defendant may, therefore, be well held to bind her. See section 19, which provides that an acknowledgment is sufficient, if made, by a person through whom the person charged has derived his right. The respondent argues that a part payment, or acknowledgment is taken as evidence of a fresh promise to pay and should not, therefore, operate except against the person making the part payment or acknowledgment; but the Indian Statutes of Limitation have never proceeded on any such interpretation of the effect of a payment or acknowledgment and although the implication of a promise was the basis of the extension of the period of limitation in England under 21 Jac. I, C. 16, it is not so under 3 and 4 Will. IV, C. 42 and under the later statutes, according to which a part payment or acknowledgment is a withdrawal, by virtue of the statute, of the abrogation of the remedy and leaves the old debt still recoverable at law. See Howard v. Lightfoot (6) per Farwell, J. It is also argued that where there are several persons liable to pay a debt, the expression " the person liable to pay the debt" in section 20 must be construed as meaning all the persons liable to pay, the singular being taken to include the plural. This contention is obviously untenable as the result of such a construction would be to make the acknowledgment by one of several debtors alone useless even as against himself. The respondent's Vakil has referred to Gopal Daji v. Gopal bin Sonu (7), where Jenkins, C. J. and Ashton,

(1) 32 C. 10 7; 9 C. W. N. 868.

GANESHLAL v. DHONDIBA.

J., held that part payment of a debt by a principal debtor would not prevent limitation running against the surety. In that case, both the principal and the surety seem to have agreed to pay by the same contract. It may be that they were regarded as joint contractors. Jenkins, C.J., observed that the principal's debt was distinct from that of the surety and that the principal was not the person liable to pay the debt of the surety. The decision is hardly in accordance with Allison v. Frisby (8), although the learned Judge has observed that that case turned on a statute and considerations which have no place here. Abdur Rahim, J., followed Gopal Daji v. Gopal bin Sonu (7) in Sami Aiyangar alias Srinivasa Varathachariar v. Laxim alias Echammal (9), but the learned Judge observed:—"The respondent's Pleader has not attempted to argue that the exposition of the law in that case is not correct." The case before us is not one of principal and surety and is not governed by the above rulings. Justice requires that a person, who has received all the property of another without, it may be, the knowledge of his creditors should not be at liberty to plead the Statute of Limitation against them, whereas the donor has kept the debts alive by part-payment or acknowledgment which may have been made even before the gift. In the result, we modify the decree of the Subordinate Judge by awarding the plaintiff the amount claimed and costs against the 2nd defendant also to the extent of the property received by her from 1st defendant.

The respondent will pay his petitioner's costs of this petition.

Decree modified.

CIVIL REVISION PETITION No. 35 OF 1912.

GANESHLAL—APPLICANT

versus

DHONDIBA—NON-APPLICANT.

Central Provinces Court of Wards Act (XXIV of 1899), ss. 10, 12, 26, 27—Suit pending against defendant—Death of defendant—Representative ward of Court—Continuance of suit—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXII, rr. 1, 4—Interpretation of statutes—Statute imposing restrictions—Superfluity.

Section 12 of the Central Provinces Court of Wards Act has no application to a claim already submitted to the arbitrament of a Civil Court before publication of a notification under section 10 and still awaiting the Court's adjudication on the expiry of six months from the date of that publication.

Section 26 of the Act does not apply to a suit already filed against the predecessor-in-title of a Government ward and continued against the ward as legal representative of the original defendant in accordance with Order XXII, rule 4, Civil Procedure Code.

Statutes imposing restrictions upon the subject's right of suit should be construed strictly and such restrictions should not be extended beyond what the words used actually cover.

There is always a presumption against superfluity in a statute.

A restricted sense is the right one to give to words which cut down existing remedies.

The jurisdiction of a Civil Court is not to be construed as excluded in any case beyond the clearly expressed will of the Legislature.

Revision against the decree of the Judge, Small Cause Court, Nagpur, dated the 7th October 1911.

Mr. S. R. Pandit, for the Applicant.

Mr. M. K. Pandhye, for the Non-Applicant.

JUDGMENT.—The applicant's suit to recover money and the value of grain advanced by him with interest thereon has been dismissed by the Small Cause Court, Nagpur, under the following circumstances.

The suit was filed on the 14th December 1910, against the alleged borrower Ramchandra Rao, commonly known as Moti Baba. The first hearing was fixed for the 2nd March 1911, and the case was actually taken up the next day, the 2nd being a holiday. Ramchandra Rao had died on the 20th February 1911. After two adjournments given to enable the plaintiff to apply under rule 4, Order XXII, Civil Procedure Code, he moved the Court on the 24th April to cause the minor son of the deceased to be made a party with his mother Gunia Bai as guardian ad litem. The Court granted this application and ordered notices to issue to the son Dhondiba and to Gunia Bai. At the next hearing, it was discovered that the Court of Wards had assumed superintendence of the minor's property on the 23th February 1911. The Court of Wards was accordingly served with a notice under rule 3, Order XXII, Civil Procedure Code, and appeared by agent on the 16th September 1911,

GANESHLAL v. DHONDIBA.

The plaintiff was then ordered to furnish the Court of Wards with a copy of the plaint and the hearing was adjourned to the 30th September. On the 7th October, after hearing arguments, the Court dismissed the suit on two grounds (1) that notice had not been given to the Court of Wards as required by section 26, Central Provinces Court of Wards Act, 1899, (2) that the claim must be deemed under section 12 (2) ibid. to have been duly discharged. It should be stated here that the notice to claimants prescribed by section 12 (1) of the said Act was published on the 27th March 1911.

It is now urged on behalf of the plaintiff that of the two sections relied on by the Small Cause Court, No. 26 has no application whatever. This is conceded by the learned Pleader who represents the Court of Wards and is sufficiently obvious from the terms of the section, the very proviso to which imposes an important restriction on its operation. The suit was filed before the Court of Wards assumed seperintendence of the property left by the original defendant and could not abate by reason of the original defendant's death, inasmuch as the right to sue survived: see rule 1, Order XXII, Civil Procedure Code. Under rule 4, Order XXII, the Court was bound to make the legal representative of the deceased a party and to proceed with the suit, while section 27, Court of Wards Act, made it equally essential to name the Court of Wards as the minor's guardian ad litem. In these circumstances, it would require the clearest and most unequivocal language to justify a Court in applying to a suit already filed against the predecessor-in-title of a Government ward the provisions of section 26, Court of Wards Act. In the words of Farran, C. J., in Ranchod Haribhai v. Secretary of State for India(1), statutes imposing restrictions upon the subject's right of suit should be construed strictly and such restrictions should not be extended beyond what the words used actually cover. The same principle should, in my opinion, be applied to the right of continuing a suit already in progress.

For similar reasons, I hold that section 12, Court of Wards Act, has no application to a claim already submitted to the arbitrament of a Civil Court before publication of a notification under section 10 ibid. and still awaiting the Court's adjudication on the expiry of six months from the date of that publication. The effect of construing the former section as the lower Court has done would be to make a debt irrecoverable, although the Civil Court had not decided the suit in which its recovery was sought. Such a cutting down of the plaintiff's remedy by suit and ouster of the jurisdiction of a Court already seised of a matter cannot readily be assumed to have been intended by the Legislature, A restricted sense is the right one to give to words which cut down existing remedies and the jurisdiction of the Civil Court is not to be construed as excluded in any case beyond the clearly expressed will of the Legislature: see Tulsidas v. Virbasapa (2) and Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company v. Amraoti Municipality (3). So in Prosonno Coomar v. Koylash Chunder (4), Sir Barnes Peacock, C. J., said :—

"An act by which the jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts of Judicature is taken away must be construed strictly. The jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts of Judicature is not to be taken away by putting a construction upon an Act of the Legislature which does not clearly say that it was the intention of the Legislature to deprive such Courts of their jurisdiction." In support of this view, I may refer to section 31 (2), Punjab Court of Wards Act, 1903, which provides as follows :—

"On the publication of a notice under section 26, all suits and all proceedings in execution of any decree against a ward or as affecting any property under the superintendence of the Court of Wards then pending in any Civil Court shall be stayed until the plaintiff or the decree-holder files a certificate that the claim has been notified in accordance with section 26." Section 26, Punjab Court of Wards Act, corresponds closely with sub-section (1) and the proviso to sub-section (2) of section 12 in the Central Provinces Act, while the rest of sub-section (2) in section 12 of the latter Act finds a counterpart in section 29 of the Punjab Act. There is always a presumption against superfluity in a statute: see Damodar Das v. Gokal Chand (5). If then section 31 (2), Punjab Court of Wards Act, is not insignificant, the suit contemplated therein would, in the absence of that provision, have to proceed in accordance with law, being unaffected by the publication of a notice calling for claims.

Moreover, there is in this case a special reason for declining to allow the Court of Wards to take shelter behind such an arbitrary provision as that in section 12 (2) of the Central Provinces Act. A copy of the plaint must have been delivered to its agent on or within a few days of the 16th September 1911, and the period of six months prescribed in the notice published on the 27th March 1911 did not expire till the 27th September following. The plaint furnished the Court of Wards with all necessary particulars of the plaintiff's claim and the documents relied on to support it were open to inspection under this Court's Civil Circular No. III-7 along with the rest of the record in the suit.

The decree of the Small Cause Court is set aside and the case is remanded to that Court with a direction to try it on the merits. Costs in this Court will be paid by the non-applicant (defendant). I allow Rs. 10 as Pleader's fee. Other costs already incurred will be costs in the cause.

Case remanded.

PARAKAL GOPAL MENON AND ANOTHER —RESPONDENTS.

Lease—Claim for rent—Advance of kattakonam to lessor by lessee—Assignment by lessor of his reversion —Kattakonam, whether can be set-off—Assignor or assignee liable for kattakanom.

On the execution of a lease deed, the lessee advanced a certain sum as kattakanom to the lessor, whereby the interest due on the latter was to be deducted from the rent due every year and the principal amount of the kattakonam was re-payable at the termination of the lease, which was a lease from year to year. Soon after the lease, the lessor assigned his reversion to a third party. The lessor then sued for rent:

Held, (1) that the lessee could not set off the kattakanom as against plaintiff's claim;

(2) that the tenant was entitled to proceed for his kattakanom against either assignor or assignee and;

(3) that in the absence of a special agreement, the right to enforce the kattakanom did not accrue due on the date of the assignment; but on the termination of the tenancy.

Second appeal against the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Palghat, in A S. No. 740 of 1907, preferred against that of the District Munsif of Alatur, in O. S. No. 156 of 1906.

The Hon'ble Mr. J. L. Rosario, and Mr. C. V. Ananthakrishna Iyer, for the Appellants.

Messrs. T. R. Ramachandra Aiyar and V Ryru Nambiyar, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The plaintiff sues for rent due on a lease executed to him by the defendant. Sometime after the lease, he assigned his reversion to a third party. The defendant had advanced kattakanom to the plaintiff. It has been found by the lower Courts that when an advance of this nature is made by a tenant, the interest due on the amount every year is deducted from the amount due for the year and the principal amount of the kattakanom is re-payable at the termination of the lease. Although the original lease was only for one year, it is not denied that the defendant, on the termination of the year, became a tenant from year to year. The tenancy has not been put an end to. Prima facie, therefore, the defendant would not be entitled to claim his kattakanom at present or set off the amount of it against the amount claimed by the plaintiff for two years. The District Munsif did not permit him to make the set off, but the Subordinate Judge has allowed him to do so. It appears that the assignee has reason to anticipate difficulties with respect to the adjustment of this kattakanom reserved in his hands in the settlement of accounts between him and the assignor's family with respect to the consideration due for the assignment, and that, for that reason, the tenant is disinclined to enforce his claim to the kattakanom against the assignee and would prefer to enforce it against the assignor himself. He, no doubt, has the option to decide whether he would proceed against the assignor or assignee, but this does not affect the question, when re-payment is due to the defendant of the kattakanom amount. It was not alleged by the defendant that there was any special agreement in the case making the kattakanom re-payable if the lessor made an assignment of his reversionary right; and no authority has been cited in support of the argument that, if the tenant chooses to proceed against the assignor himself instead of against the assignee, the right to re-payment would accrue when the assignment is made. We must, therefore, set aside the Sub-Judge's decree. The plaintiff would be entitled to recover the rent without deducting the kattakanom amount, but only the interest due on it for the two years in question. It is also argued by the appellant that the plaintiff is entitled to the commutation value of the paddy rent due to him as it stood at the date of the suit. The plaintiff, as we read the plaint, does not seem to have claimed payment of paddy in kind. His claim was for a sum of money as damages for non-payment of rent. Whatever doubt there may be about the construction of the plaint, it is quite clear that when the Munsif gave the plaintiff a decree only for damages, he did not appeal against it claiming payment of paddy instead of money. On the footing that the plaintiff was entitled only to damages for the defendant's breach of contract, there can be no doubt that the damages must be computed as they stood at the time of breach of the contract. The plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to the value of paddy only according to the rate prevalent at the end of the years 1080 and 1081 respectively. The amount found by the Subordinate Judge is accepted. It is contended by the respondent that the original defendant being dead and the lease having been taken by him for his own benefit, the decree against the present respondents, who have been placed on the record as his representatives, should be only against the assets of the deceased Gopala Menon. It does not appear from anything in the record, whether the lease was taken by him in his individual capacity and whether the suit was against him only as an individual and not as representing the tarwad. If the lease was taken by him on behalf of the tarwad, then the rent would be payable out of the tarwad property in the hands of the present respondents. The form of the decree may be that the defendants should pay rent out of the assets of Gopala Menon in their hands, such assets comprising the tarwad property in their hands, if the lease was taken by the deceased on behalf of the tarwad. The parties will pay and receive proportionate costs throughout. It is unnecessary to pass separate orders on the memorandum of objections.

SADASHEO—RESPONDENT.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908*), s.* 14—Time requisite for obtaining copy—Copy applied by post—Period between completion of copy and delivery to applicant —Central Provinces Courts Act (II of 1904*), s.* 8 (1) (c), rules under.

A decree was passed by a Munsif on 12th May 1911. On 15th May, defendant applied by post for copy of Munsif's judgment and decree.

The application did not reach the office till after it had closed for the vacation and, consequently, the application was treated as received on 16th June when the Courts re-opened after vacation. The copy was ready on 3rd July but it was not despatched by post to the defendant, as the latter took delivery on 4th July in person. The appeal was filed in the District Judge's Court the same day:

Held, (1) that the 3rd and 4th July should be included as part of the time requisite for obtaining the copy;

(2) that the appeal was within time.

Krishna v. Balia, 8 N. L. R. 11; 14 Ind. Cas. 403, followed.

Appeal against the decree of the District Judge, Bhandara, dated the 12th August 1911, confirming that of the Munsif, Sakoli, dated the 12th May 1911.

Rao Bahadur V. R. Pandit, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—This second appeal arises out of a suit in which the plaintiff's claim was partially decreed by the Munsif, Sakoli, on the 12th May 1911. The defendants, or one of them, applied on the 15th May by post for copy of the Munsif's judgment and decree, but the application did not reach the office of the District Judge, Bhandara, till after it had closed for the vacation and in accordance with practice, the application was treated as received on the 16th June when the Courts re-opened after the vacation. The copy was ready on the 3rd July, but it was not despatched by post to the applicant, as the defendant Paga took delivery on the 4th idem in person and himself filed an appeal in the District Judge's Court the same day. That appeal was dismissed as time-barred on the ground that the latest day on which it could be filed was that on which the copy was ready.

The District Judge correctly held that the right of appeal was still subsisting on the 16th June and that the appellant was consequently entitled to exclude the time requisite for obtaining the copy then applied for. The question raised here is, whether the 4th July should not be excluded as well as the 3rd idem seeing that the copy was not despatched by post on the latter day. This I would answer in the affirmative on considerations similar to those forming the basis of the decision in Krishna v. Balia (1). Paga has filed an affidavit in this Court stating that he attended the District Judge's office on the 3rd July and asked for the copy but was told it was not ready. I see no reason to disbelieve this statement, but even if it be rejected, the fact remains that the office was not in a position to despatch the copy by post on the 3rd July. As in the case above cited, there was no delay resulting from any want of action on the applicant's part, the decree of the District Judge dismissing Paga's appeal is accordingly set aside and the case is remanded to his Court with a direction to re admit the appeal under its original number in the register and to decide it on the merits. The usual certificate for refund of the Court-fee on the memorandum of second appeal will be granted. Other costs here and below will abide the event.

Case remanded.

Appeal from the judgment of Beaman, J., reported at 15 Ind. Cas. 950; 14 Bom. L. R. 511.

Mr. Robertson, (with him Messrs. Talyarkhan and Gupte), for the Appellants.

Mr. Shortt (with him Mr. Desai), for the 1st Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The material facts are that Balkrishna, a judgment-creditor of Mahomed Mehdi, attached on the 21st of December 1895 the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor in certain securities for money held by the Receiver in the suit for the administration of the estate of Tharia Topan, the father of the judgment-debtor. On the 6th of January 1896, the judgment-debtor assigned the whole of his right, title and interest in the estate of his father to his mother, the defendant in this suit. In the year 1898, the present plaintiffs brought Suit No. 566 against the judgment-debtor, Mahomed Mehdi and obtained a decree on the 16th of September 1898. In 1899, Mahomed Mehdi took the benefit of the JETHA BHIMA AND CO. v. LADY JANBAI.

Insolvent Act but after a time his petition was dismissed. A fresh petition was filed in February 1903 and he was again adjudged insolvent but has not yet obtained his final discharge. In 1904, the present plaintiffs levied an attachment upon the same property as had already been attached, viz., the right, title and interest of Mahomed Mehdi in the securities held by the Receiver in the administration suit relating to his father's estate. On the 15th of October 1907, the judgment debt owing to Balkrishna was satisfied and his attachment was raised. Subsequently Lady Janbai, the assignee of the judgment-debtor under the assignment of the 6th of January 1896, applied to the Judge in Chambers and got the present plaintiffs' attachment raised and it is in consequence of the order raising that attachment that this suit has been instituted.

The plaintiffs pray that it may be declared that the property described in the schedule to the plaint to the extent of the interest of Mahomed Mehdi Tharia Topan at the date of the several attachments is liable to be attached and sold in execution of the plaintiffs' decree.

By reason of the law of limitation, the plaintiffs are unable to challenge the assignment in favour of Lady Janbai upon any ground except that it is void under the provisions of section 276 of the Civil Procedure Code of 1882. For the purpose of this suit, therefore, the assignment must be considered to be a bona fide assignment of the property of the judgment-debtor to Lady Janbai made in January 1896.

Now, in that year, the plaintiffs were not attaching creditors, nor had they even filed a suit against Mahomed Mehdi. It is said, however, that the assignment was by virtue of the provisions of section 276 of the old Code void against the judgment-creditor Balkrishna who had attached on the 21st of December 1895 and that the claim of the present plaintiffs was a claim enforceable under the attachment of Balkrishna, and, therefore, the assignment in favour of Lady Janbai is void against the present plaintiffs. Balkrishna's attachment has been got rid of under the provisions of section 275 of the Code, the section immediately preceding section 276, upon which the plaintiffs based their claim. Section 275 provides that if the amount decreed with costs and all charges and expenses resulting from the attachment of any property be paid into Court, or if satisfaction of the decree be otherwise made through the Court, or if the decree is set aside or reversed, an order shall be issued, on the application of any person interested in the property, for the withdrawal of the attachment. In accordance with the provisions of that section, the attachment of Balkrishna was withdrawn on the 15th of October 1907.

The question now is whether, although that attachment is non-existent, the plaintiffs' claim is a claim enforceable under it. The argument, advanced on behalf of the plaintiffs, is that under section 295, a creditor who has applied to the Court for execution of a decree for money against the same judgment-debtor and has not obtained satisfaction thereof, shall be entitled to a rateable distribution, with the other judgment-creditors in the same position, of all the assets realised by sale or otherwise in execution of the decree; and it was held by Mr. Justice Telang, in Sorabji Edulji Warden v. Govind Ramji (1), that claims for rateable distribution of assets under section 295 are claims enforceable under an attachment within the meaning of section 276. That decision has received the mark of Legislative approval since the introduction of the Code of 1908, because section 64, which is to the same effect as section 276 of the old Code, explains that for the purposes of this section claims enforceable under an attachment include claims for the rateable distribution of assets. Under section 295, the essential condition of enforcement of claims for rateable distribution was that there should be assets realised by sale or otherwise in execution of a decree. That was a condition which was satisfied in the case of Sorabji Edulji Warden v. Govind Ramji (1) but it is not so in the present case. There are, in our opinion, no assets realised by sale or otherwise in execution of a decree which can be divided rateably amongst the creditors who have applied for the execution of their decrees, and, therefore, the plaintiffs are not the possessors of a claim enforceable under section 295 or as a consequence enforceable under the attachment within the meaning of section 276. The assignment to Lady Janbai is, therefore, not void as against the plaintiffs.

(1) 16 B. 91.

We, therefore, agree with the lower Court in thinking that the plaintiffs' case fails and must be dismissed with costs. We affirm the decree of the lower Court and dismiss the appeal with costs.

VISHWANATH PRABHURAM VAIDYA —RESPONDENT.

Insurance policy—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882 as amended by Act II of 1900), s. 130 (1)—Deposit of policy—Assignment by writing—Deposit by way of security—Priority.

A. assigned in writing a policy of insurance in the form of an absolute assignment to B., though it was intended only to be by way of security. Previously to this, A. had merely deposited the same policy with C. by way of security for debts already existing as well as for future debts.

The deposit was not accompanied by anything in writing:

Held, (1) that C., with whom the policy was merely deposited, acquired no title whatever therein or in its proceeds;

(2) that B. acquired an absolute right to the proceeds of the policy.

Section 130 (1) of the Transfer of Property Act covers actionable claims and transfers by way of security as well as absolute transfers.

The principle of the English law that "a deposit of a document of title without either writing or a word of mouth" creates 'in equity' a charge upon the property to which the document relates to the extent of the interest of the person who makes the deposit, does not apply in India in view of the positive language of section 130.

Appeal from a judgment and decree of the High Court of Bombay, dated April 3rd, 1911,* reversing a judgment and decree of the same High Court in Original Suit No. 976 of 1909†, dated June 23rd, 1910.

FACTS.—One Dwarka Das Dharamsey deposited in 1904 with Vishwanath Vaidya, plaintiff in this suit, a life policy for Rs. 30,000, issued by the London and Lancashire Life Assurance Company, by way of security for monies owing by him as well as for debts to be incurred in the future. The said Dwarka Das had, by a deed of assignment, transferred the aforesaid policy to Mulraj Khatau, the defendant in this suit, which was presentd to the Life Assurance Company on the 27th of August 1909 and duly registered then. Prior to the assignment of the said policy, Mulraj Khatau had made inquiries about the life policy but was told that it was missing. On the 28th of August 1909, the said Dwarka Das committed suicide. Then the question arose as to who would be entitled to the proceeds of the policy on the life of Dwarka Das, that is to say, whether Vishwanath Vaidya, by virtue of deposit of the said policy, or Mulraj Khatau by virtue of assignment.

On October 16th, 1909, Vishwanath Vaidya instituted a suit in the High Court of Bombay, Original Side, against the Insurance Company as well as against Mulraj Khatau praying for a declaration that he had a charge or lien on the said policy. The Insurance Company then paid the amount into Court to be paid to the one who established his claim, and retired from the suit. The judgment of the High Court (Original Side) was given on the 23rd of June 1910, by which the defendant Mulraj was held entitled to the proceeds of the policy as a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the plaintiffs' claim. From this judgment the plaintiffs appealed to the High Court (Appellate Side), which reversed the judgment, in favour of defendant on the ground that both the claimants had equal equitable rights to the deposited money and that the claims of the plaintiff being prior in date prevailed.

Mr. Younger, K. C., and Mr. Lowndes, on behalf of the Appellant (defendant), contended that under the Indian law, the bare deposit of a policy created no right or interest whatever as was clearly laid down by section 130 of the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882) as amended by Act II of 1900. If notwithstanding the terms of the said section, the respondent could acquire by the deposit a charge upon the said policy monies, the appellant had nevertheless gained priority over such charge by reason of his having first given notice to the Company of his said assignment.

Messrs. De Gruyther, K. C., and Brown, on behalf of the respondent, contended that the assignment in question was not taken in good faith without notice of Respondent's rights, who was entitled in priority to the present appellant whether or not the appellant had notice of his rights. [LORD MOULTON:—Section 130 prevents you getting it; you must get over section 130], Section 130 refers to absolute assignment and not to a charge.

Mr. Younger replied.

JUDGMENT.

LORD MOULTON.—The question in this appeal is as to whether the appellant or the respondent is entitled to a sum of Rs. 29,426-14-0 now standing in Court to abide the result of the action. It represents the net proceeds of a policy of insurance on the life of Dwarkadas Dharamsey, who died on 28th August 1909.

The appellant bases his claim on an assignment in writing under the hand of Dwarkadas Dharamsey, dated the 13th of August 1909. It is in form an absolute assignment, and was, according to the evidence, given under pressure from the appellant to whom Dwarkadas Dharamsey was then indebted in a much larger sum. The validity of the assignment is, therefore, established. It may well be that although absolute in form, it was intended to be only by way of security so as to be subject to a right of redemption, but this does not affect the rights of the parties under the circumstances of the present case.

The respondent bases his claim upon a deposit of the policy with him by Dwarkadas Dharamsey undoubtedly with the intention of its acting as security for the re-payment of a debt then owing by him to the respondent. This deposit was made in November 1904 and was unaccompanied by anything in writing. The particular debt owing at the time was subsequently paid off, but in, and subsequent to, April 1909, Dwarkadas Dharamsey again became indebted to the respondent, and it is claimed that the deposit was made on the terms that it should act as security not only for the then existing debt but for any indebtedness that might subsequently arise. Whether or not this contention of fact is established, is not in their Lordships' opinion material.

The decision of the matter in issue turns entirely on the interpretation of section 130, sub-section 1, of the Transfer of Property Act, 1900. It is as follows:—

"The transfer of an actionable claim shall be effected only by the execution of an instrument in writing signed by the transferor or his duly authorised agent, and shall be complete and effectual upon the execution of such instrument, and thereupon all the rights and remedies of the transferor, whether by way of damages or otherwise, shall vest in the transferee, whether such notice of the transfer as is hereinafter provided be given or not:

Provided that every dealing with the debt or other actionable claim by the debtor or other person, from or against whom the transferor would, but for such instrument of transfer as aforesaid, have been entitled to recover or enforce such debt or other actionable claim, shall (save where the debtor or other person is a party to the transfer, or has received express notice thereof as hereinafter provided) be valid as against such transfer."

It is submitted that the right to the monies becoming due under the policy is an actionable claim. Their Lordships are also of opinion that the section covers transfers by way of security as well as absolute transfers. If any doubt existed on either of these two points, it would be set at rest by the second illustration to the section which is given in the Act.

In the present case, the respondent bases his claim on a deposit of the policy and not under a written transfer, and claims that this creates a charge on the policy. The section specifically enacts that such a proceeding shall not have any such effect; such a charge can only be created by a written document. It follows that the respondent acquired no right whatever to the policy or its proceeds by reason of the deposit.

The appellant, on the other hand, claims under an instrument in writing conforming in all respects to the provisions of the section. He, therefore, acquired by the execution of that instrument an absolute right to the proceeds of the policy.

MAHOMAD MEHDI FAYA THARIA v. SAKINABAI.

The decision of the Court below was, therefore, erroneous. The error arose from the learned Judges not having appreciated that the positive language of the section precluded the application in India of the principles of English law on which they base their decision.

Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal be allowed, and that it be declared that the appellant be entitled to the monies standing in Court, and that the respondent pay the costs in the Courts below as well as the costs of this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

Limitation—Restitution of conjugal rights, suit for—Demand and refusal—Failure to bring suit for two years after refusal while old Limitation Act in force—Suit brought after fresh demand and refusal while new Act in force—Limitation Act (XV of 1877), Sch. II, Art. 35—Limitation Act (IX of 1903)—General Clauses Act (X of 1897), s. 6.

A., the wife of B., left her husband in 1896 and lived with her mother since then. In 1906, B. sent to A. a formal demand to return to him; she equally formally refused to do so.

On 16th June 1911, B. sent to A. a fresh notice to return to his house and allow him to exercise the conjugal rights. As the notice was not complied with, B. sued A. on 20th June 1911 for restitution of conjugal rights:

Held, (1) that the suit was barred;

(2) that B.'s right to sue had become barred by virtue of Article 35 of the Limitation Act, 1877; and

(3) that the right could not be revived by the passing of the Limitation Act, 1903, which repealed Article 35 of the old Act.

Dhanjibhoy Bomanji v. Hirabai, 25 B 644; 3 Bom. L. R. 371, (F. B.) and Vinayak Govind v. Babaji, 4 B. 230, followed.

Appeal from the following judgment of HEATON, J.—There is a point of limitation in this case and the parties are agreed, the defendant having given an undertaking not to marry pending the final disposal of this litigation, that this point of limitation shall be decided first.

Plaintiff and defendant are husband and wife. The wife either voluntarily or by compulsion, it does not for the present purpose matter which, left her husband in 1896 and has since lived with her mother. In 1906, the plaintiff sent the defendant a formal demand to return to him; she equally formally refused to do so. Two years elapsed during which the plaintiff did not bring a suit for restitution of conjugal rights. By the operation of the Limitation Act of 1877, Article 35, and the ruling in the Full Bench decision of this Court in Dhanjibhoy Bomanji v. Hirabai (1), a suit brought thereafter by the plaintiff for the restitution of conjugal rights was barred. But some time after the two years had elapsed, on 1st January 1909, the new Limitation Act of 1903 came into force. This suit was then brought and by the provisions of that Act considered alone it is in time.

Does the new Act apply or is the bar created by the old Act still operative? The defendant's Counsel gives broadly two reasons for holding that the bar is still operative. These two reasons are: (1) that a decided case of this Court so rules; and (2) that the wife had acquired a right to freedom from molestation from suits of this kind, a right to refuse her body to her husband and that this right is of the kind dealt with by section 6 of the General Clauses Act and, consequently, remains unaffected by the new law of limitation. The decided case is that of Vinayak Govind v. Babaji (2). A suit for money was brought which had become barred by the Limitation Act of 1859, when the Act of 1871 came into force. The suit was brought after the later Act became operative: and under that Act taken alone was in time. That Act, however, was held not to apply and the suit was held to be barred by limitation. Melville, J., said: "I have no doubt that it could not be revived by the passing of that Act." I am not aware that this decision has been overruled and I am bound by it unless it can be distinguished. I do not feel able to distinguish it. No doubt there is a great difference in the facts, but the rule, on which the decision in Vinayak Govind's case (2) proceeded, is that a claim once barred by limitation cannot be revived. This, if it be a rule, is as applicable to the present case as to any other.

It is true that the Calcutta decisions are not to the same but to a contrary effect as appears from the cases of Ram Chunder Ghosaul v. Juggutmonmohiney Dabee (3) and Mohesh Lal v. Busunt Kumaree (4). The Madras view is the same as that in Calcutta. Nevertheless, I am bound by the Bombay decision.

But whilst feeling myself to be bound by that decision, as this case is almost certain to be the subject of an appeal, it is advisable for me to say something on the principles referred to in argument. I may say at once that I do not understand the principle on which the decided case already quoted is based unless it be that the rules of limitation defining the periods within which suits may be brought, create and annul certain rights. But if this be the principle, I am driven to the conclusion that it is erroneous. The rights are, to sue or not to be sued, and not to sue within or not to be sued after a particular time. The time is a matter of procedure only. The right to sue or not to be sued is not the proper subject of a law of limitation and is not dealt with by such law or rather by such part of it as prescribes the periods after which a suit will not be heard by the Courts. This is very fully and clearly brought out by the observations at pages 35—38 of the judgment in Her Highness Ruckmaboye v. Lulloobhoy Moottichund (5). It is also clearly indicated in the recent case of Rex v. Chandra Dharma (6), and reference may be made to Maxwell, 4th Edn., pages 338—340. Other cases have been referred to, but it is unnecessary here to comment on them: the principle appears to me to be clear. Applying the principle to this case, the matter, as I apprehend it, stands thus: the plaintiff and defendant are husband and wife: their rights, as regards each other, are based on this relationship. They include a right to conjugal or marital union. That right does not disappear; it is not annulled because one party or the other is unable to sue for it. An instance of this will be found in the very recent case of Krishna Iyer v. Balammal (7). The period within which a suit may be brought is not a matter of right but of procedure. The word 'right', as used in section 6 of the General Clauses Act, means broadly, for the purposes of this case, a right to sue or a right which may be the subject of a suit not a claim (mis-called a right in its strict sense) to a particular period within which to sue or to be sued.

As there is a right to sue, I cannot, it is true, see anything illogical in describing immunity from being sued as a right also. But the word 'right' has many meanings. The authorities show, or seem to me to show, that it is not the intention of the law to regard as a right, mere immunity from suit brought about by the operation of the law of limitation. This immunity, except as otherwise specifically provided, is, I apprehend, in law a mere consequence of our legal procedure, not a right in itself. The distinction is a fine one, but it is there. Section 6 of the General Clauses Act seems to me to refer to real rights, immunities, etc, and not to such as are mere consequences of our law of procedure.

In this case, the defendant's alleged immunity from suit arises exclusively from the former law of limitation and from that part of it which regulated procedure, namely, that part which fixed the period within which a suit could be brought. That is all I need say on the general principle and I will only add a few words to indicate what is to be gathered from the written law of this country.

The present Limitation Act applies to all suits filed after it came into operation unless the contrary appears. Therefore, it applies to this suit unless the contrary appears. Did the former Act extinguish the right to sue? If it did, then by reason of section 6 of the General Clauses Act that right is not revived, and there is a case where the contrary does appear. Now, by the former Act, provision was implicitly made for the creation and for the extinction of certain rights by the mere lapse of time (see sections 26 and 28). Impliedly, therefore, where these sections did not operate, the right was not extinguished by lapse of time. In the old Act itself, therefore, there is no support for the proposition that the right was extinguished. The present Act, by sections 30 and 31, makes special provision for certain cases in which there are differences between the Schedules of the old and the new Act. No provision is made for a case like the present. Impliedly, therefore, the Schedule to the present Act applies and that Schedule does not provide a bar. Moreover, the present Act, like the former, does in section 23 contain a provision which affects cases like the present, and it seems to me that provision must apply. To sum up: the present law of limitation in terms governs the present case and by implication does not contemplate that its application to this case should be modified by anything contained in the former Act. Therefore, I think, the present Act does apply and that the present suit is in time, but I am of opinion that authority, which I cannot overrule, compels me, sitting as a single Judge, to decide otherwise and I decree that the suit be dismissed with costs.

The plaintiff contended that the letter of refusal sent by defendant's attorneys was not authorized by her and did not represent her wishes and, therefore, was not a real refusal. I can see no good reason to suppose this contention is sound. The attorney's managing clerk has given a clear and credible account of the matter and I believe him. The defendant herself was not put into the witness-box to depose on this point. That would be a serious defect had there not been good reason for it; but there was. Plaintiff's Counsel had intimated that he would have to cross-examine on many of the disputed facts of the case in connection with this letter of refusal. The purpose of the defendant's Counsel, in desiring a decision on the point of limitation, was, if possible, to avoid publicity in respect of the disputed facts. Therefore, after the intimation of the plaintiff's Counsel as to the line of his cross-examination, the former, to be consistent, was bound to keep his client out of the witness-box at that stage of the case. I do not think, therefore, that her absence from the box raises any doubt that the letter of refusal really represented her wishes.

The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Jafferbhai Rahimtoolla (with him Mr. Jinnah), for the Appellant.

Mr. Jardine (with him Mr. Weldon), for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT—The plaintiff was married to the defendant in 1894. In 1896, the defendant left him. On the 11th of July, the plaintiff sent her a notice demanding restitution of conjugal rights. This demand was refused by the defendant on 19th of July. The plaintiff took no action for more than two years after this refusal. Consequently under the provisions of section 4 and Article 35 of the Limitation Act of 1877, any suit for restitution was liable to dismissal. The particular form of remedy was barred even though the plaintiff's right to the services of his wife remained. This is the effect of the decision of the Full Bench in Dhanjibhoy Bonanji v. Hirabai (1). On the 1st of January 1909, however, the Limitation Act of 1877 was repealed and superseded by the Limitation Act of 1908. In that Act, Article 35 of the Act of 1877 has not been re-produced. It contains no Article prescribing a special period for suits for restitution.

On the 16th of June 1911, the plaintiff sent to the defendant a fresh notice to return to his house and allow him the exercise of conjugal rights. As the notice was not complied with, this suit was filed on the 20th of June 1911 for restitution. The question is, whether this remedy is now open to the plaintiff or whether it has become barred by the expiry, during the currency of the Act of 1877, of two years since the refusal of the defendant in 1896.

The learned Judge, considering himself bound by the decision of this Court in Vinayak Govind v. Babaji (2) that a remedy which had become barred could not be revived by the passing of a new Limitation Act, dismissed the plaintiff's suit. In our opinion, his decision must be affirmed. Section 6 of the General Clauses Act of 1897 provides that the repeal of an enactment shall not revive anything not in force or existing at the time when the repeal takes effect, or affect the previous operation of any enactment so repealed. These provisions couched in general terms have reference to all repealing Acts and produce the result effected specially for the purpose of limitation by section 2 of the Limitation Act of 1877, which provided that nothing in that Act contained should be deemed to revive any right to sue barred under the Act of 1871 or any enactment thereby repealed. The Judicial Committee, in Mohesh Narain Munshi v. Taruck Nath Moitra (8), say with reference to section 2 of the Act of 1877: "It is clear that on the 1st of April 1873, the plaintiff's suit was barred by limitation under the Act of 1871 and the Act of 1877 could not revive the plaintiff's right so barred—a point which was indeed decided in regard to the Limitation Acts of 1859 and 1871 in the case of Appasami Odayar v. Subramanya Odayar (9)."

On behalf of the plaintiff, reference was made to Rex v. Chandra Dharma (6), and this case also appears to have raised doubts in the mind of the trying Judge; but as pointed out by Channell, J., in all the cases before the Court of King's Bench, "the defendants were, at the time the Act came into operation, liable to prosecution and an alteration of the time within which they might be prosecuted, whether by extension or diminution, was a matter of procedure only. If the time under the old Act had expired before the new Act came into operation, the question would have been entirely different." In the case now before us, the right of suit was barred long before the new Limitation Act came into force; it is not revived by the repeal of Article 35.

We affirm the decree of the lower Court and dismiss the appeal with costs.

*Estoppel—Denial of mortgagee's right by representatives of mortgagors—*Waqf property—Simple mortgage—Adverse possession against mortgagor, whether extinguishes mortgage security.

Although the representatives of a mortgagor are estopped from denying the mortgagee's right, yet it is open to them as mutawallis to plead that the property was waqf and that the mortgage was, therefore, void.

Gulzar Ali v. Fida Ali, 6 A. 24, distinguished.

After the execution of a simple mortgage, a trespasser ousted the mortgagor from the possession of the property:

JUDGMENT.

KARAMAT HUSAIN, J.—The facts of the case are these:—Kudrat Shah and others, the predecessors-in-title of defendants Nos. 2 and 3, made a simple mortgage of two plots of land with houses and trees, one of which is near Taksal and the other near Kabir Chaura, in favour of the plaintiff, on the 5th of July 1875. They again mortgaged the same property to the same mortgagee on the 12th of March 1878. One Subhan, alleging himself to be the son-in-law of Kudrat Shah, on the 15th of September 1893, sold the land near Taksal to Musammat Biraiya, who made a mortgage of it to Babu Sital Prasad and Bisheshar Prasad on the 22nd of December 1893. They obtained a decree on their mortgage on the 7th of November 1900, in execution of which the land was purchased by Ram Dei, who built on it a house with a cost of about Rs. 6,000.

The plaintiff on his two mortgages sued on the 4th of May 1910, claiming Rs. 1,628-6-3. Defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3, as mutawallis, pleaded that the property near Kabir Chaura was waqf and that the mortgage of it was void. Ram Dei pleaded that the suit relating to the land near Taksal was barred by limitation.

The first Court dismissed the suit. Regarding the property near Kabir Chaura, the dismissal was based on the unlawfulness of the mortgage of waqf property. Regarding the property near Taksal, it was based on limitation. The lower Appellate Court affirmed the decree of the first Court.

In second appeal, two points are taken :—

(1) The representatives of the mortgagors cannot question the validity of the mortgage, and (2) the adverse possession of a trespasser against a mortgagor is not, in every case, adverse to his simple mortgagee. On the first point, I am of opinion that it is open to the representatives of the mortgagors as mutawallis to plead that the property was waqf, and that the mortgage of it was void. They could be estopped from raising such a plea as representatives of the mortgagors, but as mutawallis they cannot be regarded as the representatives of the mortgagors. When the law renders the mortgage of waqf property void, the mortgagee of such property is presumed to know the law, and if he takes a mortgage of such property, he does so at his own risk. Gulzar Ali v. Fida Ali (1) has no application. There a trustee, representing the property as his own, mortgaged it, and when the mortgagee had got a decree, the trustee sued to recover the property. In these circumstances, the trustee was held to be estopped.

There is a conflict of authority on the second point, and before going into the case-law on the subject, I deem it fit to set forth the conclusion to which the legal principles lead. Adverse possession in the nature of things is impossible against a person who has no right to possession and hence the legal maxim "Contra non valentem agere nulla currit præscriptio" (Prescription does not run against a person who is unable to act). On the same foundation rests the exposition of law by Parke, B., quoted by the Lords of the Privy Council in the Trustees, Executors and Agency Company v. Short (2) as follows:—"In the latter case, Smith v. Lloyd (3), which was decided in 1854, Parke, B., in giving the judgment of the Court, says:—

'We are clearly of opinion that the Statute applies not to cases of want of actual possession by the plaintiff, but to cases where he has been out of, and another in, possession for the prescribed time. There must be both absence of possession by the person who has the right, and actual possession by the another, whether adverse or not, to be protected, to bring the case within the Statute.'"

Their Lordships re-affirm the opinion of Parke, B., in Secretary of State for India v. Krishnamoni Gupta (4). They remark:—

"In the case of the Trustees, Executors and Agency Company v. Short (2), it was laid down by this Board that 'if a person enters upon the land of another and holds possession for a time, and then, without having acquired a title under the statute, abandons possession, the rightful owner on the abandonment is in the same position in all respects as he was before the intrusion took place, and the opinion of Parke, B., is there quoted that there must be both absence of possession by the person who has the right and actual possession by another to bring the case within the Statute."

On the same principle proceeds Ismdar Khan v. Ahmad Husain (5). The portion of the judgment bearing on the point is as follows:—

"As the defendants wrongfully dispossessed the mortgagees and themselves took possession, their possession was undoubtedly adverse to the mortgagees, and as this adverse possession has continued for a longer period than twelve years, the right of the mortgagees has, under section 28 of the Limitation Act, become extinct and has vested in the defendants. The possession of the mortgagees was not full proprietary possession but was possession of a limited nature. It is this possession of which they were deprived by the defendants; so that the adverse possession of the defendant was also of a limited character and had the effect of extinguishing the limited interests of the mortgagees and vesting those interests in the defendants. The possession of the defendants was not, therefore, adverse to the plaintiff. There may be cases in which adverse possession against the mortgagee would also be adverse possession against the mortgagor, for example, where the mortgagor is entitled to immediate possession or where the possession of the trespasser is coupled with a denial of the title of the mortgagor. But as held in Muhammad Husain v. Mul Chand (6), following Chinto v. Janki (7), possession obtained by the ouster of a mortgagee in possession is not necessarily adverse to the mortgagor also. In the present case, it has been found that the title of the plaintiff was never denied by the defendants. It is also an admitted fact that when the defendants took possession, the persons entitled to remain in possession were the mortgagees and not the mortgagors, and that the mortgage was unsatisfied. As the plaintiff had, therefore, no right to immediate possession, the defendants cannot be held to have been in possession adversely to the plaintiff. As observed by Mr. Justice Markby in Bejoy Chunder Banerjee v. Kally Prosonno Mookerjee (8), by adverse possession is meant possession by a person holding the land on his own behalf or on behalf of some person other than the true owner, the true owner having a right to immediate possession. We are, therefore, unable to accept the defendants' contention that their possession is adverse to the plaintiff and that the claim is time-barred."

A mortgage under the Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882) is "the transfer of an interest in specific immoveable property for the purpose of securing the payment of money." In a simple mortgage, therefore, an interest in the property mortgaged is carved out of the aggregate interests symbolised by the legal term "ownership" and vested in the mortgagee and the residue of those interests remains in the mortgagor. This residue may be called "the equity of redemption with possession." A mortgagee under a simple mortgage, by virtue of the interest in the property mortgaged which he acquires, has the right to bring it to sale for the realisation of the mortgage-debt. (Section 67, Transfer of Property Act). Such a mortgage gives him no right to take possession of the property mortgaged. The legal position of the parties to a simple mortgage is as follows. The mortgagor owns the equity of redemption with possession and is in possession of the property as a limited owner. The mortgagee owns an interest in the property which entitles him to have the property sold by Court for the satisfaction of the mortgage-debt but has no right to enter into possession of the property. In these circumstances, if a trespasser ousts the mortgagor after the execution of the simple mortgage, he can take possession of what belongs to the mortgagor and can hold adversely to him to the extent of his limited interest. In other words, he can hold the property adversely subject to the liability of being sold for the satisfaction of the mortgage-debt. His adverse possession cannot, in any way, affect the right of the mortgagee to bring the property to sale. Adverse possession of the limited ownership in the property, which is all that remains in the mortgagor, is not recognised by law as one of the causes which extinguish the mortgagee's right to bring the property to sale. Adverse possession affects rightful possession and such rights as go with it and cannot destroy such rights as are independent of it. A necessary corrollary of the above mentioned principles is that a trespasser, who ousts a mortgagor under a simple mortgage and holds the property adversely to him, may by prescription become the owner of the limited estate which the mortgagor had in the property, but such adverse possession cannot extinguish the right of the mortgagee. This, of course, happens when adverse possession begins after the simple mortgage. If adverse possession precedes the simple mortgage, it will run against the mortgagor and the mortgagee both. Similarly, if the mortgagee is entitled to the possession of the property mortgaged, adverse possession will run against him from the date of his right to possession. In two reported cases, it has, however, been held that adverse possession against the mortgagor extinguishes the security of the mortgagee.

Abdur Rahim, J., in Ramaswami Chetty v. Ponna Padayachi (9), took that view. The reasons which led him to it are that the mortgage is only a security for the debt, that the interest in the land remains with the mortgagor, that a decree for sale in favour of the mortgagee cannot bind the trespasser, and that Karan Singh v. Bakar Ali Khan, (10) covers the point. With due respect to the learned Judge, a simple mortgage is not merely a security for the debt, it is the transfer of an interest in the property mortgaged which interest cannot be affected by the adverse possession of a trespasser over the limited interests of the mortgagor. No one can doubt the correctness of the proposition that a decree for sale against a mortgagor cannot bind a trespasser who is no party to the decree, but it must not be forgotten that the property which the trespasser acquires is the property which is liable to sale at the instance of the mortgagee, and the adverse possession of the limited estate of the mortgagor is not sufficient to free it from that liability. If a simple mortgage did not create an interest in the property in favour of the mortgagee, adverse possession against the mortgagor, who would have been the full owner of the property, would have extinguished the security. In the case before us, the law gave the mortgagee sixty years to enforce his remedy and the ouster of the mortgagor by the trespasser, in the absence of statutory provisions to that effect, cannot cut it down to twelve years, and force the mortgagee to sue the trespasser in ejectment who may well plead that no suit for ejectment lies and that there is no cause of action for sale against him. Karan Singh v. Bakar Ali Khan (10) has no application to the case of adverse possession, which begins after the execution of a simple mortgage against the mortgagor. In that case, the village Khard Khera was in dispute between Karan Singh on one hand and Kharag Singh and Rudar Singh on the other. The Collector took possession of it as Kurk Tahsil in April 1861. The guardian of Kharag Singh and Rudar Singh mortgaged it on the 7th of January and the 6th of October 1862. Karan Singh obtained a decree for the village, and the Collector delivered possession of it to Karan Singh in October 1863, making over to him the surplus profits too. In 1874, the mortgagee sued on the mortgages of 1862. Karan Singh pleaded limitation attempting to tack on the Collector's possession, which began in April 1861, to his own. Their Lordships ruled that the Collector's possession was not adverse to the owner and could not be tacked on to that of Karan Singh. From this ruling, it is sought to be inferred that their Lordships were of opinion that the adverse possession against a mortgagor which begins after a simple mortgage is adverse to the mortgagee. They have not expressly so ruled, and to rely on an inference is very dangerous. Moreover, the possession of the Collector in that case began before the mortgage and it had been adverse to the mortgagee also inasmuch as the mortgagor at the commencement of adverse possession was not the mortgagor but the absolute owner of the property. In that case, the Collector's possession began before the mortgage, and the rule that his possession, if adverse to the mortgagor, was also adverse to the mortgagee, would have been sound law but could not have governed cases in which adverse possession began after a simple mortgage. The distinction has been noticed by Munro, J., in Parthasarathi Naiken v. Lakshmana Naiken (11). He says:—"Had the Collector's possession which began before the mortgage been adverse to the mortgagors and had the defendant claimed through the Collector, then the mortgagee's suit would have been barred as in Nallamuttu Pillai v. Betha Naickan (12). This supplies a reason why it was considered necessary to consider the question of tacking."

Abdur Rahim, J., is also of opinion that the result of holding that adverse possession against a mortgagor does not extinguish the security of his mortgagee "would be that when a property is under mortgage and the mortgagor or his successor-in-interest goes on paying interest on the debt or otherwise, acknowledges his liability, persons in peaceable and unchanged possession and enjoyment of such property in assertion of their own rights, whatever the length of the time during which their possession and enjoyment might have lasted, would not be secured in the title." This, in his opinion, is monstrous. With due respect, I am unable to agree with him. I see no reason why the invader of the possession and the limited rights of the mortgagor should be so favoured by law as to acquire the right of the mortgagee also.

The other case, which is against the view I take is that of Partap Bahadur Singh v. Maheshwar Baksh Singh (13). In it, one of the learned Judges based his decision on what appeared to him to be the view of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Karan Singh v. Bakar Ali Khan (10). He said:—

"And it appears to me that in the case of a simple mortgage, when the mortgagor is not entitled to possession, twelve years' adverse possession against the mortgagor must be held to extinguish the security as far as regards the property held adversely to the mortgagor. This appears to have been the view of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Karan Singh v. Bakar Ali Khan (10)."

I have already explained that the inference sought to be drawn from the case of Karan Singh v. Bakar Ali Khan (10) would apply to those cases in which adverse possession against the mortgagor commenced before the mortgage. That ruling does not, therefore, cover those cases in which adverse possession begins after a simple mortgage. The learned Judge gave no other reason for the view he took and no principle favours it. The other learned Judge says:—

"It will be seen that practically the rulings under both heads are concurrent upon the general principle that a person, who is in possession of mortgaged property when there is no privity between him and the mortgagor (like the respondents in the present case), can assert his title as against the mortgagee from the date, on which the mortgagee was entitled to take action on his mortgage-deed by suing for possession or for sale of the property in case of default."

With due respect, no ruling, so far as I have been able to understand it, lays down that a mortgagee under a simple mortgage who is not entitled to take possession of the property mortgaged is bound to sue the trespasser. The following cases are in favour of the view I take. Aimadar Mandul v. Makhan Lal Dey (14) and Parthasarathi Naiken v. Lakhsmana Naiken (11). Munro, J., in the last named case, has with great ability distinguished all the rulings which seem to be in conflict with that view. I fully agree with him and need not repeat what he has so well set out in his judgment.

For the above reasons, I would hold that the suit for the enforcement of the two mortgages against the property near Taksal, which is in possession of Ram Dei, is not barred by twelve years' limitation.

KNOX, J.—On the former of the two questions raised in this appeal, I never had any doubt. I quite agree with what my brother has said on the question.

The second question raised is of more difficulty, but after reading the various authorities and after giving full consideration to the question, I agree with my brother in holding that limitation does not bar the claim.

The result is that the decree of the lower Appellate Court is so far modified that the plaintiff will get a decree for sale of the property situate at Muhalla Taksal in the city of Benares, with costs, in proportion to his success and failure in which the fees of this Court will be calculated on the higher scale.

BY THE COURT—The decree of the lower Appellate Court is modified and the plaintiff will get a decree for sale of the property situate at Muhalla Taksal in the city of Benares, with costs in proportion to his success and failure.

Decree modified.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 2, 115—Preliminary decree—Decision on issues relating to misjoinder, limitation and jurisdiction—Suit for mesne profits—Refusal to draw up preliminary decree—Material irregularity—Appeal—Revision.

In a suit for mesne profits, the trying Judge first gave a decision on some issues relating to misjoinder, limitation and jurisdiction, and after finding on these issues, he directed the parties to adduce evidence on the remaining issues, which were issues of accounts. He was then asked to draw up a preliminary decree in accordance with his findings but he declined to do so:

Held, (1) that in so declining, the Judge committed a material irregularity in the exercise of his jurisdiction;

(2) that the decision of the issues conclusively determined the rights of parties regarding some matters in controversy so far as his Court was concerned; consequently, the decision on each of those issues was sufficient to constitute a preliminary decree;

(3) that the Judge should be forthwith directed to draw up a preliminary decree upon the questions decided and that an appeal would then lie against the decision.

A party has a right to appeal from a decision of the Court amounting to a preliminary decree but he can only appeal if the decree is existent in formal shape.

It is the duty of the Court, where it is applied to after the passing of a preliminary decree, to have the decree drawn up so as to enable the party aggrieved to appeal.

Application for revision from an order passed by the first class Subordinate Judge of Dhulia, in Suit No. 477 of 1907.

Mr. T. R. Desai, for the Appellant.

Mr. G. K. Dandekar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—In this case,* the Subordinate Judge has given a decision upon six issues in the case, one of them being an issue of misjoinder, another limitation, and the third of jurisdiction, and, after finding on these issues, directed that the parties should be allowed to adduce evidence on the remaining issues, which were issues of accounts. He was then asked to draw up a preliminary decree in accordance with his findings. This, however, he declined to do.

We are of opinion that in so declining, he committed a material irregularity in the exercise of his jurisdiction. The decision of the issues to which I have referred conclusively determined the rights of parties regarding some matters in controversy so far as his Court was concerned; the decision on each of those issues, therefore, was sufficient to constitute a preliminary decree.

The defendant has a right to appeal from a decision of the Court amounting to a preliminary decree, but he can only appeal if the decree is existent in a formal shape. This we decided in Bai Divali v. Vishnu Manordas (1). It is the duty of the Court, where it is applied to after the passing of a preliminary decree, to have the decree drawn up so as to enable the party aggrieved to appeal.

It is suggested on behalf of the plaintiff that this application is made solely for the purpose of delay, but the defendant, in order to rebut that suggestion, is willing to be put on terms with regard to the time within which he shall file his appeal from the preliminary decree.

We order the lower Court forthwith to draw up a preliminary decree upon the questions decided in the issues dealt with in its judgment of the 7th of February 1912, the defendant undertaking to prefer his appeal, if any, to this Court within one month from the drawing up of such decree.

Costs costs in the appeal if preferred.

If no appeal, is preferred, costs costs in the cause.

Order accordingly.

Limitation, question of—Court's duty to decide—Practice—Pleadings—Appeal—Suit found time-barred—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 3—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLI, rr. 2, 33.

A question of limitation, when it arises upon the facts before a Court, must be heard and determined, whether or not it is directly raised in the pleading or in the grounds of appeal.

In such a case, section 3 of the Limitation Act, 1908, is not controlled by any rule of pleadings, e. g., Order XLI, rule 2, Civil Procedure Code

Where the claim, or any part thereof, has been decreed in a suit, which, on appeal from such decree, is found to be barred by limitation, the Appellate Court is not only competent, under Order XLI, rule 33, Civil Procedure Code, but is compelled, by section 3 of the Limitation Act, to dismiss the suit whichever party may have made the appeal.

Appeal against the decree of the Additional District Judge, East Berar, Amraoti, dated the 19th July 1911, reversing that of the Munsif, Ellichpur, dated the 21st September 1910.

Mr. A. C. Roy, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—The suit, out of wh ch this appeal has arisen, is based on a mortgage-deed for Rs. 99, said to have been executed, on the 17th March 1892, by two persons, Sakharam and Bayaji, both now dead, and allegedly represented by the first defendant, Nimbi. The mortgage-deed is unregistered, and the property which it purports to cover consists of a house and a field at Sirasgaon, in the Ellichpur Taluq of East Berar. The further allegations in the plaint are that the second defendant, Shrawan, bought the house and a share in the field, and subsequently sold the land to the third defendant, Suryabhan, and the house to the fourth defendant, Mukaji. A sum of Rs. 52, in four instalments, was said to have been paid in March, April and June 1892, and in March 1893. The claim was for Rs. 99, and, in default, for foreclosure. Future interest and costs were also claimed.

The suit was filed in the Court of the Munsif of Ellichpur, on the 8th August 1907. On the 24th January 1908, it was realized that, under the recent decision of the Privy Council in Vasudeva v. Srinivasa (1), the suit was beyond time. The Limitation Act, 1908, was then impending, and, in expectation of a period of grace being given in such cases under that enactment, the plaintiff's Pleader withdrew the suit on the date last stated, after obtaining the leave of the Court to bring a fresh suit upon the same cause of action.

The Indian Limitation Act, 1908, was passed on the 7th August 1908, and was applied to Berar on the 28th August 1908. Section 31 (2) of that enactment provided that a suit for foreclosure or sale, wholly or in part dismissed or withdrawn, after the 22nd July 1907 and before the passing of the Act, on the ground that a twelve years' rule of limitation applied to such suit, might be restored on a written application made within six months "from the date of the passing of this Act." In Sonba v. Muniruddin, Second Appeal No. 284-B of 1911, I have held, in a reasoned judgment, that the words "the date of the passing of this Act" must be interpreted to mean the 7th August 1908, as well in Berar as in the Central Provinces. Therefore, the plaintiff had one of two courses open to him, namely—

(i) to file a fresh suit altogether, on or before the 8th August 1910 (the 7th August 1910 being a Sunday), under sub-section (1); or

(ii) to apply for restoration of his withdrawn suit on or before the 7th February 1909, under sub-section (2) of section 31, Indian Limitation Act, 1908.

He did not take the precaution of following either course. He applied to restore the original suit on the 15th July 1909. The law was overlooked by the Munsif, and by everybody else concerned with the case in the first Court, and the trial ended in a preliminary decree for foreclosure against the first defendant, in respect of that fraction of the mortgaged property (a share in the field) left untransferred in her hands. The remaining defendants, with the property transferred to them, were discharged, on the ground that they were transferees for value by registered deeds.

The plaintiff then appealed to the District Court of East Berar, and here again the parties were oblivious of the limitation bar standing against the suit. It was discovered by the learned Additional District Judge, who thereupon very properly called up the Pleader of the plaintiff-appellant, and heard him upon the point. The decree was thereafter reversed and the whole suit dismissed as time-barred.

The plaintiff has now made this second appeal, and the only ground which is, and can be, urged on his behalf is that, upon the appeal of the plaintiff as to a part of his claim which had been dismissed, the lower Appellate Court has reversed even the partial decree which the appellant had obtained, and, moreover, has done so upon a ground not raised by the defendants in either Court. On the face of it, this argument seems to carry force, and in many cases would be irresistible. But that is not the position here. The decision of the lower Appellate Court is quite correct. The bar of limitation is patent upon the face of the record. Therefore, section 3, Indian Limitation Act, 1908, applies, and the dismissal of the whole suit was compulsory. Even if Order XLI, rule 33, Civil Procedure Code, 1908, had not been in existence, the application of the statutory mandate as to limitation could not have been avoided by applying any rules of pleading. It was remarked by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Raja Har Narain Singh v. Chaudhrain Bhagwant Kuar (2) (with reference to a patent legal defect in an award)—

"This objection to the award was apparently not brought to the notice either of the Subordinate Judge or of the High Court. But the statute is there, and the Judges were bound to take judicial notice of it."

A case exactly in point is the decision of a Special Bench in Balaram v. Mangta Dass (3), and I concur in the view there adopted by a majority of six to one. To the same effect is the ruling in Bechi v. Ahsan-ullah Khan (4). It is not necessary to enter into the merits of the distinction drawn in Kandasamy v. Annamalai (5) and the cases there relied on, as the question of a partial bar is not before me. The whole suit is barred in this case. Raghu Nath Singh v. Pareshram (6) is also not in point. In Dattu v. Kasai (7), the limitation bar was not patent on the proceedings, and the ruling has, therefore, no application here. The same remark applies to Ahmad Ali v. Waris Husain (8).

I am of opinion—

(1) that a question of limitation, when it arises upon the facts before a Court, must be heard and determined, whether or not it is directly raised in the pleadings or in the grounds of appeal;

(2) that, in such a case, section 3, Indian Limitation Act, 1908, is not controlled by any rule of pleading, e. g., Order XLI, rule 2, Code of Civil Procedure, 1908; and

(3) that, where the claim, or any part thereof, has been decreed, in a suit which, on appeal from such decree, is found to be barred by limitation, the Appellate Court is not only competent, under Order XLI, rule 33, Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, but is compelled, by section 3, Limitation Act, 1908, to dismiss the suit, whichever party may have made the appeal.

It was urged that if the objection, that the application to restore the suit was beyond time, had been taken by the defendants, or pointed out by the Court, when the application was made, the plaintiff could have filed a fresh suit. This may be so, but it raises no equity in favour of the plaintiff. It was not the business, either of the Court, or of the defendants, to protect the plaintiff against his own neglect. In any case, no equitable considerations could override the law here The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

MANILAL MAGANLAL—RESPONDENT.

Companies Act (VI of 1882), s. 58—Company—Articles of Association providing for registration of transferee if proper person—Refusal of Agent of Company to register transferee—Transferee's right to go to Court—Jurisdiction of Court.

One of the Articles of Association of a Company provided that if the transferee of a share was a proper person, the share would be transferred to his name. A transferee applied for registration of his name but the Agent of the Company refused peremptorily, without giving any reason, to allow the transferee's name to appear on the register, and the Company merely adopted the action of the Agent. The transferee thereupon applied to the Court for rectification of the Company's register by the substitution of his name in place of his transferor:

Held, that the Court had jurisdiction, even without reference to the Directors or the Company, to determine whether the transferee had a right under the Article to get his name registered or not, and, for that purpose, to determine whether he was a proper person.

First appeal from the decision of the District Judge of Ahmedabad, in Application No. 23 of 1909.

Mr. G. K. Parekh, for the Appellant.

Mr. G. S. Rao, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

CHANDAVARKAR, J.—The District Judge has taken the correct view of Article 29 of the Articles of Association of this Company. The Article provides:—"The fees for the transfer of shares will be charged at the rate of eight annas per each share. And if nothing is due to the Company by the share-holder who sells his share or transfers it to another and if the transferee is a proper person, the share will be transferred to the name of the transferee." One condition, therefore, of the transfer is that the transferee should be a proper person. The Article is silent on the question who is to decide whether the transferee is a proper person—the Directors or the Company. It is unnecessary to decide who is to determine that question before the transfer is registered. There cannot be any the slightest doubt that the Court has ultimately jurisdiction to decide whether the transferee has a right under that Article to get his name registered or not, and for that purpose to determine whether he is a proper person. The Article itself being silent as to the authority, either of the Company or of the Directors, to determine the question as a preliminary one, before registering the name of the transferee, the proper inference to be drawn is that the words "a proper person" are introduced there as a qualification of the transferee, such qualification being dependent ultimately upon the decision of the Courts, should the question be carried to the Court. It is a condition of the right, but who is to determine that condition is not said in the Article. And in the absence of any express provision to that effect, I think it is a reasonable inference that that is a question which has to be determined by the Courts even without reference to the Directors or the Company. If that is so, when a would-be transferee goes to the Company and shows the transfer-deed, the Directors must accept him, unless they show that he is an improper person. He has a right to come before the Court and say that his right has been violated. For these reasons, the order of the Court below must be confirmed with costs.

BATCHELOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. It may be that under clause 29 of the Articles of Association, the power of pronouncing this would-be transferee to be a fit person rested with the Company, and if they had sought to exercise that power in a suitable manner, it is possible that they would have achieved their aim. But all that they have done is to adopt the action of the Agent and to refuse peremptorily to allow the transferee's name to appear on the register. No reason whatever is given for this decision, which is, therefore, so far as we can judge of it, merely capricious. In this Court, the most that Mr. Gokuldas could urge against the fitness of the transferee to appear on the register was that he was a cantankerous person, but there is nothing on the record to sustain even so flimsy an accusation as that. I agree, therefore, that the District Judge's order should be confirmed.

Order confirmed.

Civil revision against an order of the Subordinate Judge of Saharanpur.

Mr. D. C. Banerjee, for the Applicants.

Mr. Nehal Chand, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application in revision from an order of the Subordinate Judge of Saharanpur, rejecting an application of the applicants, by which they had asked the lower Court to be brought on the record as defendants in the suit brought by Sikandar Khan against Imam-ud-din and others. It appears that one Rao Ghulam Husain Khan was the proprietor of the property which is the subject-matter of the suit of Sikandar Khan. After Ghulam Husain Khan's death, his son, Khadim Husain Khan, entered into possession of the property. After the death of Khadim Husain, there was a dispute as to the succession to the property, between Musammat Latif-un-nisa, widow of Ghulam Husain Khan and Haji Hemu Khan, who described himself as the nephew of Ghulam Husain. Sikandar Khan stated in that suit that he was the son of Ghulam Husain Khan by his second wife. It was decided by this Court that Sikandar Khan was the legitimate son of Ghulam Husain. Subsequently, there was a dispute between Sikandar Khan and Musammat Latif-un-nisa, and the dispute was compromised in this way that she was to remain in possession of ⅛th of the property as her legal share and of the balance in lieu of dower. Musammat Latif-un-nisa executed a deed of gift on the 11th of January 1899, in favour of Imam-ud-din, son of Rahim Bakhsh, in respect of 555 bighas, 16 biswas, situated in Mauza Sakraura. Imam-ud-din, in turn, executed a deed of mortgage in favour of the applicants in respect of the property gifted to him. The mortgage was renewed on the 31st of March 1911. Musammat Latif-un-nisa died in April 1908. After her death, Imam-ud-din and some others entered into possession of the property left by her. Sikandar Khan instituted a suit in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Saharanpur on the 28th of April 1911, against Imam-ud-din and others, who were in possession of Ghulam Husain's property after Latif-un-nisa's death, on the allegation that he was entitled to get possession of ⅞th of the property as the legitimate son of Ghulam Husain Khan. After the institution of Sikandar Khan's case, Imam-ud-din executed a deed of sale on the 28th of June 1911, in respect of the property which he had mortgaged to the applicants in favour of the latter. The applicants, on the basis of their sale-deed, made an application to the Subordinate Judge of Saharanpur under Order I, rule 3, to be brought on the record. The lower Court on the objection of the plaintiff rejected the application. In revision before us, it is argued that though the applicants may have no ground to be made defendants on the basis of the sale-deed in their favour, yet as the sale-deed was obtained in lieu of the consideration of the mortgage-deed which was executed prior to the institution of the suit, the applicants should be brought on the record as defendants in the case. We are unable to agree with the learned Advocate for the applicants. The rule as to array of parties is given in Order I, rule 3. It is to the effect that all persons may be joined as defendants against whom any right to relief in respect of, or arising out of, the same act or transaction or series of acts or transactions is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally or in the alternative. In the present case, no relief is sought by Sikandar Khan against the applicants, nor is the case of Sikandar Khan the same against the applicants as against the defendants already on the record. We, therefore, think that the order of the learned

SECOND CIVIL APPEAL No. 877 OF 1910.

Present:—Sir N. G. Chandavarkar, KT., Judge, and Mr. Justice Batchelor.

BABAJI AKOBA KASAR—APPELLANT

versus

DATTU LAXMAN KASAR—RESPONDENT.

Limitation Act (XV of 1877), Sch. II, Art. 127—Joint property—Suit for partition by one co-sharer—Decree ascertaining plaintiff's share—Co-parcenary between defendants not destroyed—Exclusion to knowledge of co-parcener—Possession—Adverse possession.

A., B. and C. were co-parceners in a joint Hindu family. A. was excluded to his knowledge from all enjoyment of the family property since 1890. The property was in possession of B. In 1895, C. sued B. and A. for his one-sixth share of the property and obtained a decree for this share in 1898. The decree decided that the family was a joint one, that the property in suit was joint family property and that B. was entitled to one-sixth share. In 1907, A. sued B. to recover his share by partition of the family property. A. contended that as against him, the possession of B. should only be considered adverse after 1898. Both the lower Courts held that the suit of A. was barred under Article 127 of the Limitation Act, as he had been excluded from all enjoyment of the property since 1890:

Held, that the suit was barred by time because,

Per Chandavarkar, J.—

(a) the co-parcenary between A. and B. was not destroyed by the decree of 1898;

(b) the judgment and the decree of 1898 did not disturb, as between A. and B., the previous state of things and stop the limitation that had begun to run from 1890;

Per Batchelor, J.—

(c) the finding of fact that B. held adversely from 1890 was wholly independent of, and unaffected by the decree of 1898, which only decided that the family and the property were joint and the property was consequently partible; and

(d) though A. had a good title to possession in 1898, the possession was actually with B., who was ousting A. to his knowledge and inspite of his title since 1890.

Per Chandavarkar, J.—For a judgment in a partition suit brought by one co-parcener for his share, to operate as a severance of interest not only as to him but also as between the other co-parceners sued, the judgment must contain a clear adjudication that each co-parcener either should have or is entitled to a share definitely fixed.

Chidambaram Chettiar v. Gauri Nachiar, 6 I. A. 177 at p. 180; 2 M. 83 (P. C.) and Bala Bax Ladhuram v. Rukhambai, 30 I. A. 130 at p. 137; 5 Bom. L. R. 462; 7 C. W. N. 642; 30 C. 729 (P. C.), relied upon.

Per Batchelor, J.—Possession is a mere matter of fact, and adverse possession means possession held by some person on his own behalf or on behalf of some person other than the true owner, the true owner having a right to immediate possession.

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge of Ahmednagar, in Appeal No. 46 of 1899, confirming that passed by the first class Subordinate Judge at Ahmednagar, in Civil Suit No. 90 of 1907.

Mr. L. A. Shah, for the Appellant.

Mr. G. S. Rao, for Respondents Nos. 1 and 3.

Mr. J. R. Dhurandhar, for Respondent No. 4.

JUDGMENT.

CHANDAVARKAR, J.—The suit, which has led to this second appeal, was brought by the appellant for partition of property, alleged to be joint and ancestral, and the only question in appeal is whether the claim is barred under Article 127 of Schedule II to the Limitation Act.

It is found as a fact by both the Courts below that the appellant has been excluded to his knowledge by his co-parceners from enjoyment of the joint property since 1890, i. e., for more than twelve years before the present suit instituted in 1907.

For the appellant, it is contended that the period of exclusion from 1890 to 1898 must be eliminated from the question of limitation, because of a decree for partition passed in 1898 in favour of one of the co-parceners. In the judgment on which that decree was passed, it was found that the property now in dispute was joint and partible. That finding, it is urged, was an adjudication in favour of each party to that suit that he was a co-parcener entitled to a share; and that the adjudication had in law the effect of arresting, in favour of the appellant and as against the respondents, the period of limitation which had begun to run against the appellant from 1890 under Article 127 of the Limitation Act and of giving him a fresh cause of action and starting point of limitation.

Whether that is so must depend on what was determined by, and was the effect of, the judgment and decree in the previous suit.

BABJI AKOBA v. DATTU LAXMAN.

That was a suit by Narayan Balaji, who was defendant No. 5 in the present suit and is respondent No. 4 in this appeal. On an issue raised in the previous suit, the Court found that the property now in dispute was joint and partible. To use the language of the Privy Council in Chidambaram Chettiar v. Gauri Nachiar (1), "by this judgment there was a clear adjudication that the property was partible." The judgment then proceeded to declare that Narayan Balaji, the plaintiff in the suit, was entitled to one-sixth share in the property and the decree framed in accordance with the judgment awarded that sixth share to him. This sixth share could indeed not have been determined by the Court without ascertaining incidentally the share of each of the co-parceners. But that implied ascertainment could not destroy the co-parcenary also between the co-parceners who were defendants in the suit and make them separate in estate inter se unless the judgment had fixed the shares which they were or would be entitled to. That is the principle of the law laid down by the Privy Council in Bala Bax Lathuram v. Rukhambai (2), where it is said:—"There is no presumption, when one co-parcener separates from the others, that the latter remain united. In many cases, it may be necessary in order to ascertain the share of the out-going member, to fix the shares which the other co-parceners are or would be entitled to, and in this sense, the separation of one is said to be a virtual separation of all." That is also in substance the principle of the decision of the Privy Council in Chidambaram Chettiar v. Gauri Nachiar (1). For a judgment in a partition suit brought by one co-parcener for his share, to operate as a severance in interest not only as to him but also as between the other co-parceners sued, the judgment must contain a clear adjudication that each either should have or is entitled to a share definitely fixed. Now in the present case, in the previous suit, the judgment did not fix the shares of the defendants therein. It gave a sixth share to the plaintiff in that suit and left the remaining five-sixth untouched. The determination of that sixth share might imply that each co-parcener had a sixth share but that was incidental and was a matter of mere arithmetical calculation, which did not become a binding decision, because it was not made the subject of clear adjudication by the Court in its judgment by fixing the share of every one of the other co-parceners so as to create a severance in interest as between them. The mutual relations of the defendants with reference to their five-sixths having been left to continue as before, the ancestral property in their hands remained joint. If that was so, the judgment and the decree did not disturb as between them the previous state of things and stop the limitation that had begun to run as against the appellant from 1890.

This conclusion derives support from the plaint and pleadings of the appellant himself. His case in the Courts below was not that the decree in the previous suit had extinguished the joint estate not only as to the plaintiff in that suit but also as between the defendants therein, of whom he was one and that thereafter the said defendants had by agreement continued united so as to constitute a new joint family. His case was substantially that the plaintiff in that suit had separated and that so far as the defendants therein were concerned, things had gone on as before. That meant that their previous relations with reference to everything pertaining to the joint family, including limitation, had been left undisturbed. And when the respondents pleaded limitation against him, the appellant relied upon Article 127 of the Limitation Act in answer to the contention of the respondents that either Article 142 or Article 144 governed the case.

The decree must, therefore, be confirmed with costs.

Separate sets of costs.

BATCHELOR, J.—The plaintiff sued to recover by partition his share, one-sixth, in certain joint family property. Having been defeated in both the Courts below, he now brings this second appeal here. Admittedly there is against him an absolutely clear finding of fact that since 1890, he has, to his knowledge, been excluded from all enjoyment of the family property; and admittedly he cannot succeed in this appeal unless he can displace this finding of fact.

In the first place, a second appeal is hardly a stage of the litigation where one would expect to find it possible to overturn a finding of fact, for such an appeal is expressly limited to questions of law, such questions being decided on the facts as found by the District Court.

(1) 6 I. A. 177 at p. 180; 2 M. 83 (P. C.).
(2) 30 I. A. 130 at p. 137; 5 Bom. L. R. 462; 7 C. W. N. 642; 30 C. 729 (P. C.)

This difficulty the plaintiff seeks to overcome by calling in aid a decision of the Civil Court in 1898, determining a suit filed in 1895. That suit was brought by the present 5th defendant, and the other present defendants were parties to it. The decree decided that the family was a joint family; that the property in suit was joint property; and that the then plaintiff was entitled to a one-sixth share. The decree was in favour of the present 5th defendant, and there was no decree in favour of the present plaintiff. It is urged for the plaintiff that, by virtue of this decree, whatever adverse possession may, as a fact, have been running against him prior to the date of the decree, must be considered to have determined at the date of the decree, with the result that the presently material period of adverse possession cannot be pushed back beyond 1898; and in that case, the present suit would admittedly be in time.

The argument is one which I have great difficulty in following, but, so far as I understand it, it is altogether untenable. In my view of the case, the present finding of fact against the plaintiff is wholly independent of, and unaffected by, the decree of 1898. That decree neither decided, nor could decide, anything inconsistent with the present finding of fact, for the nature of the defendant's holding between 1890 and 1902 could not have been determined in a suit instituted in 1895. All that the decree decided was that the family and the property were joint and that the property was consequently partible. It was not even decided that the present plaintiff was at that time entitled to a one-sixth share, though I will concede that the decree proceeded on that reckoning. Still I cannot see how the plaintiff is now to be benefited, or to be saved from the finding of fact against him. In 1898 it was held that he was a member of a joint family. But it was not decided that he was in possession of any part of the family property either directly or constructively; and at a given moment, a Hindu may be a member of a joint family entitled on partition to his share and may still be in process of being excluded to his knowledge. That is what has happened here. Possession is a mere matter of fact, and adverse possession, as I understand it, means possession held by some person on his own behalf or on behalf of some person other than the true owner, the true owner having a right to immediate possession. To say, therefore, that in 1898, the plaintiff has a good title to possession is perfectly consistent with saying that in fact possession was with the defendants, who were ousting the plaintiff to his knowledge and in spite of his title.

As to the case of Amrita Ravji v. Shridhar Narayan (3), it is, I think, distinguishable on its facts, for there was an actual decree awarding possession in 1886 to that party who was objecting that the joint judgment-debtor's adverse possession prior to 1886 could not be tacked on to his subsequent possession so as to fill out the complete period of limitation. Moreover, I do not find that in that case the Bench enunciated any proposition of law which is in conflict with the views I have expressed in this appeal.

Decree confirmed.

Evidence Act (I of 1872), ss. 18, 21—Recital in mortgage deed--Admissible in evidence against representative of mortgagor—Probative value of recital.

A recital in a mortgage-deed is admissible in evidence as against the mortgagor as well as against those who derive their title from him. Sections 18 and 21 of the Evidence Act make the recital admissible against them even as an admission. The probative value of such recital, however, is a different question.

First appeal from a decree of the Subordinate Judge of Saharanpur.

The Hon'ble Mr. Motilal Nehru (with him Mr. Harendra Krishna Mukerji), for the Appellant.

NAWAL KUNWAR v. BAHKTAWAR SINGH.

The Hon'ble Dr. Sundar Lal (with him Mr. Gokal Prasad), for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This appeal arises in a suit brought by the appellant for sale upon a mortgage, dated the 10th January 1889, executed by the first defendant, Bakhtawar Singh, and his father, Partap Singh, for self and as guardian of his son, Risal Singh, the defendant No. 2, who was at that time a minor. The amount secured by the mortgage is Rs. 10,000, but the plaintiff alleges that she has paid only Rs. 8,337-9-0, which she seeks to recover with interest by sale of the mortgaged property. There was a prior mortgage in respect of the same property in favour of Munna Lal, the father of the third and fourth defendants. The plaintiff alleges that this mortgage has been discharged by her. Those defendants have purchased the mortgaged property from the first two defendants under a sale-deed, dated the 18th of July 1896, and have, therefore, been made parties to the suit. The fifth defendant, Banarsi Das, is the grandson of one Shibban Lal, who also held a prior mortgage in respect of the property mortgaged to the plaintiff. The plaintiff alleges that she paid a part of the mortgage-money due to Shibban Lal and seeks to redeem that mortgage by payment of the balance. The sixth defendant, Dalip Singh, is the purchaser of a portion of the mortgaged property from the defendants Nos. 3 and 4. The defendants Nos. 1 and 2 urge in answer to the claim that Rs. 1,000, only out of the consideration for the plaintiff's bond was paid and that the said amount has been realized by the plaintiff from the usufruct of the mortgaged property. The defendants Nos. 3 and 4, the only defendants who have seriously contested the claim, plead that the plaintiff's mortgage is fictitious and nominal and that it was executed in her favour by Partap Singh with a view to protect his property. This contention of the defendants has been accepted by the lower Court which has dismissed the plaintiff's claim. The plaintiff has preferred this appeal.

The principal question to be determined in the appeal is whether the mortgage in favour of the plaintiff was a fictitious transaction.

For the above reasons, we are of opinion that the conclusion at which the learned Subordinate Judge arrived as to the nature of the transaction is not warranted by the evidence, and that the mortgage in the plaintiff's favour was a genuine mortgage.

We have now to consider what payments have been actually made by the plaintiff. It was stated in the mortgage deed that out of the amount of the consideration for the mortgage, the plaintiff was to withhold Rs. 8,293 for payment to prior creditors. Out of this sum, Rs. 3,250 was, as we have already stated, due to Munna Lal and was set off against the amount of the sub-mortgage executed by the plaintiff in his favour, so that this sum of Rs. 3,250 has been paid by the plaintiff. It has also been proved that she paid to Bhawani Prasad on account of Shibban Lal's mortgage Rs. 1,500 on the 11th January 1889, and Rs. 1,365-9-0 on the 13th March 1889, in all Rs. 2,865-9-0. It has also been proved by the evidence of Kishan Sahai that he was paid Rs. 500 in discharge of a promissory-note held by him. The payment of Rs. 15 out of the sum of Rs. 515, mentioned in the plaint as paid to Kishan Sahai, has not been established. It is recited in the mortgage-deed that the plaintiff took credit for a sum of Rs. 549 due to her on account of a note of hand, dated the 14th March 1888. It was contended before us that no evidence existed on the record as to Partap Singh having executed any promissory-note in favour of the plaintiff for which Rs. 549 was due by him. Th learned Advocate for the respondents contended that the recital contained in the mortgage-deed in regard to that promissory-note was not admissible in evidence against the respondents, defendants Nos. 3 and 4, purchasers from the mortgagors. We are unable to agree with this contention. There can be no question that the recital is admissible in evidence as against the mortgagors themselves, and as the defendants Nos. 3 and 4 derive their interest in the subject-matter of the suit from the mortgagors, sections 18 and 21 of the Evidence Act make the recital admissible in evidence against them also as admission. What the probative value of that admission may be is a different question, but we are clearly of opinion that the statement may be used as evidence against defendants Nos. 3 and 4.

For the above reasons we have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff has advanced under her mortgage-deed a sum of Rs. 8,322-9-0.

Rent, suit for, based on specific settlement—No alternative claim for rent—Plaintiff's title proved but settlement not proved—Whether decree for use and occupation should be given—Amendment of plaint, whether should be allowed.

In a suit for rent where no alternative claim is made for use and occupation, no sum can be decreed on that footing.

Lukhee Kanto Dass Chowdhury v. Sumeeruddi Lusker, 13 B. L. R. 243 (F.B.); 21 W. R. 208, followed.

Therefore, where rent was claimed under an alleged settlement with the defendant, which the plaintiff failed to prove, a decree for use and occupation ought not to have been given when there was no such claim and the defendant had no notice of such a claim.

A plaint may be allowed to be amended only when a claim has been omitted by mistake or inadvertence or for similar reasons, and not deliberately.

Therefore, where the plaintiff has sued for rent upon a specific case of settlement with the defendant, which has been found to be false, it is not a case where he should be allowed to amend the plaint by claiming a relief for the defendant's use and occupation, not consistent with the claim originally laid.

JUDGMENT.

N. CHATTERJEA, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit for recovery of rent brought by the plaintiff, on the allegation that the lands, for which the rent was claimed, had been settled with the defendant No. 1. The latter denied the relation of landlord and tenant with the plaintiff and set up one Jagadambi as his landlord. The Court of first instance held that the relation of landlord and tenant existed between the plaintiff and the defendant and gave a decree to the plaintiff. On appeal, the learned Subordinate Judge disbelieved the story of the settlement of the land by the plaintiff with the defendant No. 1, as also the alleged settlement by Jagadambi set up by the defendant, and held that the position of the defendant No. 1 was no better than that of a trespasser, but that plaintiff's title was proved and that he was entitled to recover rent for use and occupation from the defendant No. 1.

The defendant No. 1 has appealed to this Court and the question raised in this appeal is whether the plaintiff is entitled to compensation for use and occupation in the suit as framed.

In the plaint, there is no alternative claim for rent for use and occupation; the defendant No. 1, therefore, had no notice that the plaintiff, if he failed to prove the settlement set up in the plaint, would claim rent for occupation of the land, and he is apparently not willing to be treated as tenant of the plaintiff. In a suit for rent, where no alternative claim is made for use and occupation, no rent can be decreed on that footing. This was decided by the Full Bench in the case of Lukhee Kanto Dass Chowdhry v. Sumeeruddin Lusker (1), and we are bound by that decision. No doubt, in the cases referred to in the judgment of the Court below, it was held that tenancy in this country is created not only by contract but also by occupation of land so far as agricultural lands are concerned, and rent for use and occupation was decreed. But the question is not whether rent for use and occupation can be decreed in a suit for rent, but whether a decree on that footing can be made where there is no alternative claim for use and occupation. As pointed out by the Privy Council in the case of Eshan Chunder Singh v. Shama Churn Bhutto (2), "the determination in a cause should be founded upon a case either to be found in the pleadings or involved in or consistent with the case thereby made".

(1) 13 B. L. R. 243; 21 W. R. 208.
(2) 11 M. I. A. 7 at p. 20; 6 W. R. (P. C.) 57.

In the case of Surnomoyee v. Dino Nath Gir Sunnayasee (3) and Azim Sirdar v. Ram Lall Shaha(4), the learned Judges treated the Full Bench case of Lakhee Kanto Dass Chowdhry v. Sumeeruddin Lusker (1) as laying down that the landlord is entitled to rent or compensation for the use of the land, where he is unable to prove the kabulyat under which rent is claimed, but the Full Bench distinctly held that the question whether the landlord is entitled to rent for use and occupation, depends upon the claim which is stated in the plaint and that where a claim for rent on account of such occupation is not made in the plaint, the landlord is not so entitled. This view has been accepted and followed in Surendra Narain Singh v. Bhai Lal Thakur (5), Rachhea Singh v. Upendra Chandra Singh (6) and Gobinda Sundar Singh Chowdury v. Srikrishna Chakravarty (7). In the present case, rent was claimed under an alleged settlement with the defendant. The plaintiff failed to prove it, and the defendant may well complain that a decree for use and occupation ought not to have been given when there was no such claim and he had no notice of such a claim.

Section 157 of the Bengal Tenancy Act, no doubt, provides that when a plaintiff instituted a suit for the ejectment of a trespasser, he may, if he thinks fit, claim an alternative relief that the defendant be declared liable to pay, for the land in his possession, a fair and equitable rent to be determined by the Court, and the Court may grant such relief accordingly. But the suit has not been framed according to the provisions of that section. The plaintiff does not claim that the defendant be declared liable to pay a fair and equitable rent to be determined by the Court; the suit is based upon a contract of tenancy which he has failed to prove.

Of course, the Court may allow the plaint to be amended but the amendment should be allowed only where the claim has been omitted by mistake or inadvertence or, for similar reasons, and not deliberately. Here the plaintiff sued for rent upon a specific case of settlement with the defendant which has been found to be false, and it is not a case where he should be allowed to amend the plaint by claiming a relief not consistent with the claim originally laid.

The decrees of the Courts below are accordingly set aside and the suit dismissed with costs.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXIII, r. 1 —Application for leave to withdraw suit with liberty to bring fresh suit—Defective judgment—High Court's power to set aside order—Revision—Practice.

A Court allowed a person to withdraw his suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit; there was nothing in the judgment to show that the Court was satisfied that the suit must fail by reason of some formal defect or that there was any other sufficient cause for permitting the suit to be withdrawn:

Held, that the High Court could interfere in revision and set aside the order allowing the suit to be withdrawn.

Civil revision from an order of the first Additional Subordinate Judge of Agra.

FACTS.—In a suit pending before the Additional Subordinate Judge of Agra, an application was made for permission to withdraw the suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit. The Subordinate Judge granted the permission and recorded the following order:—

"I have heard the parties. I think there are sufficient reasons to allow the plaintiff to withdraw his suit with liberty to bring his suit again. The application is granted. Plaintiff's suit is dismissed with costs with liberty to bring another suit. Defendant will get his half costs from the plaintiff."

Defendant applied to the High Court in revision against the above order.

Mr. Wallach (with him Dr. Satish Chandra Banerji), for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—There is nothing in the judgment of the Court below to show that that Court was satisfied that the suit must fail by reason of some formal defect. It was not shown to us that there was any formal defect or that there was any other sufficient cause. We have, therefore, no alternative but to set aside the order of the Court below and order that the case be returned to that Court with directions that it be restored to the file of pending suits and disposed of according to law. The costs of this application will be borne by the respondent.

Order set aside.

Water—Right to water in running stream—Surface water—Nature and rights of water explained.

Where water flowed through a definite channel across the lands of A., up to B.'s lands and then spread itself all along the fields of B. and overflowed its bunds and joined another channel which irrigated C.'s land:

Held, that the water as it flowed from B.'s land could not be regarded as surface water and C., was entitled to the customary flow of the channel water along B.'s lands and A. and B. had no right to obstruct the same.

Although no claim can be made either as a natural right or as an easement by prescription except to water flowing in a definite course and no claim can be maintained with regard to surface water or surface drainage, yet it does not follow that the right to the water of a stream ceases when it ceases to flow in a confined water-course.

Water flowing into a field from a known channel and passing along the field onwards into another field, though not over a confined tract in the former field but along its whole area, is not surface water.

In each case, the question whether or not particular water is surface water, is one of fact to be determined by the circumstances attending its origin and its continued existence. If the water is spread out and flows sluggishly over the surface, losing itself by percolation and evaporation, it is surface water although it has its source in springs.

But the mere fact that the water spreads out at some places and flows sluggishly without sufficient force to form a channel for itself, does not make it surface water if the flow has sufficient force to maintain itself and it is subsequently gathered together into a channel so as to form a water-course. The chief characteristic of surface water is its inability to maintain its identity and existence as a water body.

Well-defined existence arising from an ascertained course appears to be the real test in coming to a conclusion against any body of water being regarded as merely surface water.

Second appeal against the decree of the District Court of Vizagapatam, in Appeal Suit No. 20 of 1910, presented against that of the District Munsif of Vizagapatam, in O. S. No. 721 of 1908.

Mr. B. Narasimhaswara Sarma, for the Appellant.

Messrs. K. V. L. Narasimham and V. Ramesam, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In this case, the plaintiff asked for a declaration of his right to take water through a channel for the cultivation of certain land belonging to him and for an injunction restraining the defendants from obstructing the course of the channel. The lands both of the plaintiff, and defendants are situated in a proprietary estate. According to the plaintiff a river channel supplied the means of irrigation for the lands of the parties and other ryots, who had lands alongside the stream. A branch leading from the main channel passed through the lands of the defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 and then the 4th defendant's land and, according to the plaintiff, afterwards reached his own land. Defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3 are alleged to have blocked up the channel at a point higher than the 4th defendant's land. They contended that the channel never irrigated the lands either of the 4th defendant or of the plaintiff, and that it stopped somewhere near their own lands. The 4th defendant did not contest the suit.

The facts found by the lower Appellate Court, as we understand the judgment of the District Judge, are:—that the channel in question continued, as a definite water-course, up to the 4th defendant's lands, and that the water of the channel flowed over the bunds of the 4th defendant's fields and joined another channel which irrigated the plaintiff's lands.

The District Munsif held that the plaintiff was entitled to the flow of the channel water along the 4th defendant's lands to the channel which was the direct source of irrigation for his land, and that the contesting defendants were not entitled to interfere with the flow. On appeal, the District Judge held that, as the water of the stream did not flow direct to the plaintiff's land in any defined course, it must be taken that it was not intended to supply water to the plaintiff's land. He regarded the water as it flowed from the 4th defendant's land over his bunds as mere surface drainage and was of opinion that the plaintiff could not claim any legal right to it. He, consequently, dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

The question argued in second appeal is, whether the plaintiff is not entitled to the customary flow of the water of the stream A-I along the 4th defendant's field until it joined the channel which supplied water to his own field. There was, according to the finding of the Appellate Court, no definite water-course across the 4th defendant's field, the water-course ceasing to have any definite bed and banks after it reached the 4th defendant's field. We must also take it, on the findings, that the water in the stream was not always sufficient to irrigate the lands of the 4th defendant or to supply a flow to the plaintiff's channel. But this we regard as immaterial; such is the case with many streams and channels in this country. It is also immaterial that the water of the stream flowing through the 4th defendant's land did not reach the plaintiff's land direct but joined another channel out of which the plaintiff got his water. If the water of the stream supplied a means of irrigation to the plaintiff, it is immaterial whether it did so by directly reaching the plaintiff's land or indirectly by flowing into another channel.

The substantial question for decision is whether the fact that there was no defined channel across the 4th defendant's field but that the stream spread itself all along the field and overflowed the bunds to reach the plaintiff's channel, puts the plaintiff out of Court. The question is one of considerable importance in this country. It was stated by the learned Vakil for the appellant, and we believe with good reason, that irrigation channels do not always go direct to every field irrigated by them and that the water often flows from one field to another, either through cuts made in the bund of the field or by over-flowing the bund. And he submitted that it would be disastrous if it should be held that the owners of fields on the further side of channels could not support their right to the waters of the channels in the absence of a confined passage along each field irrigated by them.

The respondents' Pleader contended, on the other hand, that no claim can be made by any one to a flow of water except to water flowing in a definite channel, and that all water, which disperses itself over a field without a definite water-course, must be regarded as drainage and surface water, which the owner of the field over which it passes is entitled to appropriate or divert as he pleases.

After full consideration, we are of opinion that the respondents' contention should not be sustained. It is, no doubt, true that no claim can be made, either as a natural right or as an easement by prescription, except to water flowing in a definite course and that no such claim could be maintained with regard to what should be regarded as surface water or surface drainage in the proper acceptation of those expressions. But if this principle be understood correctly, it cannot, in our opinion, be held that the right to the water of a stream ceases when it ceases to flow in a confined water-course. If the stream has exhausted itself as a stream and merely soaks into a field, then, no doubt, no right to the water so soaking can be sustained in the same manner, as no right can be recognized to water falling on a field from the sky overhead or oozing from the soil underneath. Water of any of these descriptions cannot be the subject of any right until it again begins to flow in a definite course. The reason why no right to such water can be recognised is explained in various decided cases. In Acton v. Blundell (1), the question arose with regard to water flowing in a subterraneous course and supplying a valley, which was drained away by a landowner, who carried on mining operations in his own land in the usual manner. Tindal, C. J., explaining the ground and origin of the law which is held to govern running streams, observed as follows:—

"The ground and origin of the law which governs streams running in their natural course would seem to be this, that the right enjoyed by the several proprietors of the lands over which they flow is, and always has been, public and notorious: that the enjoyment has been long continued—in ordinary cases, indeed, time out of mind —and uninterrupted; each man knowing what he receives and what has always been received from the higher lands, and what he transmits and what has always been transmitted to the lower." The right to use such water the learned Judge regards, as stated by Mr. Justice Story in Tyler v. Wilkinson (2), to be 'an incident to the land.' He continues:—"But in the case of a well sunk by a proprietor in his own land, the water which feeds it from a neighbouring soil does not flow openly in the sight of the neighbouring proprietor, but through the hidden veins of the earth beneath its surface: no man can tell what changes these underground sources have undergone in the progress of time: it may well be, that it is only yesterday's date, that they first took the course and direction which enabled them to supply the well: again, no proprietor knows what portion of water is taken from beneath his own soil: how much he gives orginally, or how much he transmits only, or how much he receives: on the contrary, until the well is sunk, and the water collected by draining into it, there cannot properly be said, with reference to the well, to be any flow of water at all." In addition to the uncertainty and changes in the supply, his Lordship refers to two other reasons why no right to any such water should be recognized, namely, that every man, by virtue of his ownership, is entitled to abstract everything he can from his own land, and secondly, he is entitled to make the best use of his land for his own benefit. He observes:—"In the case of the running stream, the owner of the soil merely transmits the water over its surface: he receives as much from his higher neighbour as he sends down to his neighbour below: he is, neither better nor worse; the level of the water remains the same. But if the man who sinks the well in his own land, can acquire by that act an absolute and indefeasible right to the water that collects in it, he has the power of preventing his neighbour from making any use of the spring in his own soil which shall interfere with the enjoyment of the well. He has the power, still further, of debarring the owner of the land in which the spring is first found, or through which it is transmitted, from draining his land for the proper cultivation of the soil: and thus, by an act which is voluntary on his part, and which may be entirely unsuspected by his neighbour, he may impose on such neighbour the necessity of bearing a heavy expense, if the latter has erected machinery for the purposes of mining, and discovers, when too late, that the appropriation of the water has already been made."

In Rawstron v. Taylor (3), the reasons why no right could be obtained over surface water were pointed out. The judgments of the Court throw light also on what should really be regarded as surface water. Parke, B., said:—"This is the case of common surface water rising out of springy or boggy ground, and flowing in no definite channel, although contributing to the supply of the plaintiff's mill. This water, having no defined course and its supply being merely casual, the defendant is entitled to get rid of it in any way he pleases." Martin, B., emphasised the right of every landowner to enjoy his land as he chooses. He said:—"The proprietor of the soil has prima facie the right to drain his land. He is at liberty to get rid of the surface water in any manner that may appear most convenient to him; and I think no one has a right to interfere with him, and that the object he may have in so doing is quite immaterial." Platt, B., observed:—"The plaintiff could not insist upon the defendant maintaining his fields as a mere water-table." In Broadbent v. Ramsbotham (4), which also related to surface water, the grounds of decision were the same. The plaintiff claimed four sources of water which he said supplied the Longwood Brook on which his mill was situated. One of the sources was a swamp of 16 perches. Alderson, B., observed that it was merely like a sponge fixed (so to speak) on the side of the hill and full of water. "If this overflows, it creates a sort of marshy margin adjoining; and there is apparently no course of water, either into or out of it, on the surface of the land. As to the subterranean courses communicating with this swamp, which must, no doubt, exist, it is sufficient to say that they are not traceable, so as to show that the water passing along them ever reaches Longwood Brook." It will be observed that the learned Judge considered it material that there was no course of water into the swamp. The judgment of Lord Hatherley, L. C., in Grand Junction Canal Company v. Shugar (5), is also important as throwing light on the nature of surface water. He observed referring to Chasemore v. Richards(6):—"Mr. Justice Wightman there laid down the law very plainly in giving the opinion of the Judges upon the subject, and the distinction was there drawn—and, I should have thought, firmly established—between water which comes no one knows exactly whence, and flows no one knows exactly how, either underground or on the surface, unconfined in any channel, either as rainfall or from springs of the earth, which may vary from day to day, or spring up from beneath the surface in a direction which no one knows—between that species of water and water once confined in a regular channel." His Lordship's description is quite inapplicable to water flowing into a field from a known channel and passing along the field onwards into another field, though not over a confined tract in the former field but along its whole area. We may refer also to the observations of Lord Watson in McNab v. Robertson (7) "Water, whether falling from the sky or escaping from a spring, which does not flow onward with any continuity of parts, but becomes dissipated in the earth's strata, and simply percolates through or along those strata, until it issues from them at a lower level, through dislocation of the strata or otherwise, cannot with any propriety be described as a stream." It is impossible to apply this description to the water of a stream flowing into it and afterwards passing out of it after irrigating it, though without making a cutting for itself, over any particular portion of the field. The true test of the existence of a common right is explained in Angell on "Watercourses," section 108 (o), page 137. The learned author says:—"It is to be observed that it is only when the flow of water on one person's land is identified with that on his neighbour's, by being traceable to it along a distinct and defined course, that the two proprietors can have natural relations with each other in respect of it, considered as the subject of separate existence. If the waters on the two lands do not possess this unity of character, they are in the same category as fish and birds, etc., and are only incident to, and form part of, the produce of their respective soils, while actually resting upon them; no proprietor can make claim to water in such condition before it arrives within his own borders. Nor can any proprietor claim that another shall receive it within his borders or that he shall not take appropriate measures upon his own land and in the reasonable use thereof, to prevent its collecting upon his soil." The next section illustrates the real character of surface water. "Thus water rising naturally, making land spongy and wet, and squaddering itself over the surface, has no public character whatever, although it ultimately finds its way to and feeds a stream; and, therefore, before it arrives at any defined natural channel, it belongs solely to the owner of the land which it covers, and he may deal with it exactly as he thinks fit, while he is making a reasonable use of his own land. Such, also, is the case with water which percolates through the porous basin of a pond or overflows the edge of a well, or which passes or runs off the surface of the soil, before, in either instance, it makes itself some natural channel. And, clearly, water severed from all other water, as in a pond or tank, and resting solely on the proprietor's own ground must be in a similar plight." When the flow of water on one person's land can be identified with that on another, there is no reason why a right to such flow should not exist although the water may flow along an intervening piece of land. "A mere right of drainage over the general surface of land is very different from the right to the flow of a stream or brook across the premises of another." Farnham in his 'Law of Waters and Water-course' Vol. III, page 2556, observes:—"When water appears upon the surface in a diffused state, with no permanent source of supply or regular course, and then disappears by percolation or evaporation, its flow is valuable to no one, and it must be regarded as surface water, and dealt with as such. In Crawford v. Rambo (8), it is said that surface water is that which is diffused over the surface of the ground, derived from falling rains and melting snows, and continues to be such until it reaches some well-defined channel in which it is accustomed to, and does, flow with other waters, whether derived from the surface or springs; and then it becomes the running water of a stream, and ceases to be surface water. In each case, the question whether or not particular water is surface water is one of fact to be determined by the circumstances attending its origin and continued existence. If the water is spread out and flows sluggishly over the surface, losing itself by percolation and evaporation, it is surface water, although it has its source in springs. But the mere fact that the water spreads out at some places, and flows sluggishly without sufficient force to form a channel for itself, does not make it surface water if the flow has sufficient force to maintain itself, and it is subsequently gathered together into a channel so as to form a water-course. The chief characteristic of surface water is its inability to maintain its identity and existence as a water body. ... ... But marsh lands through which overflow water from a lake reaches a natural stream are not governed by the rules applicable to mere surface water". Well-defined existence arising from an ascertained course appears to be the real test in coming to a conclusion against any body of water being regarded as merely surface water. See Farnham page 2556. Angell refers to a case which throws light on what is really necessary to make a water-course. For 7 rods, the stream descended rapidly in a well-defined course to a piece of marshy ground where it spread, so that its flow was slight and not sufficient to break the turf but was generally sufficient to form a continuous sluggish current along the surface in a natural depression to a watering place within the plaintiff's land. This was adjudged to be a water-course within the meaning attached in law to that term. Domat states the rule of Civil law as follows: "If waters have their course regulated from one ground to another, whether it be by the nature of the place, or by some regulation, or by a title, or by an ancient possession, the proprietors of the said grounds cannot innovate anything as to the ancient course of the water. Thus, he who has the upper grounds cannot change the course of the waters, either by turning it some other way, or rendering it more rapid, or making any other change in it to the prejudice of the owner of the lower grounds."

It is quite clear that the water of the channel in dispute between the parties in the present case, when it entered the 4th defendant's land, could not be regarded as surface water. It came from the channel in dispute. Its origin is not on the 4th defendant's land nor did it come upon the surface of his land through the pores of the earth. The channel did not, according to the findings, 'lose itself,' and get mixed up with the earth of the 4th defendant's land but continued its course along his field. The identity of the stream was preserved when it passed out of the field. It may be that the 4th defendant could, if he chose, restrict the passage of the stream along his land by confining it to a channel, occupying only a small portion of his field. It was not, however, the 4th defendant that obstructed the course of the stream, but defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 3: and the obstruction was made at a place before the stream reached the 4th defendant's land. They had no right to do so. In Dudden v. Guardians of Clutton Union (9), "the water from a spring flowed in a gully or natural channel to a stream on which was a mill. The spring having been cut off at its source and the water received into a tank as it rose from the earth, by the license of the owner of the soil on which the spring rose", it was held that an action would lie against the obstructor by the owner of a mill who used to receive a supply of water for his mill.

The obstruction in this case, according to the finding, was at a place where the channel, undoubtedly, existed as a regular water-course. In our opinion, it did not cease to be such before it reached the channel which directly irrigated the plaintiff's land. It did not become surface water on reaching the 4th defendant's land.

We reverse the District Judge's decision and restore the decree of the District Munsif with costs both here and in the lower Appellate Court.

The plaintiff will also have the further relief of an injunction against defendants Nos. 1 to 3 from interfering with the plaintiff's rights declared and granted by the District Munsif who refused that relief of injunction on insufficient grounds and against which refusal, the plaintiff filed a memo. of objections in the District Court and has also complained in the second appeal memo. before us.

The period of limitation for an appeal to the District Judge under Agra Tenancy Act, 1901, is thirty days.

Such an appeal is governed by the procedure prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure and by the limitation prescribed under Article 152 of the Limitation Act.

Application for revision against an order of the District Judge of Jhansi, dated the 9th of April 1912.

Mr. Hamilton, for the Applicant.

Mr. B. K. Mukerji, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—A second appeal in a revenue suit to the learned District Judge of Jaunpore was dismissed by him on a preliminary ground that the appeal had been filed beyond time and no sufficient cause had been shown for extending the time for the filing of the appeal. Two grounds have been taken in the application for revision to this Court. One ground is that on the merits, the applicant was entitled to the benefit of section 5 of the Limitation Act. From the facts set out in the judgment of the Court, I am satisfied that the decision of the Court below on that point was correct. The applicant had himself to thank for the delay in the filing of the appeal after the expiry of one month from the date of the decree. The second ground raises a question as to which no ruling has been quoted before me. Mr. Hamilton for the applicant contends that the Tenancy Act does not prescribe any period of limitation for appeals preferred to District Judges under the provisions of section 167 of that Act He points out that Schedule E of that Act prescribes periods of limitation for appeals to Collectors, Commissioners and the Board, whereas in the matter of appeals to District Judges, the Act is silent. He refers to section 29 (b) of the Limitation Act, which provides that nothing shall affect or alter any period of limitation prescribed for any suit, appeal or application by any special or local law now or hereafter in force in British India. As a matter of recognised practice, limitation for appeals to District Judges has always been taken to be one month from the date of the decree and it appears to me that the provision of section 193 of the Tenancy Act sufficiently covers the question now before me. That section provides that the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure shall apply to procedure in all suits and other proceedings under the Tenancy Act so far as they are not inconsistent therewith subject to certain modifications. An appeal to the District Judge is, therefore, governed by the procedure prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure. Under Article 152 of the Limitation Act, a period of thirty days is prescribed for appeals to District Judges. I see no reason to interfere. The application is dismissed with costs including fees on the higher scale.

Application dismissed.

Babus Hemendra Nath Sen and Bimal Chandra Das Gupta, for the Appellant.

Babu Karunamoy Bose for Babu Ram Chandra Majumdar and Babu Sachchidananda Gupta, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—This second appeal arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiff, a lady, shebait under her husband's Will, to eject the appellant, the principal defendant, from three jamas which had come into his possession under a sale certificate dated September 1905, which a third party had obtained against defendants Nos. 1 to 6.

It is extremely difficult to follow the judgment of either of the Courts inasmuch as the parties are wrongly described, the transferee being described as the principal defendant and not numbered and the transferors being Nos. 1 to 6. But this much is clear that by the sale certificate Exhibit B, the whole of these three jamas were transferred to the principal defendant. Subsequently, the plaintiff sued the six defendants for rent, but the defendants Nos. 3 to 5 were exonerated from the suit for what reason we know not; but it must have been because the Court held they had no interest in the holding, for we find that the whole of the arrears sued for were decreed against defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 6. These points have not been considered by the learned Judge at all, and the Munsif in his judgment, although he set out at page 14 to describe this litigation, unfortunately did not go far enough. But the question is a pure question of law, and we think that we can deal with it on the authorities and dispose of the suit.

The contention on behalf of the principal defendant, who is the appellant and transferee of the whole of this jama, is that inasmuch as the learned Judge has found that the defendants Nos. 3 to 5 are still in possession of a portion of the jama, no forfeiture could have been incurred on the authority of the rulings in Kabil Sardar v. Chandra Nath Nag Chowdhry (1); Rai Kamaleswari Persad Sing Bahadur v. Maharaj Harbullab Narain Singh Bahadur (2); Chandra Mohun Mookhopadhaya v. Bissesswar Chatterjee (3); Durga Prosad Sen v. Doula Gazee (4) and Sheikh Gozaffer Hossein v. E. Dablish (5).

Now we find that all these cases are distinguishable on the ground on which the case of Kabil Sardar v. Chandra Nath Nag Chowdhry (1) was distinguished by this Court in the case of Kallinath Chakravarti v. Upendra Chunder Chowdhry (6), where it was held that where the defendant had purchased the entire rights of the original tenants of certain jote lands without obtaining the consent of the landlord to the transfer of the tenures, and the original tenants had remained in possession as sub-tenants of the transferees, the principle laid down in Kabil Sardar v. Chandra Nath Nag Chowdhry (1) did not apply. Now in all these cases, which have been cited to us by the appellant and which we have just now noticed, the rule laid down is that the sale of a part of the holding is not a ground for forfeiture. The language in the latter part of the judgment in the case of Kabil Sardar v. Chandra Nath Nag Chowdhry (1) is not very clear. After laying down that the Full Bench in Nurendro Narayan Roy v. Ishen Chandra Sen (7) had held that the reason why the zemindar is entitled to obtain khas possession of the lands of the holding which has been sold and of which possession had been given to the purchaser, is that the sale and transfer of possession to the purchaser conveys no title to him and as the ryot has left the holding and disclaims any interest in it, he must be deemed to have abandoned it and the land remains a piece of land within the zemindari to which the person in possession has no title and which has been abandoned by the owner, does not seem to be consistent with the subsequent finding in that case, that the sale or parting of possession of the whole or part of the holding is not made a ground for forfeiture by the Tenancy Act. But the facts in that case show that there was no question of parting with the whole of the holding, because the Judges say in the present case "so far from having abandoned the holding, the ryot and his sons since his death have paid rent of the whole in the Collectorate and they have themselves always cultivated a portion of it," so that the words in the placitum "or parting with the whole" are obiter; and it is perfectly clear from the other rulings that the rule is that the transfer by an occupancy ryot of a portion of his holding does not effect the forfeiture of his tenancy, if he continues to be in occupation of the remainder, and this is what is laid down in the cases in 1 Calcutta Weekly Notes. In every case, there was a transfer of only a portion of the holding. Now in the case of Kallinath Chakravarti v. Upendra Chunder Chowdhry (6), to which we have referred, the whole of the holding was transferred, and the fact that the original tenants came back again as sub-tenants or in any other way, was held not to get rid of the original abandonment.

After the argument was over, our attention was called to the ruling in Dina Nath Roy v. Krishna Bejoy Saha (8), where it was held that, the original tenants, having taken under-lease from their transferee, could not have been said to have abandoned the holding. But we find that this case is clearly distinguishable, because they were holders of the entire holding and they expressed their willingness to pay rent to the landlord and ignore the transfer.

We think that the present case is governed by the rule laid down in Kallinath Chackerbutty v. Upendra Chandra Chowdhry (6) and we are fortified in this opinion by the findings of the learned Munsif on the facts of the case which have not been properly dealt with by the lower Appellate Court. Had it been necessary to go into facts which the learned Judge has not properly gone into, we should have to remand this case because we are not satisfied that the learned Judge's ipso dixit in the decretal part of his judgment that defendants Nos. 3 to 5 are in part possession has any foundation, inasmuch as he gives no reason for it, and the previous part of his judgment makes it very difficult to understand when he is talking of defendants Nos. 1, 2 and 6 and when he is talking of defendants Nos. 3, 4 and 5. The defendants Nos. 3, 4 and 5 happen to be ladies and their contention is that they obtained small parcels of the property by partition for their sustenance. It does not appear that any evidence was ever given of any such partition and there is no finding in either ourt's judgment that any such partition ever took place. It would appear that these ladies were in the position of maintenance-holders and that when the entire jamas were sold under the money-decree by the sale certificate, Exhibit B., whatever rights they had, must have passed, inasmuch as the decree was against them and the sale certificate passed the whole of the jama. It is, therefore, perfectly clear to us that the sale under the certificate constituted a complete ouster of all the defendants from the jamas and that on the authority of the Full Bench, the plaintiff landlord is now entitled to re-enter.

The result is that the appeal of the principal defendant is dismissed and the cross-appeal of the plaintiff is decreed. There will be a decree in favour of the plaintiff for khas possession of the whole of the jamas but without mesne profits excepting in so far as they were allowed by the Munsif; in other words, the judgment and decree of the lower Appellate Court are set aside and the judgment and decree of the Munsif restored,

JUDGMENT.

RICHARDS, C. J.—This appeal arises out of a suit in which the plaintiff sought a declaration of his title to a certain plot of land with the trees thereon and a pucca well. The defendants admitted the plaintiff's title as zemindar and it is quite clear that the issue between the parties was, whether or not the plaintiff was entitled to oust the defendants from the possession of the grove and well. The facts are very clearly stated by the learned Judge of this Court from whose judgment this Letters Patent Appeal has been preferred. I will nevertheless state them very shortly. The zemindar agreed with one Lekhraj that he should plant the plot in question with fruit trees and should pay a yearly rent which was subsequently slightly enhanced. Lekhraj, in pursuance of the agreement, planted the grove and made the pucca well in question. Subsequently, he sold the grove and well to the defendants and died without leaving heirs. The plaintiff claims that under these circumstances, the defendants have no rights and that he is entitled to take possession and enjoy the grove and well planted and made by Lekhraj.

It seems to me that this claim is not well founded. Prima facie, every one is entitled to transfer any property or right he may possess. I think that Lekhraj had rights as the result of his having planted the grove and made the well in pursuance of his agreement with the zemindars. Indeed it was admitted that Lekhraj could not himself have been dispossessed, nor could his heirs if he had left them. No doubt this prima facie right of transfer may be restricted by custom or by Act of the Legislature. As for example, tenants of certain class of holdings are prohibited by the Tenancy Act from transferring their holdings. There is, in my opinion, however, nothing in the Tenancy Act to prevent a person possessed of such rights as Lekhraj had from transferring such rights. Of course, if I thought that the rights of Lekhraj were those of an occupancy or non-occupancy tenant, or that such rights were appurtenant to an occupancy or non-occupancy holding, I would hold that he had no right to transfer. It was, however, never alleged in the plaint nor apparently contended in either of the lower Courts below or in the second appeal to this Court that Lekhraj was an occupancy or non-occupancy tenant of the grove and well, or that such rights as he possessed were appurtenant to such a tenancy. Furthermore, I do not consider that such a contention could have been successfully put forward. Assuming that Lekhraj was a tenant of the land, his right to use it was limited to growing and maintaining the trees. He could not use the land for ordinary purposes of agriculture. His position was in fact that of a "grove-holder"—a position well known and recognised.

I would dismiss the appeal and affirm the decision of the three Courts by which the case has been already decided.

MALKAPPA DOD CHANBASAPAGOWDA v. MUDKAPPA BASAPPA MUDIGAVDAR.

BANERJI, J.—I regret I am unable to take the same view as the learned Chief Justice as to the competency of a person who plants a grove with the permission of the landholder upon an agreement to pay him rent, to transfer the grove, so as to confer on the purchaser a right to continue in possession of the grove against the wishes of the landholder. In my opinion, such a person is a tenant as defined in the Agra Tenancy Act, section 4, being a person by whom rent is paid and 'rent' according to that Act means, among other things, payments made on account of a grove. As he is not a tenant of the classes of tenants whose interest is under the Act transferable (see section 20), he has no right, in the absence of a contract or custom to the contrary, to transfer the grove. However, I do not desire to pursue the matter further, as it seems to me the question was practically decided in Muhammad Yasin v. Ilahi Buksh (1), which was an appeal under the Letters Patent from one of my judgments. I am afraid I am bound by the ruling in that case. I, therefore, agree in dismissing this appeal.

BY THE COURT.—The order of the Court is that the appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Adverse possession—Co-sharers—Hindu Law—Joint family property—One co-sharer in possession for all—Alienation by co-sharer in possession—Continuance of alienor in possession—Knowledge of exclusion—Limitation Act (XV of 1877), Sch. II, Arts. 127, 144

A. and B. were members of a joint Hindu family. A. held possession on behalf of himself and his co-parcener till 1880, when A. sold the property to a stranger C. A., however, continued in possession and passed a rent-note in favour of his vendee, C. There was nothing in the circumstances to put B. on notice that any change of possession had occurred or that his title was in any way imperilled.

In 1906, B. sued for possession of his share by partition:

Held, (1) that the suit was not barred by limitation;

(2) that before the alienation, the possession of A. was more or less of a fiduciary character and it was the possession of all the co-sharers; it could not begin to be adverse without intimation by the co-parcener in possession conveyed to the other co-parcener that he intended to exclude him.

Per Chandavarkar, J.—The question of adverse possession between co-parceners inter se is governed by Article 127 of the Limitation Act. Article 144 applies where the question is as between a co-parcener in a joint Hindu family and a stranger to it.

If a co-parcener has alienated property belonging to the family, so as to exclude other co-parceners from it, adverse possession in favour of the alienee begins to run from the date of alienation and the consequent exclusion of the co-parceners.

The law is that the Court is always too loth to hold adverse possession proved where the possession is equivocal in character.

Lallubhai Bapubhai v. Mankubarbai, 2 B. 388 at p. 417, followed.

Per Batchelor, J.—To constitute an adverse possession against the real owner, possession must be in some way or other ostensibly adverse.

Mr. M. V. Bhat, for the Appellant.

Mr. G. S. Mulgaonkar, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.

CHANDAVARKAR, J.—The question which arises in this appeal is one of adverse possession under Article 144 of the Limitation Act. The facts shortly are: the lands in dispute belonged originally to the plaintiffs and defendant No. 1 as members of a joint Hindu family. Defendant No. 1 held possession of them on behalf of himself and his co-parceners till 1880 when he sold the property to defendant No. 2. But defendant No. 1 continued in possession and passed a rent-note in favour of the 2nd defendant, his vendee. The question is whether this suit for partition which was brought in the year 1906 is barred by reason of the adverse possession of defendant No. 2 from the date of his sale.

Now, it is true the question of adverse possession between co-parceners inter se is governed by Article 127 of the Limitation

MOHAN LAL v. Musammat JUMERAT.

Act. But Article 144 applies where the question is as between a co-parcener in a joint Hindu family and a stranger to it. If a co-parcener has alienated property belonging to the family, so as to exclude other co-parceners from it, adverse possession in favour of the alienee begins to run from the date of the alienation and the consequent exclusion of the co-parceners. In the present case, defendant No. 2, the alienee, did not go into possession but allowed defendant No. 1, his vendor, to continue in the character of tenant under him. It is argued that that constructive possession entitles the second defendant to reckon the period of adverse possession from the date of his sale. But the objection in law to that argument is this:—Before the alienation defendant, No. 1 had held possession for himself and his co-parceners. His possession was, therefore, more or less of a fiduciary character, and it was the possession of all. It could not begin to be adverse without intimation by the co-parcener in possession conveyed to the other co-parceners that he intended to exclude them. So long as defendant No. 1 was in possession, notwithstanding his sale to defendant No. 2, his co-parceners would have no reason to suppose that he held adversely and intended to change the original character of that possession. Defendant No. 1 could not hold for both his co-parceners and defendant No. 2. Therefore, for adverse possession to run from the date of the sale, it was necessary for either of the defendants to do something to change the character of defendant No. 1's possession, and that to the knowledge of the co-parceners excluded. Defendant No. 2's title was merely on paper, and he could not rely upon the possession of defendant No. 1, as that of his tenant, because side by side with that, there was the undisturbed possession of defendant No. 1 as the agent of his family. Therefore, the character of the possession of defendant No. 1 being of an equivocal character, there was nothing on which adverse possession could operate. The law is that the Court is always too loth to hold adverse possession proved where the possession is equivocal in character: Lallubhai Bapubhai v. Mankubarbai (1).

(1) 2 B. 388 at p. 417.

On these grounds, the decree of the Court below must be reversed and the case sent back for disposal on the merits.

Costs to be costs in the appeal.

BATCHELOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me to be impossible to hold that the plaintiffs can be prejudiced by reason of the fact that a deed of sale was executed behind their back by their agent, the first defendant, in favour of a stranger, the second defendant. In spite of this deed of sale, there was no transfer of possession, but possession remained, as uptil then it had always been, with the first defendant who is the agent of the plaintiffs in that behalf. There was nothing in these circumstances to put the plaintiffs on notice that any change of possession had occurred, or that their title was in any way imperilled. As was said by Mr. Justice Batty in Tarabai v. Venkat Rao (2), to constitute an adverse possession against the real owner, possession must be in some way or other ostensibly adverse. In this case, the possession remained ostensibly that which it had always been, with the result that the purchaser's possession was not adverse to the plaintiffs.

Decree reversed.

Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Sch. I., Arts. 7, 102—Wet-nurse—Domestic servant—Suit for wages—Limitation.

A wet-nurse does not come within the definition of a house-hold servant; hence a suit by her to recover her wages does not fall under Article 7 of the Limitation Act, but falls under Article 102 of the Act.

Civil revision against an order of the Judge, Small Cause Court, Jhansi.

Mr. Sital Prasad Ghosh, for the Applicant.

Mr. Durga Charan Banerjee, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application in revision under section 25 of the Small Cause Courts Act. The facts, which have led to the making of the present application, are as follows:—Musammat Jumerat, the opposite party, was employed by the applicant in December 1907, to suckle and nurse his infant girl. Musammat Jumerat served the applicant up to January 1910. In November 1910, she instituted a suit, in the Court of Small Causes at Jhansi, to recover Rs. 150 on the allegation that she had been employed by the applicant at Rs. 10 a month to suckle and nurse his child and served him for 26 months, for which she had not been paid anything. She gave up her claim for Rs. 110 and claimed only Rs 150. The defendant-applicant denied having employed Musammat Jumerat as a wet-nurse at Rs. 10 per month. He further pleaded that the claim was barred by limitation. The learned Judge disallowed the pleas in defence and decreed the claim for Rs. 150. It is urged on behalf of the applicant in this Court that the case falls under Article 7, Schedule I of the Limitation Act, 1908, as Musammat Jumerat was a house-hold servant. Her wages became due at the end of every month, and her cause of action accrued on the default in payment of her wages at the end of the month and hence the claim is clearly barred except for three months. For the opposite party, the contention is that Musammat Jumerat is not a house-hold servant and that her case is covered by Article 115 of the first Schedule of Act IX of 1908. No authority has been cited on either side to show whether a wet-nurse does or does not fall within the definition of a house-hold servant. I do not think that a wet-nurse can properly come under the definition of house-hold servant. The case of Musammat Jumerat does not, in my opinion, fall under Article 7 of the first Schedule of the Limitation Act. I think her case is covered by Article 102 of that Schedule and her claim is, therefore, within time. The application is, therefore, dismissed with costs.

Application dismissed.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA—RESPONDENT.

Bhagdari tenure, nature of—Bhagdari village—Right of bhagdar to village site—Land forming road-way —Bombay Land Revenue Code (Bom. Act V of 1879), s. 37.

Land forming road-ways through the village site of a bhagdari village is the property of the Government.

All the land forming the village site of a bhagdari village is not the property of the bhagdars.

The bhagdari tenure is nothing more than a particular system of collecting the revenues for the Government.

A bhagdar is entitled only to those village fields which are assigned to him, and to that portion of the village site which is assigned to him for residence.

A bhagdar has no higher title to his assigned land in the village site than he has to his assigned land in the village fields. He cannot make any claim to the proprietorship of such lands, as he is liable to pay rent or assessment to the Government for these lands.

First appeal from the decision of the District Judge of Broach, in Suit No. 11 of 1908.

Mr. D. A. Khare, for the Appellant.

Mr. L. A. Shah, Acting Government Pleader, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—In the suit out of which this appeal arises, the plaintiff, who is a bhagdari resident of the bhagdari village of Kantharia in Broach, sued for a declaration that the defendant had no title or interest in a certain piece of land in the village site, on which land the plaintiff had fixed pegs for the tethering of his cattle. He sought also a permanent injunction restraining defendant from interfering with his tethering his cattle on the piece of land in suit which was situated just outside his house. The learned District Judge dismissed the suit, being of opinion, that the bhagdars were not, as the plaintiff contended that they were, owners of the village site; that the land in suit was part of a public way used by certain inhabitants of the village, and, consequently, under section 37 of the Land Revenue Code, was the property of Government.

In appealing from this decree, the plaintiff, through his Pleader, has taken as his main ground the proposition that land in the village sites of bhagdari villages is the property of the bhagdars and not of the Government. It seems to us that that proposition is not established. On the contrary, we agree with the learned Judge in thinking that in such villages the land forming the road-ways through the village site is the property of the Government. The particular strip of land, here in suit, is part of a gully or lane which leads directly from the main public road to the collection of houses situate round about the plaintiff's house. It appears from the map, and it is proved by the village Talati, who upon this point was not cross-examined, that this strip of land in suit is part of a way or lane open to the villagers, and used by them freely upon all occasions. We are of opinion, therefore, that it is established that the somewhat indefinite parcel of land in dispute is a portion of a public road-way.

That being so, upon what ground can the plaintiff claim that he is entitled to the relief which he here seeks? We were referred to the report made by Mr. Peddar in 1862, on the subject of this narwa and bhagdari tenure. And certain passages in that report were quoted as authority for the view that all the land forming the village site in a bhagdari village was the property of the bhagdars. It appears to us, however, that no part of the report authorizes any such proposition. Indeed, the report itself seems to us to show that the bhagdari tenure is nothing more than a particular system of collecting the revenues for the Government. In paragraph 28 of the report, Mr. Peddar, says:—"I have shown, I hope, that the narwadars and bhagdars are merely the old proprietary cultivators, and the system only a mode of sharing the Government demands." A similar view of the meaning of the system was expressed by Lieut.-Colonel Monier Williams in his "Memoir on the Zilla of Baroochi," and also in Baden Powell's "Land Systems of British India." The result of these historical references is, we think, to show that the tenure is merely one mode of collecting the revenue demands of the Government. But we find no authority for the view that the legal position of Government is altered in reference to the demands of any particular bhagdar. The bhagdar, it seems to us, is entitled only to those village fields which are assigned to him, and to that portion of the village site which is assigned to him for residence. Those two portions taken together form his bhag, which he is not entitled to alienate otherwise than as a whole. What part of the village site is assigned to particular bhagdars is shown by the Gabhan-patrak, which in this case is Exhibit 75, a document prepared in 1866, or within a few years of the passing of the Bhagdari Act. This record shows that the particular piece of land, now in dispute, forms no part either of the plot assigned to the plaintiff's bhag or of the plot assigned to any other resident of the village. The inference derivable from this circumstance is strengthened by reference to the Vahivat-patra, Exhibit 64, paragraph 14 of which recites that: "in this village, public roads having been made on bhag land, such land has been included in Government land." The meaning of that seems to be clear, namely, that public road-ways even when made through lands, which would otherwise be bhag land, are included in Government land.

It appears to us, moreover, that so far as the bhagdhari tenure is concerned, it cannot give the plaintiff any higher title to his assigned land in the village site than he has to his assigned land in the village fields. And in regard to these latter lands, he is indisputably liable to pay rent or assessment to the Government. He cannot, therefore, make any claim to the proprietorship of such lands.

In this case, apart from the general considerations to which we have alluded, there is particular evidence strongly in favour of the respondent. The oral evidence, which comes largely from parties interested on the other side, favours the defendant's case rather than the plaintiff's. And the record contains two distinct admissions, and one implied admission, made by the present plaintiff and wholly irreconcilable with the case which he now puts forward in this suit.

Upon the whole, therefore, we agree with the learned District Judge in thinking that the plaintiff has failed to make out the case for which he was contending and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLVII, r. 7—Order granting review—Appeal—Dismissal in default—Restoration on review.

A suit was dismissed for default. An application for restoration was also dismissed. The plaintiff then applied for review of judgment. The Court of first instance allowed the application for review and restored the suit to its original number. On appeal, the District Judge reversed the order of the first Court granting the application for review, on the ground that no review could be granted when an application for restoration had been dismissed:

Held, that this was not a ground upon which an appeal could be allowed under the provisions of Order XLVII, rule 7.

Application for revision against the judgment of the District Judge of Farrukhabad.

Mr. Gulzari Lal, for the Applicant.

Mr. A. P. Dube, for the Opposite Party.

JUDGMENT.—A suit was dismissed under the provisions of Order IX, rule 8, of the Code of Civil Procedure. An application under Order IX, rule 9, to have the order of dismissal set aside was also dismissed. The plaintiff again applied under Order XLVII, rule 1, for review of judgment. The Court of first instance allowed that application and setting aside its former orders directed that the suit be restored to its original number. The defendant appealed and the learned District Judge has reversed the order of the Court of first instance and directed that the application for review be dismissed. The plaintiff comes here in revision, and it is contended on his behalf that the Court below had no jurisdiction to hear the appeal from the Court of first instance except on the grounds set out in Order XLVII, rule 7. That rule provides that an order rejecting an application for review of judgment shall not be appealable, but an order granting review shall be appealed against on grounds specified in clauses (a), (b) or (c) following. None of the reasons given by the Court below for allowing the appeal comes under clauses (a), (b) or (c) of rule 7. The provision of rule 2 of Order XLVII does not apply. Rule 4 is also not applicable under the circumstances. The Court below gave as its reason for allowing the appeal that as the application for restoration had been dismissed, the plaintiff cannot come again and ask for a review of judgment. This is not one of the grounds upon which an appeal could be allowed under the provisions of Order XLVII, rule 7. I allow this application, set aside the order of the Court below and restore the order of the Court of first instance. The costs of this application will be the costs in the case.

Pensions Act (XXIII of 1871), s. 4—Jurisdiction—Civil suit—Deshpande Kulkarni Vatan—Suit for declaration of share in cash allowance—Collector's certificate.

A suit to obtain a declaration that the plaintiffs are owners of an eight-anna share in the Deshpande Kulkarni Vatan, consisting of a cash allowance paid annually from the treasury whether coupled with a prayer to recover the actual cash received or not, falls within the class of suits defined by section 4 of the Pensions Act, and is, consequently, not maintainable in a Civil Court without a Collector's certificate.

Second appeal from the decision of the first class Subordinate Judge, at Thana, in Appeal No. 84 of 1909, varying that passed by the Subordinate Judge at Pen, in Civil Suit No. 483 of 1907.

Mr. D. A. Khare, for the Appellant.

Mr. N. M. Samarth, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The point raised for the appellants defendants in this appeal is that under sections 4 and 6 of the Pensions Act XXIII of 1871, this suit does not lie without a certificate from the Collector. Admittedly, such a certificate was refused on the plaintiffs' application. The only question, therefore, now before us is whether section 4 of the Pensions Act debars the Civil Court from entertaining the suit without such a certificate. It appears to us that if regard is had to nothing but the words of section 4 of the Statute and to the pleadings and the nature of this suit, there can be no reasonable doubt but that Civil Court is ousted of its jurisdiction. Section 4 lays down that:—"No Civil Court shall entertain any suit relating to any pension or grant of money or land-revenue conferred or made by the British or any former Government, whatever may have been the consideration for any such pension or grant, and whatever may have been the nature of the payment, claim, or right for which such pension or grant may have been substituted." And the present suit is explicitly and in terms a suit to obtain a declaration that the plaintiffs are the owners of an eight-annas share in the Deshpande Kulkarni Vatan, which now consists of a cash allowance of Rs. 122, paid annually from the treasury at Pen. The plaintiffs seek also for a declaration of their right to receive the amount of their share from the first defendant, the registered Vatan-holder. On its face, therefore, the suit is clearly a suit relating to a pension or grant of money conferred by the British Government. It is pointed out by Mr. Samarth, for the respondents-plaintiffs, that they withdrew their prayer to recover the actual cash received, and restricted their suit to a claim for a declaration that they were entitled to an eight-annas share in this cash allowance in respect of the Deshpande Kulkarni Vatan. Even upon this footing, however, it seems to us that the suit is nonetheless barred, for it seems to us not possible reasonably to maintain that the suit falls outside the class of suits defined by section 4 of the Pensions Act.

Reliance was placed for the respondents on this Court's decision in Govind Sitaram v. Bapuji Mahadeo (1), a decision which does, no doubt, at first sight afford some countenance to the respondent's case. But upon the best consideration which we can give to Sargent, C. J.'s judgment in that case, we must read it as based upon the view that the suit then under notice was capable of being regarded, and was by the Court regarded, as being substantially a mere suit for a declaration of the then plaintiffs' status as Vatandars. No such view can be taken of the present plaint, with its specific claim for a share in the cash allowances of the Vatan, and it follows that there is nothing in Sitaram's case (1), which is inconsistent with the application of section 4 of the Pensions Act to the present suit.

There is, however, a decision of this Court which is of direct authority on the facts now before us and which supports the opinion we have formed: we refer to Babaji Hari v. Rajaram Ballal (2), where Mr. Justice West, after allowing all possible weight to what he describes as the anterior improbability of the Legislature's having intended to shut out such suits from the jurisdiction of the Courts, comes to the conclusion that the plain grammatical meaning of section 4 must prevail, and that such a suit as this must be ousted. In that case, the plaintiff had sued to have his right declared to a ninth share in certain Vatans of some villages in Satara, and Mr. Justice West, for the reasons which are set out in the judgment, held that section 4 imposed a complete bar to the Courts' jurisdiction in so far as the suit had reference to the cash allowance payable by the Government. The learned Judge said: "As it stands, the section extends to all suits relating to any grant of money made by Government; and the plaintiff, who seeks a share in such a grant from his alleged co-sharers, must, we think, be said to bring a suit relating to the grant." It is, in our opinion, impossible to draw any distinction of substance between the plaint which was then under consideration and that which is before us now.

We are of opinion, on these grounds, that the suit falls within the bar of section 4 of the Pensions Act, and must be dismissed with costs. We, therefore, allow this appeal, reverse the decree and dismiss the suit with costs throughout.

Decree reversed.

Appeal from a judgment and decree of the High Court at Bombay, dated the 20th of January 1910*, reversing a judgment and decree of the High Court (Original Side) dated the 8th of March 1909.†

FACTS.—The facts which gave rise to the litigation were as follows :—The plaintiff-respondent, Nandlal, was carrying on business in Bombay as a merchant, commission agent, money-lender and banker in 1903. The defendant No. 2, Lakhmidas, was a cotton merchant and a muccadum or warehouseman. The plaintiff alleged that he had entrusted to the care of the said Lakhmidas 399 bales of cotton to be warehoused for which amanat or deposit receipt was given. In August 1903, he was informed that Lakhmidas purported to pledge the said bales to the Bank of Bombay in whose godowns two of his bales were found. The custody of the bales did not clothe Lakhmidas with legal possession of the said goods and, therefore, he could not pledge and the Bank acquired no title by the pledge. Further, the Bank did not act in good faith and took the goods in pledge under very suspicious circumstances. The Head of Shroff Department of the said Bank was a partner with Lakhmidas in certain cotton speculations and that he was well aware of all his business transactions. The Bank had failed to deliver up the bales of cotton. The Bank stated that it was not aware of the fact that the alleged bales of cotton belonged to the plaintiff and that certain bales of cotton were pledged with it to secure advances from time to time. It was not known to the Bank that any improper dealings were taking place and that it took in pledge the bales in good faith from a merchant who was doing business in cotton on a very large scale on his own account. Later in the proceedings, the Bank applied that pleadings be amended by the addition of the allegation that whatever bales of cotton were pledged with them were removed and sold by the pledger, Lakhmidas, before the Bank received any intimation from the plaintiff. The High Court (Original Side) decided in favour of the Bank and delivered judgment on March 8, 1909. Against this decision, an appeal was lodged and the judgment of the High Court(Appellate Side) was given on January 20, 1910, reversing the judgment of the lower Court

Sir A. Cripps, K. C., and Mr. McCardie, on behalf of the Appellant, contended that the High Court wrongly construed section 178 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, and read into it words of limitation which were not contained therein. The Bank was never guilty of conversion, nor of any actionable wrong either by keeping or restoring goods to the person who deposited them, though the depositor may not have any authority from the owner. The Bank had no notice whatever that the cotton belonged to the plaintiff.

M. Atkins, K. C., and Mr. Lowndes, for the Respondent, contended that the plaintiff was the owner of the bales of cotton in question, which being pledged by Lakhmidas with the Bank, were converted. The pledge was invalid as Lakhmidas was a muccadum and had no power to pledge, that the Bank took the pledge under circumstances which were such as to raise a reasonable presumption that Lakhmidas was acting improperly. The Bank ought not to have been allowed to adduce evidence to show that any of the bales had been returned and that there was no sufficient evidence to show that any of the bales had in fact been so returned. Even the return of the bales of cotton to Lakhmidas and subsequent sale thereof by him in fraud of the plaintiff would not exonerate the Bank from liability. In any case, the plaintiff should be allowed to stand in the shoes of Lakhmidas to claim from the Bank the marshalling of securities held by the Bank from the said Lakhmidas.

Sir A. Cripps, heard in reply.

JUDGMENT.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—This is an appeal from an order and decree of the High Court of Bombay in its appellate jurisdiction, reversing the order and decree of Beaman, J., who tried the case originally. The trial Judge dismissed the suit without costs as against the first defendants, the Bank of Bombay, who are the present appellants. The Court of appeal, consisting of Scott, C. J., and Batchelor, J., made a decree in favour of the plaintiff with costs.

The plaintiff, a merchant in Bombay, by his plaint which was filed so far back as November 1904, claimed delivery of 399 bales of cotton which had been entrusted to the second defendant Lakhmidas as muccadum or warehouseman and, as the plaintiff alleged, improperly pledged by him to the Bank. In the alternative, the plaintiff claimed payment of the value of the bales in question, and in the event of it being held that he was not entitled to any such relief as aforesaid, then he asked that his rights should be ascertained and declared suggesting that the securities deposited by Lakhmidas with the Bank should be marshalled in his favour.

The case was not brought to a hearing until January 1909. For this delay, both parties seem to have been equally to blame. Various irrelevant issues were raised and various irrelevant defences were set up, and there were interlocutory applications protracted and all apparently futile. Both parties seem to have been in the dark as to the real facts of the case which were not elucidated until the suit was at hearing, though apparently the plaintiff might have discovered the facts from Lakhmidas' books which were accessible to him, and the Bank ought to have been able to produce an accurate record of their dealings with their customers.

There were 21 issues originally settled. In the course of the hearing, an additional issue was proposed by the learned Counsel for the Bank, and allowed without opposition on the part of the plaintiff. It was in the following terms: "Whether the Bank has been guilty of any conversion in respect of the goods in suit?" Upon that issue, the case ultimately turned.

The material facts, as ascertained during the trial, may be stated shortly.

Lakhmidas, though now insolvent and under sentence of imprisonment for criminal breach of trust, was in good credit in the early part of 1903 and then carrying on business in Bombay both as a cotton merchant on an extensive scale and also as a muccadum or warehouseman. He was financed by the Bank, and in the habit of pledging cotton with the Bank to secure his account for cash advances and cash credits, and in the habit of withdrawing parcels of cotton so pledged when and as he disposed of them in the course of his business, leaving, of course, an amount sufficient to cover his liability to the Bank or else substituting other cotton for the cotton so withdrawn.

At that time, the Managers of the Bank had no reason to suppose that Lakhmidas was carrying on any business but that of a cotton merchant. They were assured that he had given up the business of a muccadum, which at one time was carried on by his firm, though, undoubtedly, a man in their employ, whose duty it was to obtain information for the Bank with regard to their customers, was aware that Lakhmidas was carrying on the business of a warehouseman as well as that of a cotton merchant. This man seems to have been in partnership with Lakhmidas or in collusion with him.

In February 1903, the plaintiff, as purchaser of the bales in question in this suit, or in some other manner interested therein, took delivery of them and entrusted them to Lakhmidas as warehouseman. Lakhmidas immediately pledged them with the Bank. For a time they were deposited in the open air Jettha at Colaba, which is said to have been leased by him in the name and on behalf of the Bank.

About the end of April or early in May 1903, on the approach of the monsoon, all the cotton in the possession of Lakhmidas at Colaba was removed by him into godowns leased by the Bank and placed there in the Bank's custody.

In June and July 1903, all the bales of cotton in suit, with the exception of two (as to which there is no question now), having been sold by Lakhmidas were withdrawn from the Bank's godowns and passed out to Lakhmidas or to his order.

No claim to this cotton was made by the plaintiff against the Bank before it passed out of the hands of the Bank. The Bank had no notice or reason to suspect that it belonged to any one but Lakhmidas, or that anyone but Lakhmidas had any right or title thereto or any interest therein.

The fact that the cotton was returned to Lakhmidas, or parted with to his order, was established during the cross-examination of Lakhmidas, called as a witness by the plaintiff, and proved by inspection of his books.

The plaintiff strongly objected to any evidence being given as to this fact, inasmuch as it had not been pleaded by the Bank as a defence to the suit. But the learned Judge held, and, in the opinion of their Lordships, held rightly, that the fact could not be excluded having regard to the claim to marshal securities set up by the plaintiff.

If the evidence on this head was properly admitted, it seems to their Lordships that it must be admissible for all purposes.

Their Lordships think that the fact that the Bank parted with the cotton deposited with them to or to the order of the person by whom it was deposited without notice of any claim by any other person affords a complete defence to the suit.

Their Lordships agree in the finding of the learned trial Judge that the Bank acted throughout in good faith—a finding which does not seem to have been questioned on the appeal to the High Court. Nor indeed do they think that there would have been any imputation on the conduct of the Bank if the Managers of the Bank had known that Lakhmidas was a muccadum as well as a cotton merchant, though, of course, for their own protection they would have been careful in dealing with him if they dealt with him at all had they known that he carried on both businesses. No one is bound to suspect dishonesty in a person of good credit and reputation with whom he is dealing merely because that person occupies a position which would enable him to act dishonestly if he were a rogue.

Taking the view which their Lordships do of this case, it is unnecessary for them to express any opinion on the construction of Section 178 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872.

Having regard to the loose manner in which the business of the Bank was conducted, and the way in which the suit was defended, their Lordships are of opinion that the appellants are not entitled to any costs.

Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that the order appealed from should be discharged without costs—any costs already paid being re-paid, and the order of Beaman, J., should be restored.

There will be no costs of the appeal.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), s. 92—Public religious trust—Suit by trustees for recovery of trust property from outsiders—Outsiders heirs of late manager.

provisions of section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908. The mere fact that these persons in possession are heirs of the late manager of the trust property is immaterial.

Second appeal from the decision of the first class Subordinate Judge, at Beglaum, in Appeal No. 299 of 1910, confirming that passed by the Subordinate Judge at Chikodi, in Civil Suit No. 565 of 1909.

Mr. Nilkanth Atmaram, for the Appellant.

Mr. C. A. Rele, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—We are of opinion that in this case the lower Courts were wrong in thinking that this was a suit governed by the provisions of section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code. The suit was brought by the plaintiffs as trustees of a public religious trust. They were appointed trustees on the 26th April 1903. The defendants' father had been manager of the trust property from 1883 up to his death in 1905. After his death, his accounts were examined by the plaintiffs-trustees who discovered, as they allege, that a large balance due to the temple was with him. They, therefore, as trustees, now sue to recover property belonging to the trust which has gone wrongfully into the possession of defendants who are strangers to the trust. To such a suit as this, section 92 has no application: it is a suit, not by persons interested in the trust against defaulting trustees, but by the trustees against outsiders alleged to be in wrongful possession of the trust property. The extent and meaning of this section are well explained in Lakshmandas Parashram v. Ganpatrav Krishna (1); Strinivasa Ayyangar v. Strinivasa Swami (2) and Budree Das Mukim v. Chooni Lall Johurry (3). And these decisions show that the present suit is outside the scope of section 92.

It is faintly suggested by Mr. Rele in this second appeal that his clients themselves should be regarded as occupying the position of trustees, but, we think, there is no substance in this argument. No such admission was made in the plaint, and no such assertion was made in the written statement. The defendants are only heirs of the late manager and can have no claim to be regarded as trustees.

We must, therefore, allow this appeal, reverse the decree of the lower Appllate Court and remand the suit for trial on its merits.

The appellants must have their costs in this Court and in the lower Appellate Court from the respondents. Costs in the first Court will abide the result.

Decree reversed.

Custom—Alienation by father of ancestral property —Necessity—Burden of proof—"Just debt"—Privy Council Appeal—Concurrent findings—Practice.

In the case of an alienation by a father, governed by Customary Law, the onus of proving necessity for the consideration rests upon the vendee.

An agriculturist male proprietor of lands may alienate ancestral lands as against the reversioners for valid necessity such as a "just debt". A "just debt" means a debt which is actually due and is not immoral, illegal, or opposed to public policy, and has not been contracted as an act of reckless extravagance, or of wanton waste, or with the intention of destroying the interests of the reversioners.

A concurrent finding of fact is conclusive on the point.

Devi Ditta v. Saudagar Singh, 65 P. R. 1900 (F. B); P. L. R. 1900, p. 322, approved.

An appeal by the defendant from a judgment and decree of the Chief Court, dated the 16th day of January 1908, varying a judgment and decree of the District Judge of Gujranwala, dated the 31st day of July 1907.

FACTS.—For facts see 4 Ind. Cas. 632, where the judgment of the Chief Court is reported.

Against the judgment and decree of the Chief Court, the defendant appealed to the Judicial Committee.

Mr. DeGruyther, K. C., (with him Mr. Dube), contended on behalf of the Appellant (defendant) that fair value was paid, that there was no undue influence exercised by the appellant, that the onus to prove that debts were not incurred for necessity, was on the respondents and that if it was a just debt, it was binding on the sons. There was no difference between Hindu Law and Customary Law on this point.

Bhagbut Persad Singh v. Girija Koer (1), Jagan Nath v. Tulsi Das (2), Bahadar Singh v. Des Raj (3), Sardari Mal v. Khan Bahadur Khan (4); Sobha Singh v. Thoba Singh (5), Rattigan's Digest, p. 97, were referred to.

Sir E. Richards, K. C., for the Respondents, contended that the arguments urged were based upon the principles of Hindu Law which were never applied in any Court. There was material difference between the Hindu Law and the Customary Law, as in Hindu Law the question of pious duty on the part of the son to pay off his father's debt very greatly affected the law. According to the Punjab Customary Law, the point was the restriction of the power of alienation. [SIR JOHN EDGE: The case was not fought out on the merits of Hindu Law.] It was the duty of the vendee to inquire into the necessity of the debt incurred.

Dr. Majid following argued that the Punjab Customary Law was like the Common Law in England. If it was proved that the case was to be determined by Customary Law, then it had to be decided according to certain fixed principles which prevail all over the Punjab amongst the agriculturists. The Punjab Alienation Act operated in the same way. In case of the agriculturists (and in the present case plaintiffs were Jats), the presumption was that general custom of the Punjab applied and the party which asserted to the contrary had to prove his assertion by way of special custom. The Punjab Laws Act also laid down that in this Province custom was the primary rule of decision.

[LORD MOULTON: You put it even higher than your leader.]

(4) 11 P. R. 1899.
(5) 14 P. R. 1899.

[LORD MOULTON: The question is also what the custom is?]

The custom applicable to this case was the general custom of the Punjab which laid down that a father could not alienate his ancestral property without necessity. What the necessity was had to be proved with reference to the particular part of the Province. In this case, the plaintiffs were Jats and no question of special custom arose. Unlike Hindu Law, a vendee was bound to inquire into the necessity. If there was any analogy between the Hindu Law and the Customary Law, it was in alienation by a widow governed by the Mitakshara and by a father of his ancestral land under Customary Law. The father of the plaintiffs had incurred debts to the knowledge of the defendant, which were not for necessity.

JUDGMENT.

SIR JOHN EDGE.—This is an appeal by the defendant in the suit from a decree, dated the 16th January 1909, of the Chief Court of the Punjab, which varied a decree, dated the 31st July 1907, of the District Judge of Gujranwala.

The plaintiffs, who are Sikh Jats, and the sons of Sardar Gurbakhsh Singh, deceased, brought their suit in the Court of the District Judge of Gujranwala, to obtain possession of ancestral lands which had been conveyed in their life-time by their father to the defendant by a deed dated the 26th August 1892.

They alleged in their plaint that, according to the custom of the agriculturists of the Punjab, their father was not competent to sell the ancestral lands without necessity, and that their father was a debauchee and an extravagant person, and there was no necessity for the sale, and they prayed for a decree cancelling the sale-deed and for possession on condition that they should pay to the defendant the money, if any, which might be proved to have been paid by the defendant to their father for valid necessity. The defendant, so far as is now material, alleged in his written statement that he purchased the land in good faith on payment of lawful consideration without knowledge that the plaintiffs' father was a debauchee and an extravagant person, that no debt was contracted by their father without necessity, and that the debt which their father contracted with him was spent for valid necessities. The defendant did not, in his written statement, deny that the plaintiffs and their father were agriculturists to whom the custom alleged by the plaintiffs would apply.

According to the sale-deed of the 26th August 1892, the consideration was Rs. 18,000, the details of which stated in that deed were—

	Rs.
Left with the vendee for payment to Din Muhammad Beg, Muhammad Amin Beg, Bodh Raj and Jagan Nath, the previous mortgagees ...	9,500
Credited to the vendee on account of previous debt, principal and interest due to him under a bond, dated the 13th February 1891 ...	4,650
Credited to the vendee, on account of the previous debt, principal, and interest due to him under bahi account entered on leaf No. 115 ...	3,350
Now received in cash before the Sub-Registrar ...	500

As it must be taken as admitted on the pleadings that the custom alleged by the plaintiffs applied, the onus of proving the validity as against the plaintiffs of the consideration was upon the defendant, the vendee. On that basis, the case was fought in the Courts below.

It was found as a fact by the District Judge, and on appeal by the Chief Court, that the plaintiffs' father, the late Sardar Gurbakhsh Singh, was recklessly extravagant, and that he did not know how to manage his affairs properly. That concurrent finding has an important bearing on the question of necessity, as the payment of a just debt by the male proprietor of lands to which the custom applies is a necessity for which he can validly as against the reversioners alienate ancestral lands. It was held in this connection by a Full Bench of the Chief Court of the Punjab, and as their Lordships consider correctly, in Devi Ditta v. Saudagur Singh (14), that a "just debt" means a debt which is actually due and is not immoral, illegal, or opposed to public policy, and has not been contracted as an act of reckless extravagance, or of wanton waste, or with the intention of destroying the interests of the reversioners.

The District Judge and on appeal the Chief Court dealt with the items composing the Rs. 18,000 as set out in detail in the sale-deed of the 26th August 1892. It appears that the lands or some of them, which were included in the sale-deed of the 26th August 1892, had been previously mortgaged to Din Muhammad Beg and others by the plaintiffs' father on the 10th October 1891 for Rs. 6,100 for a period of 20 years with liberty to those mortgagees to make improvements, the cost of which, with interest thereon, the mortgagor undertook to pay at the time of redemption. The District Judge found that the Rs. 6,100 part of the item of Rs. 9,500 was a just antecedent debt, the payment of which was a necessity and that it was not proved to his satisfaction that the balance of the first item, namely Rs. 3,400, was due from Gurbakhsh Singh to Din Muhammad and the other mortgagees or constituted a just debt for the payment of which to Din Muhammad Beg and those other mortgagees of 1891, there was a necessity within the meaning of the custom. With those findings of the District Judge, the Chief Court on appeal concurred. Their Lordships consider that these concurrent findings should be accepted as conclusive so far as the sums of Rs. 6,100 and Rs. 3,400 are concerned.

As to the second item Rs. 4,650 of the detail of consideration, the District Judge, although he was not satisfied that there had been any necessity for the borrowing by Gurbakhsh Singh of some of the amounts which are included in that item and as to others assumed from the recitals in some of the bonds which were produced by the defendant and without further proof that there had been necessity, allowed the whole item of Rs. 4,650 as a charge which the plaintiff should pay to the defendant. The Chief Court, on a careful consideration of the evidence, disallowed the whole of the item Rs. 4,650.

The Judges of the Chief Court considered that the District Judge had not rightly appreciated the rule as to the onus of proof, and they were unable to find that any necessity had been established for the incurring by Gurbakhsh Singh of any of the debts which composed the item of Rs. 4,650. From that conclusion of the Chief Court, their Lordships see no reason to dissent.

The District Judge disallowed Rs. 1,000 of the item of Rs. 3,350 of the detailed consideration, and the whole of the item of Rs. 500, finding that the Rs. 1,000 and the Rs. 500 were debts which Gurbakhsh Singh had incurred as acts of reckless extravagance. The Chief Court found that the District Judge had rightly disallowed the Rs. 1,000 and the Rs. 500, and, pointing out that no mention of the Rs. 3,350 account was made in a consolidating bond which Gurbakhsh Singh executed on 13th February 1891, found that no necessity had been proved for any portion of the item Rs. 3,350. With that conclusion of the Chief Court their Lordships agree.

The result is, that their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed and the decree of the Chief Court be affirmed. The appellant must pay the costs of this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Evidence—Execution of mortgage-deed by father—Suit for sale against son—Circumstances under which it was executed—Oral evidence, admissibility of.

A suit for sale on the basis of a mortgage-deed, executed by a Hindu father, was brought against the mortgagor's son. The deed was executed in lieu of a prior mortgage-deed, which was not produced:

Held, that oral evidence was admissible to prove the circumstances under which the mortgage-deed was executed in order to show that the mortgage was executed for a family necessity.

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge of Benares.

Mr. D. R. Sawhney, for the Appellant.

Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In my opinion, the decision of the Munsif in this case was correct and should not have been disturbed. The suit is based upon a mortgage-deed, executed by Mahadeo Singh, father of the defendants-respondents, in favour of the plaintiff-appellant. The consideration for the mortgage is stated in the deed to be a sum of Rs. 115 due on a previous mortgage executed by Mahadeo Singh and his cousins, Bahadur Singh and Sahadeo Singh. According to the decision in Chandra Deosing v. Mata Prasad (1), the appellant had to prove that the mortgage in suit was made either for family necessity or to secure payment of an antecedent debt. The appellant produced Bahadur Singh (already mentioned) who said that the deed of August the 9th, 1892, was executed on the occasion of a partition between two branches of the family and that the deed in suit was executed on the occasion of a later partition between the members of one of those branches of the family. He says that he and his brother, Sahadeo Singh, were liable to Ram Jar Singh under the deed of 1892, and that on the occasion of the later partition, Mahadeo Singh undertook to pay the amount due to Ram Jar Singh. The Munsif believed the evidence of Bahadur Singh and it is perfectly clear that if that evidence is true and is admissible, the deed in suit was executed in respect of an antecedent debt. On appeal, the District Judge did not say that he disbelieved the evidence of Bahadur Singh, but he said that the whole of it was inadmissible on account of the non-production of the deed of August 9th, 1892, and of the deed by which the later partition was effected. It appears to me that Bahadur Singh did not give the contents of documents. He merely stated the circumstances in which documents were executed. It may possibly be wrong to admit his statement that the execution of the earlier or the later mortgage-deed was one of the terms of the partition. But I can see no reason why he should not prove that the deed in suit was executed on a certain occasion and in consideration of a sum for which Mahadeo Singh and two others were already liable. The learned Judge says that the recitals in the mortgage in suit are not evidence against the defendants. It may be that they are not evidence of the truth of the facts stated in them. But they are surely admissible to rebut the suggestion that Bahadur Singh's evidence has been fabricated for the purpose of this suit. The Distrtict Judge does not say that he disbelieves the evidence of Bahadur Singh. The Munsif said that he believed it. I might remand the case to the District Judge for a fresh finding. But it is open to me under the present Code to decide the question myself. I have no hesitation in accepting the evidence of Bahadur Singh, and I find that the mortgage in suit was executed in consideration of an antecedent debt. I allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the lower Appellate Court and restore that of the Court of first instance with costs in all Courts.

Appeal allowed.

A suit brought by the Court of Wards on behalf of a ward, who is an agriculturist, is governed by the provisions of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act.

In such a suit, the real plaintiff is the ward and it is his status which has to be considered.

A temporary allowance made to a ward for the purposes of maintenance is not conclusive of the ward's status. To ascertain what that status is, regard must be had to the character of the ward's property from which this allowance is derived.

The Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act makes no distinction based on the comparative riches or poverty of the person whose status is being investigated A rich agriculturist is just as much the agriculturist under the Act as a petty agriculturist.

First appeal from the decision of the first class Subordinate Judge of Nasik, in Suit No. 1 of 1911.

Mr. K. H. Kelkar, for the Appellants.

Mr. L. A. Shah, Acting Government Pleader, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The only question involved in this appeal is whether the Court below was right in its view that the suit was governed by the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act on the footing that the plaintiff is an agriculturist. Upon the title of the suit itself, it is brought by "The Collector of Nasik District representing the Court of Wards for the estate of Gopalrao Shivdevrao Rajebahadur."

Mr. Kelkar's first argument is that the real plaintiff is the Court of Wards, and it is that Court's status which should be regarded, and not the status of Gopalrao Shivdevrao. It is, says the learned Pleader, the same case as if a person being himself an agriculturist assigned his property to a non-agriculturist stranger. The assignee could not claim the benefit of the special Act. It appears to us, however, that the Court of Wards bears no resemblance to the assignee in the case put. As appears quite clear from the Court of Wards Act (Bom. Act I of 1905) passim, and especially from sections 2, 4 and 32 thereof, the property remains the property of the ward, and the only manner in which the Court of Wards intervenes is to assume the superintendence of it.

The reason why this suit is brought in the name of the Court of Wards is explained by section 32 of the Act which lays down that in such a case as this, "the Court of Wards, having the superintendence of the Government ward's property, shall be named as the next friend, or guardian for the suit." In other words the ward being temporarily disabled from suing on his own behalf, sues through the Court of Wards. But the plaintiff is nonetheless the ward Gopalrao Shivdevrao, and it is his status, therefore, which alone has to be considered.

A further argument upon this point was endeavoured to be extracted from section 25 of the Act. Mr. Kelkar relying on that section has contended that even assuming that the real plaintiff is the ward Gopalrao, he cannot be considered an agriculturist for the purpose of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act, because his only means of livelihood is the allowance made to him by the Court of Wards under section 25. We think, however, that this temporary allowance made for the purposes of maintenance is not conclusive of the ward's status, but that to ascertain what that status is, regard must be had to the character of the ward's property from which this allowance is derived.

The question, therefore, still remains whether Gopalrao, the plaintiff, is an agriculturist within the meaning of the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act. In that Act, the term 'agriculturist' is defined as "a person who by himself or by his servants or by his tenants earns his livelihood wholly or principally by agriculture". It will be seen that the Act countenances no distinction based upon the comparative riches or poverty of the person whose status is being investigated. In other words, the rich agriculturist is just as much an agriculturist under this Act as the petty agriculturist. If that is so, it would certainly be a surprising result if we were to find that the plaintiff in this case who is a landholder, and nothing else, should not be regarded as an agriculturist, within the definition of the Act. We think, however, that the learned Judge below was right in his view that the plaintiff fell within the definition.

It may be, as Mr. Kelkar has argued, that the Judge was wrong in allowing the Rs. 1,100, received by the ward's mortgagees, and not by the ward himself, to be counted as if that sum formed part of the ward's agricultural income. We say that it may be so, without deciding definitely, because in the view we take of this case, it is not necessary for us to pronounce a decision.

Assuming that Mr. Kelkar's argument on this point is correct, it is, however, nonetheless established in our view that the plaintiff is an agriculturist. On the admitted figures, the yearly income accruing to the plaintiff from the lands paid by his occupancy tenants is Rs. 3,793. The total assessment on all the lands involved comes to Rs. 2,382. From this sum of Rs. 2,382, a certain deduction must be made. What that deduction should be was a point of some argument. We agree with Mr. Shah's contention that the deduction should be the total assessment on all the mortgaged property, that is, the sum of Rs. 885, and we cannot accept the counter-contention that the deduction should be limited only to that part of the assessment which is leviable on the lands exempted. If, therefore, we make this deduction of Rs. 885 from the total assessment of Rs. 2,382, we get as the result Rs. 1,497, which figure will represent the assessment on the non-mortgaged property. This sum of Rs. 1,497 must now be deducted from the sum of Rs. 3,793 to which we have already referred. That leaves us with Rs. 2,296 as the income derivable from the agricultural sources. As against that, the most that we can set on the other side of the account would be a sum of Rs. 1,255 plus something under Rs. 400 as a cash allowance. These two sums would yield only Rs. 1,655 as against Rs. 2,296 derived from agricultural sources. This is the reckoning which, in our opinion, is most favourable to the case for the defendant. And even on this reckoning, it is plain that the plaintiff is entitled to be regarded as an agriculturist under the Dekkhan Agriculturists' Relief Act.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the learned Judge below was right, and we must dismiss this appeal with costs.

As to the scale on which the costs should be allowed, the parties should go first to the Taxing Officer.

Appeal dismissed.

Land Acquisition Act (I of 1894)—Compensation—Different interest in land acquired—How to apportion compensation.

When different persons hold different interests in the land acquired under the Land Acquisition Act, the Court should ascertain the value of the respective interests and apportion the compensation in proportion to such interests.

First appeal from the decision of the District Judge of Saharanpur.

For the order of remand, see 13 Ind. Cas. 420.

Dr. Tej Bahadur Sapru, for the Appellants.

Mr. A. E. Ryves, (with him Mr. Nehal Chand,) for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This case was remitted to the District Judge in order that he might ascertain the respective values of the interests of the appellant and Mrs. Powell in the land in question for which the Superintendent of Dehra Dun has awarded, under the Land Acquisition Act, a sum of Rs. 7,768-8-0. The learned Judge rightly, as we think, set himself to ascertain what were the respective rights of the appellants and Mrs. Powell in the land. He came to the conclusion that Mrs. Powell was what he calls an abadi tenant, having a right to build on the land and to transfer it, that the interest of the appellant in the land was worth no more than Rs. 1,060, and that the balance of the sum awarded by the Superintendent of Dehra Dun, namely, Rs. 6,708-8 0, should be given to Mrs. Powell. But in case this Court did not agree with the view that Mrs. Powell was an abadi tenant, he went on to ascertain the values of the respective rights of the parties in the case on the assumption that Mrs. Powell was an occupancy-tenant of the land. He found that the annual value of Mrs. Powell's interest as an occupancy-tenant was Rs. 22, and the annual value of the appellant's interests as landlords was Rs. 11. He then suggested that Mrs. Powell should be given a sum of Rs. 352, that is, sixteen years' purchase of the annual value of her interests and that the balance should be given to the appellants. We are unable to accept either of these conclusions in their entirety, Mrs. Powell, or rather the person through whom she claims, is recorded as an occupancy-tenant of the land. There is really no evidence as to the circumstances in which or even as to the time when Mrs. Powell's predecessors first obtained the land. Both sides have indulged in much speculation as to what their respective rights must be. One fact stands out clearly, namely, that for the last fifty or sixty years, the land has been used for agricultural purposes, and in the absence of definite evidence as to the respective rights of the parties in the land, we think that the sum awarded should be divided between them in proportion to the values of the interests hitherto enjoyed by them, after making due allowance for the possibility of the rent being enhanced. We accept the finding of the District Judge that the annual value of Mrs. Powell's interest in the land is Rs. 22, and that the annual value of the appellant's interests is Rs. 11. But it seems to us that the whole sum awarded by the Superintendent should be divided amongst them in proportion to the value of their interests, and that there is no justification for what the learned Judge has done, namely, give Mrs. Powell sixteen times the value of her interest and give the appellants the whole of the balance. It would be as wrong, in our opinion, to give the appellants sixteen times the value of their interests in the land and to give Mrs. Powell the whole of the balance. The result is that we hold that the sum in question should be divided in the proportions of $\frac{1}{3}$rd and 2/3rds, $\frac{1}{3}$rd going to the appellants and 2/3rds to Mrs. Powell, that is to say, Rs. 2,590, to the appellants and Rs. 5,178-8-0, to Mrs. Powell. The decree of the Court below is modified accordingly.

Bombay Abkari Act (V of 1878), ss. 32, 67—License to sell liquor—Collector's order cancelling license—Collector honestly believing licensee guilty of bribing officials—Suit against Government—Limitation—Protection in statutory duties.*

If any public or private body charged with the execution of a statute honestly intends to put the law in motion and really and not unreasonably believes in the existence of facts, which, if existent, would justify his acting and acts accordingly, his conduct will be in pursuance of the statute and will be protected.

Where a license for sale of liquor granted to a person was revoked by the Collector under the bona fide belief that the licensee had bribed the Collector's Head Clerk though there was no actual conviction of the licensee:

Held, (1) that the act of the Collector must be regarded as done in pursuance of the statute;

(2) that a suit brought against the Government in respect of the act would be barred if brought after the expiry of four months from the date of the act, even though the licensee unsuccessfully appealed to the Commissioner and the Local Government against the Collector's order of revocation.

First appeal from the decision of the District Judge of Nasik, in Civil Suit No. 2 of 1911.

Mr. Coyaji (with him Mr. R. R. Desai), for the Appellant.

Mr. L. A. Shah, Acting Government Pleader, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT.—The appellant before us, who was the plaintiff in the Court below, had, during the years 1908 to 1910, a license for the sale of country liquor in the town of Nasik. As his work during that period was found to be satisfactory, the Collector of the District gave him notice intimating that that Officer was willing to re-new his license for the year beginning with the 1st of April 1910. On the 14th of March 1910, the plaintiff expressed his willingness to accept the license, and, under section 31 of the Abkari Act (Bom. Act V of 1878), executed the agreement therein referred to. On the 31st March 1910, the Collector informed the plaintiff that his license was suspended, and on the 6th of April following, the Collector further intimated to the plaintiff that he had cancelled the plaintiff's license on the ground that he had come to learn that the plaintiff had given secret bribes to the Collector's Head Clerk. Aggrieved by this decision, the plaintiff appealed from the Collector's revocation of the license to the Commissioner and to Government, but in each case was unsuccessful. Therefore, after notice given, he, on the 30th March 1911, filed this suit.

It has been dismissed by the learned Judge of the lower Court on two grounds, both of them having reference to section 67 of the Bombay Abkari Act. In the first place, the learned District Judge has

---

* The sections run as follows:

Section 32. The Collector may summarily re-call or cancel any license permit or pass granted under this Act—

(a) if any fee or duty payable by the holder thereof be not duly paid, or

(b) in the event of any breach by the holder of such license, permit or pass, or by his servants, or by any one acting with his express or implied permission on his behalf, of any of the terms or conditions of such license, permit or pass, or

(c) if the holder thereof is convicted of any offence against this Act or, any other law for the time being in force relating to Abkari-revenue or of any criminal offence.

Section 67. No action shall lie against Government or against any Abkari officer for damages in any Civil Court for any act bona fide done or ordered to be done by them in pursuance of this Act, or of any law at the time in force relating to Abkari-revenue; and all prosecutions of any Abkari officer, and all actions which may be lawfully brought against Government or against any Abkari officer, in respect of anything done, or alleged to have been done, in pursuance of this Act, shall be instituted within four months from the date of the act complained of, and not afterwards;

and any such action shall be dismissed

(a) if the plaintiff does not prove that, previously to bringing such action, he has presented all such appeals allowed by this Act, or by any other law for the time being in force, as within the aforesaid period of four months it was possible to present; or,

(b) in the case of an action for damages, if tender of sufficient amends shall have been made before the action was brought, or if after the institution of the action a sufficient sum of money is paid into Court with costs, by or on behalf of the defendant:

Provided that nothing in this section shall be deemed to affect the power or jurisdiction of Her Majesty's High Court of Judicature or of the Court of Small Causes at Bombay, held that the defendant is protected by reason of the provision that "no action shall lie against Government for any act bona fide done by them in pursuance of the Act;" and, secondly, he has held that the suit is time-barred by reason of the provision requiring that "all actions which may be lawfully brought against Government, in respect of anything done in pursuance of the act, shall be instituted within four months from the date of the act complained of and not afterwards."

Upon both grounds, it appears to us to be clear that the learned Judge below is right. Admittedly, the act complained of was the act of revoking the plaintiff's license, which was done by the Collector on the 31st March 1910, and admittedly the plaintiff's suit was instituted very much more than four months after that act. It is sought by the learned Counsel for the appellant to save the suit on the footing that the Collector's act was not an act bona fide done in pursuance of the statute, so that section 67 would have no application.

The only question, therefore, involved is whether in the circumstances of this case the Collector's act was bona fide done in pursuance of the statute. That it was an act bona fide done there can, we think, be no doubt. The lower Court writes that "there can be no question that he honestly believed he was justified in doing what he did." And nothing has been said before us to countenance the view that when the Collector formed the opinion that the plaintiff had bribed his Head Clerk, he formed that opinion perversely or unreasonably. So far, therefore, as the record of this case goes, we must accept the finding that the Collector's opinion was formed in good faith, and upon materials which seemed to him sufficient to justify that opinion. It is true that when at a much later date the prosecution was instituted against the plaintiff and the Collector's Head Clerk, that prosecution was not successful, but this circumstance seems to us not to negative the view which we have expressed.

If then the Collector's act was done in good faith, was it an act done in pursuance of the Act? We think it was. Under section 32 of the statute, the Collector had power summarily to re-call or cancel any license if the holder thereof were convicted of any criminal offence. Now the bribing of the Collector's Head Clerk would be a criminal offence. Consequently, the appeal must be decided on the footing that at the time the Collector revoked the plaintiff's license the Collector in good faith believed that the plaintiff had committed an offence, for which, on conviction, his license would be revocable. It is quite true that the Collector's action is not strictly in conformity with the section which authorizes the revocation only on the actual conviction of the licensee. But the circumstances under which the Collector acted are so near the circumstances legally entitling him to act as he did that we feel bound to say the act was done in pursuance of the statute. The law upon this point may be found stated in many cases, of which we may notice Herman v. Seneschal (1). In strictness, anything not authorized by a statute cannot be said to be in pursuance of it, while if it is authorized by the statute, clearly it would need no other protection. But if effect were given to such a construction, it would altogether do away with the protection intended to be given; accordingly, the general principle is that if any public or private body charged with the execution of a statute honestly intends to put the law in motion and really and not unreasonably believes in the existence of facts, which, if existent, would justify his acting, and acts accordingly, his conduct will be in pursuance of the statute and will be protected. Reference may also be made to the case of Spooner v. Juddow (2), which was cited by the District Judge, and in which Lord Campbell said:—"There can be no rule more firmly established, than that if parties bona fide and not absurdly believe that they are acting in pursuance of statutes, and according to law, they are entitled to the special protection which the Legislature intended for them, although they have done an illegal act." The rule, no doubt, has its limits, but we cannot doubt that it applies to such a case as this, where the belief that the statute could properly be enforced was honestly entertained and the facts thus believed differed but little from the facts which, if they had existed, would have invested the Collector with complete authority under the statute to do the act complained of.

It appears to us, therefore, that on the facts as we have them here, there is no room to doubt that the Collector's act was done in good faith and in pursuance of the statute. That being so, the defendant is entitled to the protection afforded by section 67 of the Act, and the suit is also beyond time.

On these grounds, we affirm the decree and dismiss the appeal with costs.

Decree confirmed.

Limitation—Wrong entry in Settlement Record—Subsequent correction of entry—Declaration of right—Cause of action.

Plaintiffs were in proprietary possession of a certain land and were recorded as such in the revenue papers. At the Settlement of 1901, however, they came to be recorded as proprietors of a smaller area than what they were in possession of. They, however, remained in undisturbed possession of what they were entitled to. In 1909, the Collector ordered that the Settlement entries of 1901 should be corrected and plaintiffs' share recorded as before that date. The Commissioner, on appeal, set aside the order of the Collector. The plaintiffs then brought a suit for declaration of their rights to the land:

Held, that the Commissioner's order of 1909 gave them a fresh cause of action for the declaration of their right, notwithstanding that it was passed on appeal from the Collector's order, and the suit, having been brought within six years from that date, was within time.

Second appeal from the decision of the District Judge of Azamgarh.

Mr. Uma Shanker Bajpai, for the Appellants.

Mr. Surendra Nath Sen, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—In this case, the Courts below have agreed in holding that the plaintiffs are entitled to a declaration of their rights in certain land. The defendants have appealed to this Court contending that according to the rulings of this Court, the plaintiffs' claim to a declaration is barred by limitation. The other grounds of appeal have been abandoned before me.

The facts found are that the plaintiffs have all along been in possession of the land in question and were recorded as the proprietors thereof at the fifth Settlement. At the sixth Settlement, owing, it would seem, to the introduction of a new method of recording shares, the Settlement Authorities made an entry in respect of this land which showed that the plaintiffs were entitled to a smaller area. They objected to the entry but their objection was thrown out in November 1901. They nevertheless remained in undisturbed possession of all the land to which they were entitled. In April 1909, the Collector ordered that the entries should be corrected and the plaintiffs' rights recorded as at the fifth Settlement. But the Commissioner on appeal set aside the Collector's order in August 1909. In their plaint, the plaintiffs say that the defendants began to interfere with them in 1910, on the strength of Commissioner's order of 1909. But according to the finding, there can have been no real disturbance of the plaintiffs' possession.

The questions for decision are whether time began to run against the plaintiffs in 1901 and, if so, whether a fresh cause of action accrued to them in August 1909. It is common ground that the period of limitation applicable to the claim for a declaration is six years.

The first question must be answered in the affirmative according to the decisions in Legge v. Ram Barn Singh (1) and Akbar Khan v. Turaban (2), but in the negative according to the decision in Parshotam v. Parmanand, Miscellaneous No. 279 of 1908, decided by Stanley, C. J., and Banerji, J., on December 18th, 1908. On looking into the record of the last mentioned case, I find it difficult to reconcile the decision in it with the decisions in the two other cases mentioned. In that case, Stanley, C. J., and Banerji, J., held that an adverse entry in the records, of which the plaintiff was found to have been well aware, did not set time running against him and that it was only when an actual claim to the land was made upon the strength of that entry that time began to run against the plaintiff. That decision receives some support from the decision of Knox and Aikman, JJ., in Skinner v. Shanker Lal (3). In that case an entry had been made in the records adverse to the plaintiff in May 1899. The defendant brought a suit on the strength of it in 1903. A declaratory suit brought in July 1905, was held to be within time because, although the plaintiff might have sued in 1903, he was not bound to do so and the suit of 1905 furnished him with a distinct cause of action.

But whether or not it should be held that a cause of action accrued to the plaintiffs in the present case in 1901, it seems to me that an entirely fresh cause of action accrued to them in August 1909.

The blot on their title was the erroneous entry of 1901. That was removed by the Collector in April 1909, and if his order had stood, the plaintiffs could not have maintained a suit for a declaration. The Commissioner's order of August 1909, was a fresh attack upon the plaintiff's title and, in my opinion, gave them a fresh cause of action notwithstanding that it was passed upon appeal from the Collector's order. As the Collector's order gave the plaintiffs all that they wanted, it cleared their title even if (as has been suggested) the order was not carried out before the Commissioner's order was passed.

I hold that the suit was brought within time. I, therefore, dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Revision—High Court—Power to interfere with Collector's order reversing mamlatdar's decision—Collector a Subordinate Court—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), ss. 3, 115—Mamlatdars' Courts Act (II of 1906), s. 28.

The Mamlatdar's Courts Act expressly constitutes the Collector, taking proceedings under that Act, a Court. Therefore, the Collector, when exercising judicial functions under the Act, is subject to the superintendence and control of the High Court.

The Collector of Thana v. Bhaskar Mahadev Sheth, 8 B. 264, followed.

Section 115 of the Civil Procedure Code authorizes the High Court to interfere on revision with the order of a Collector under section 28 of the Mamlatdar's Courts Act. The Collector has no authority under the latter section to reverse a decision come to by the Mamlatdar on evidence.

The enumeration of subordinate Courts in section 3, Civil Procedure Code, 1908, is not exhaustive and does not exclude all other Courts from the category of Courts subordinate to the High Court.

Mr. P. B. Shingne, for the Applicant.

Mr. D. W. Pilgaonkar, for the Opponent.

JUDGMENT.—This is an application under the extraordinary jurisdiction of this Court to set right an order by the Collector by which, upon the mere statement of the defendant before him, he took upon himself to reverse the decree of the Mamlatdar.

It has been objected on behalf of the opponent that this Court has no power under its extraordinary jurisdiction to interfere with the order of the Collector so made.

The Mamlatdar's Courts Act, however, expressly constitutes the Collector (taking proceedings under that Act) a Court, and it has been ruled in Collector of Thana v. Bhaskar Mahadev Sheth (1) that the Collector, when exercising judicial functions, is subject to the superintendence and control of the High Court.

Section 115 of the Civil Procedure Code authorizes the High Court to call for the record of any case which has been decided by any Court subordinate to such High Court and there can, we think, be no doubt that the Collector as a Court, under the Mamlatdar's Courts Act, is subordinate to the High Court.

Reference has been made to section 3 of the Civil Procedure Code in which certain Courts are stated to be subordinate to the High Court, but that does not exclude all other Courts from the category of Courts subordinate to the High Court.

We think that the Collector had no authority to reverse the decision come to by the Mamlatdar upon the evidence. We set aside his order and restore that of the Mamlatdar with costs.

Order set aside.

Held, (1) that the words zar-i-marhunah in the redemption clause in the above extract meant the mortgage-money without any reference to the interest due on it; Bhag Mal v. Talia, 6 P. L. R. 1907; 44 P. W. R. 1907, referred to and approved.

(2) that the words hamrah chhih sau pachchas rupia in the last clause of the above extract meant calculated or due on Rs. 650 and in the light of the context were susceptible of no other meaning. The clause was one relating to interest and compound interest, and stood by itself, having nothing whatever to do with the redemption of the land. Under the clause, the interest or compound interest was agreed to be received or recovered from the mortgagors personally;

(3) that, under the terms of the mortgage-deed, as set forth in the above extract, the mortgagors were entitled to claim redemption on payment of the principal mortgage-money only, and the mortgagees had only a personal remedy against them in respect of their claim for interest or compound interest.

Second appeal from the order of the Divisional Judge, Rawalpindi, dated the 1st April 1909, reversing that of the District Judge, Attock District, at Campbellpur, dated the 25th November 1909, decreeing plaintiffs' claim.

Mr. Fazal-i Elahi, for the Appellants.

Rai Bahadur Lala Sukh Dial, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of the case are briefly these. On the 20th March 1883, the plaintiffs executed a mortgage-deed in respect of 113 ghumaons 3 kanals and 13 marlas of land for a total consideration of Rs. 1,300 in favour of the predecessors-in-interest of the defendants. The mortgage-deed provided that the mortgagees were put in possession of the land and would be liable for payment of the land revenue. Of the mortgage-money, Rs. 650 was to carry no interest, the produce of the land being reckoned as equivalent to the interest on that amount together with the land revenue payable by the mortgagees; and on the balance Rs. 650, interest was to be paid by the mortgagors at the rate of 1 per cent. per mensem. The interest on Rs. 650 was to be paid annually; and in default, compound interest was to be charged at the same rate. The mortgagors were to remain in cultivating possession of the land as tenants under the mortgagees on payment of a produce-rent, but were liable to be ejected on failing to cultivate the land as agreed upon. No period was fixed for redemption, the mortgagors being at liberty to redeem the land in the month of Har on payment of zar-i-marhuna. As regards recovery of the interest payable on Rs. 650, it was further stipulated that the mortgagees would have the option either to receive compound interest or to recover the same from the mortgagors by suit.

In 1885, the mortgagees brought a suit against the mortgagors for recovery of Rs. 156, due by way of interest for two years on Rs. 650 under the terms of the mortgage-deed. A compromise was arranged between the parties, the mortgagees agreeing to receive interest at the rate of 8 annas per cent. per mensem instead of at the rate of Re. 1 as stipulated in the deed of mortgage; and in accordance with the compromise, a decree for Rs. 78 was passed against the mortgagors.

The suit, out of which the present appeal has arisen, was brought by the mortgagors against the successors-in-interest of the original mortgagees for possession, by redemption, of the mortgaged land on payment of the principal mortgage-money, Rs. 1,300. The defendants pleaded that under the terms of the mortgage-deed of 1883, the plaintiffs could not redeem the mortgage except on payment of the principal mortgage-money Rs. 1,300, together with Rs. 10,848 8 due by way of interest and compound interest on Rs. 650 for 25 years and 4 months, the whole of which amount, according to the defendants, was a valid charge on the mortgaged land. The only material issue in the case was whether or not the plaintiffs were entitled to redeem the land from the defendants on payment of the principal money only, though a subsidiary issue was also drawn as to whether, if the plaintiffs were bound to pay before redemption the amount of interest and compound interest alleged to be due under the deed, the rate of Re. 1 per cent. per mensem specified therein could or could not be reduced.

The District Judge, upon a careful consideration of the terms of the mortgage deed, in the light of a decision of this Court, Bhag Mal v. Talia (1), came to the conclusion that the covenant between the parties as to the payment of interest and compound interest on half of the mortgage-money, Rs. 650, only created a personal liability against the mortgagors and that the mortgaged land was chargeable only with the payment of the principal amount, Rs. 1,300. He, therefore, gave the plaintiffs a decree for possession of land by redemption conditional on payment of Rs. 1,300. On appeal, the learned Divisional Judge differed from the District Judge's interpretation of the mortgage-deed and being of opinion that, upon the true construction of its terms, the mortgagees had the option to realise the interest and compound interest, either with the principal mortgage-money at the time of redemption by the mortgagors or personally from them by a separate suit, he held that the amount of interest and compound interest due on Rs. 650 during the currency of the mortgage was a proper charge upon the land. He further held that since in the litigation of 1885, the rate of interest entered in the mortgage-deed was reduced by agreement between the parties to 8 annas per cent. per mensem, the defendants were not entitled to charge interest and compound interest at a higher rate: and upon that basis, he decreed redemption in favour of the plaintiffs on payment of Rs. 1,300, plus Rs. 1,871-11-6, total Rs. 3,171-11-6.

A further appeal has been preferred to this Court by the plaintiffs, and we have heard the case fully argued on both sides. We agree with the Courts below that the question for decision in this case turns solely upon the interpretation of the mortgage-deed of 1883, and, in our opinion, the interpretation put upon it by the District Judge is correct. It seems to us that the Divisional Judge has missed the true signification of the words hamrah and zar-i-marhuna, used in the deed in question; and it is in consequence of this misapprehension that he has placed a wrong construction upon the language of the deed and held that the mortgagors were bound, at the time of redemption, to pay the amount of interest and compound interest due on Rs. 650, along with the principal mortgage-money, the whole of this amount being a valid charge upon the land. The operative part of the deed, which contains the clauses about the true construction of which the parties are at issue, runs as follows: —"Rihn bashrait i-zail karte hain ke qabza kasht wa muamala Sarkar zimme murtahinan hoga. Zar-i marhuna se chhih sau pachchas bila sud rahega. Iwaz sud zar-i-bala wa muamala Sarkar paidawar arazi murtahinan lenge. Baqi chhih sau pachchas ke hamrah sud bahisab ek rupia fisadi mahwari denge. Zar-i-sud salana ada hoga. Basurat adam adai sud salana, sud dar sud bahisab bala denge. Kasht arazi bamarzi murtahinan muzhiran karenge. Miad koi muqarrar nahin hai. Jab bad darau fasl bamah-i-Har khud kasht murtahinan talab karen, zar-i-marhuna dekar zemin chhura lewenge. Zar-i-marhuna batafsil-i-zail * * * * * * * * * * * wasul pai. Qabza diya gaya. * * * * * * * Nisbat zar-i-sud salana bala hamrah chhih sau pachchas rupia murtahinan ko ikhtiyar hoga ki sud dar sud lewen ya muzhiran se bairja-i-nalish wasul kar lewen."

The two clauses in the deed which have given rise to most discussion in both the Courts below and also before us are:—

(1) Miad koi muqarrar nahin hai. Jab bad darau fasl bamah-i-Har khud kasht murtahinan talab karen, zar-i-marhuna dekar zamin chhura lewenge."

(2.) Nisbat zar-i-sud salana bala hamrah chhih sau pachchas murtahinan ko ikhtiyar hoga ki sud dar sud lewen ya muzhiran se bairja-i-nalish wasul kar lewen.

With reference to the first clause, the plaintiff's Counsel has contended that it clearly permits redemption on payment of zar-i-marhuna, which means the principal mortgage-money only; and he has further urged, with reference to the second clause, that it has nothing whatever to do with redemption but that it is a separate covenant providing for the receipt or recovery by the mortgagees of interest and compound interest due in respect of half the mortgage-money, Rs. 650, regarding which inthe earlier part of the deed the parties have entered into a distinct stipulation. The words hamrah chhih sau pachchas rupia in the second clause, it has been contended, do not mean "together with Rs. 650," as the Divisional Judge has understood them to signify, but they mean "calculated or due on Rs. 650"; and this argument is supported by reference to the use of the word hamrah in the earlier part of the deed. "Baqi chhih sau puchchas ke hamrah sud bahisab ek rupia fisadi mahwari denge." This contention is, in our opinion, perfectly sound; and it is a matter of some surprise that the Divisional Judge should have failed to understand the meaning of the word hamrah as used by the parties in the deed. In the light of the context, the word is not susceptible of any other meaning; and we must hold that the second clause, as set out above, is a clause relating to interest and compound interest and stands by itself, having nothing whatever to do with the redemption of the land, for which provision is made in the earlier redemption clause which has to be separately considered on its own merits. It is clear to our minds that under the last clause, the interest and compound interest was agreed to be received or recovered from the mortgagors personally, and for the purposes of the present suit, it is unnecessary to decide whether both interest and compound interest could be recovered by suit, or whether only interest could be so recovered, and in the event of the mortgagees not enforcing their remedy by suit, they were at liberty to charge compound interest as agreed upon. We are quite clear that the Divisional Judge is entirely wrong in his construction of the interest clauses when he says that "in the realization of interest, the mortgagees are given a choice either to take it with the principal money or to realise it personally from the mortgagors." The plain language of the clause is, in our opinion, utterly repugnant with this construction.

The most material clause to be considered is the redemption clause which has been set out above; and in that clause the words zar-i-marhuna clearly mean the mortgage-money and not, as held by the Divisional Judge, the mortgage-money together with interest due on half the mortgage-money Rs. 650. The expression zar-i-marhuna has been used in the deed in three places; and if the Divisional Judge had carefully considered the language of the whole deed, he whould have found it impossible to support the view which he has put forward as to the interpretation of the aforesaid expression. The deed says:

(1) zar-i-marhuna se chhih sau pachchas bila sud rahega.

"(2) zar-i-marhuna de kar zamin chhura lewenge", and this followed immediately by

"(3) zar-i-marhuna batafsil-i-zail (then follows the detail of Rs. 1,300) wasul pai."

In (1) and (3), the expression zar-i-marhuna undoubtedly means the principal mortgage-money: and it is impossible to understand how in (2) it can mean anything more than the principal mortgage-money, especially when, as has been noted above, (2) is immediately followed by (3), where the details of zar-i-marhuna Rs. 1,300 are set out. In fact, zar-i-marhuna in the deed before us means the same thing as zar-i-rihn in the deed which was the subject of consideration in Bhag Mal v. Talia (1). We entirely agree in the construction placed in the case just cited upon the term zar i rihn, namely, that it means the principal mortgage-money without any reference to the interest due on it, and it follows that the view of the learned Divisional Judge in the present case that the amount of the interest and the compound interest due on Rs. 650, according to the terms of the mortgage-deed, is a charge upon the land in the hands of the mortgagees, is erroneous. The mortgagors are entitled to claim redemption on payment of the principal mortgage-money only, and the mortgagees have only a personal remedy against them in respect of their alleged claim for the interest and the compound interest due.

For the foregoing reasons, we accept this appeal, and reversing the decree of the Divisional Judge, we restore that of the District Judge with costs throughout. The decree will be drawn up in accordance with the provisions of Order XXXIV, rule 7, Civil Procedure Code.

Appeal allowed.

CIVIL REFERENCE No. 1 OF 1912.

November 25, 1912.

ALI MARDAN—PLAINTIFF

versus

BAKAR KHAN—DEFENDANT.

Government Tenants Act (III of 1893)—Horse breeding peasant grant—Jhelum Canal Colony—Tenancy to devolve on one person and not to be alienated—Compromise for joint succession in Civil Court—Decree of Civil Court, effect of—Government as landlord not affected—Chief Court—Revision.

One S. held a horse breeding peasant grant in the Jhelum Canal Colony. After the death of S., the grant, under the rules, could devolve upon a single person only as an impartible holding. It was also one of the conditions of grant that it should not be alienated without the previous sanction of the Financial Commissioner. S. died without a male issue but left three brothers A., B. and C. The Colonization Officer mutated the whole grant in favour of B. only. On this, A. instituted a civil suit for possession of the land of the grant on the ground that he, as eldest son of his father, was entitled to succeed in preference to B. The two brothers entered into a compromise whereby they agreed to hold the land jointly in equal shares. Upon this, the Court passed a decree in terms of the compromise.

The Colonization Officer refused to effect mutation in accordance with the decree of the Civil Court, on the ground that the decree was illegal. The decree was accordingly referred to the Chief Court for revision:

Held, (1) that there was no good ground for interfering with the decree:

(2) that the decree in no way affected the rights of the Government as landlord, who could obtain ejectment or otherwise enforce the conditions of the tenancy;

(3) that the decree did not prevent the Government from enforcing any rights it might have in consequence of the infringement of the conditions of tenancy;

(4) that as between A. and B., there was a valid compromise to which the Court was bound to give effect in a decree, which was valid and binding on the parties.

Case referred by the Divisional Judge, Shahpur Division, at Sargodha, with his No. 638-J, dated the 3rd November 1911, for orders of the Chief Court.

Mr. Nand Lal, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Rustomji, for the Defendant.

ORDER.—This Reference relates to a Government tenancy to which the Government Tenants (Punjab) Act III of 1893 applies.

Under section 7 of the Act, the grantee holds the land as a tenant from Government on certain prescribed conditions—a copy of these conditions has not been submitted with the Reference and, consequently, we have not been able to refer to them. It is, however, admitted before us that under these conditions, the tenancy, on the decease of the tenant for the time being, shall in every case devolve upon a single person as an impartible holding.

Apart from these conditions, section 8 of the Act provides that the rights or interests vested in a tenant shall not be transferred by private contract without the previous consent in writing of the Financial Commissioner.

ALI MARDAN v. BAKAR KHAN.

In the present case, the land was granted to one Sahib Din who died in 1908 without male issue but leaving a widow, Musammat Nur Bhari, a minor daughter and three brothers, Madat Khan, Ali Mardan and Bakar Khan.

On the death of Sahib Din, the Colonization Officer sanctioned mutation in favour of Bakar Khan subject to the payment by him of Rs. 75 at each harvest to Sahib Din's widow. On this, Ali Mardan instituted a civil suit for possession of the land, on the ground that he, as eldest son of his father, was entitled to succeed. In this suit on the date fixed for hearing, Ali Mardan and Bakar Khan entered into a compromise by which these two brothers were to hold the land jointly in equal shares and were to be jointly liable for the sum of Rs. 75 payable at each harvest to the widow and thereupon the Court passed a decree in terms of the compromise.

The Colonization Officer refused to sanction mutation giving effect to the decree and wrote to the Deputy Commissioner as follows:—

"This order of the District Judge is quite illegal and against the conditions of the grant which is a horse-breeding peasant grant. Section 17 of the conditions absolutely forbids any alienation of any part of the grant without the previous sanction of the Financial Commissioner and it is an essential point with all horse-breeding grants that they should not be sub-divided.

"Will you please ask the District Judge to review his order if he can and not to entertain such suits in future. If he cannot review his order, the case should be at once reported to the Financial Commissioner for the Chief Court to be moved. I cannot sanction mutation on the District Judge's decree.

"Ali Mardan Khan's proper course was to appeal to the Commissioner against my mutation order".

The Court which passed the decree was the Court of the District Judge to whom a copy of the Colonization Officer's note was forwarded. On considering the matter, the District Judge rightly held that he had no power to review his judgment but, being of opinion that he had in error passed an illegal decree, he has referred the decree through the Divisional Judge to this Court for revision.

Before us there has been no appearance on behalf of Government but we have heard Counsel on behalf of Ali Mardan and Bakar Khan of whom the latter, on the technical grounds raised by the Colonization Officer, now seeks to avoid the compromise and the decree.

Under section 21A of the Punjab Alienation of Land Act, a special procedure has been provided by which the Deputy Commissioner can move for the revision of a decree which in any way contravenes the provision of that Act but, as far as we are aware, no similar special procedure has been provided by law in respect of tenancies to which Act III of 1893 applies, and we are unable to find any good ground on which we can interfere with the decree now in question.

The Colonization Officer appears to be mistaken in his view of the position of the Courts in the matter and to have overlooked the fact that the decree in no way affects the rights of the Government as landlord.

A transfer of a tenancy or a share of a tenancy can take place with the sanction of the Financial Commissioner as representative of the landlord and, as the landlord was not a party to the suit, the Court was not concerned with the question whether sanction had been given or not—as between the parties to the suit and apart from the interests of the landlord, who was not a party, there was a valid compromise to which the Court was bound to give effect in a decree—and the decree passed in accordance with the compromise is not against the landlord and in no way prevents the Government from enforcing any rights which it may have in consequence of infringement of the conditions of the tenancy.

It may be that the landlord, if so advised, may take steps to obtain ejectment or to otherwise enforce the conditions of the tenancy, but it is also possible that the landlord may not elect to do so. In either case, Bakar Khan cannot avoid the bargain and, as between him and Ali Mardan, who were parties to the suit, the compromise and the decree are valid and binding.

Under these circumstances, we are unable to revise the decree and we decline to interfere with it.

Each party in this Court will pay its own costs.

Landlord and tenant—Surrender of portion of holding—Subsequent sale of same portion—Subsequent execution of kabulyat by raiyat to landlord—Suit by landlord to eject purchaser—Kabulyat, whether in fraud of purchaser, or legal fiction validly resorted to by landlord—Unauthorized purchase of portion of holding, if incumbrance—Abandonment—Surrender—Bengal Tenancy Act (VIII of 1885), ss. 86, 87, sub-ss. (6) and (7).

In December 1906, a raiyat surrendered a portion of his holding to his landlord, and sold this very portion to the defendant in February 1907. In December 1907, he executed a kabulyat in favour of the landlord in respect of the holding. Eleven days after that, a suit was brought by the landlord to eject the purchaser on the ground that the holding was not transferable by custom:

Held, that the execution of the kabulyat was not an act done by the tenant in fraud of the purchaser to which the landlord made himself a party by taking the kabulyat, but the contract was a legal fiction to which the landlord was entitled to resort to in order to recover from the purchaser who had no title as against him; that unless it was shown that the landlord acted fraudulently in excess of his rights for the purpose of defeating the rights of the purchaser, the kabulyat could not be inoperative; that the unauthorized purchase of a portion of the holding by the defendant could not create an incumbrance on the tenancy within the meaning of section 86, sub-sections (6) and (7), of the Bengal Tenancy Act; that the landlord in this case could accept the tenant's surrender of the whole or a portion of the holding under section 86, sub-section (7); that the effect of the kabulyat was to surrender the whole original holding and create a new holding altogether; that although the tenant might be answerable to the purchaser for damages and compensation for breach of contract, the landlord could not be bound to recognize any right in the transferee; and that the landlord was entitled to eject the purchaser.

Babus Mohendra Nath Roy, Gunoda Charan Sen and Manmotha Nath Roy, for the Appellant.

JUDGMENT.—This second appeal arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiffs zemindars to eject the defendant, a purchaser of a portion of their ryot's holding which is not transferable by custom. The plaintiffs alleged that in December 1906, the original tenant, Tarini Prosad Bhaumik, had surrendered the portion in question to the landlord and that he sold this very portion to the defendant in February 1907. The defendants alleged that the zemindar had fixed rates of nazar by notification which on the rulings of this Court constituted a valid custom of transfer.

Both these points have been found against them on the facts in the lower Court and we need not deal with the defendants' case of custom as that is the subject of appeals by defendants in other cases relating to the same zemindari but no cross-appeal has been filed in this suit.

The plaintiff falls back upon a kabuliat, executed in his favour by Tarini Prosad Bhaumik on the 10th December 1907, that is, eleven days before he filed this suit.

In this kabuliat, Tarini recites that he has sold his lands in Deora Kasunda and plaintiff has the right to take possession thereof and that the portion of his holding in Kasunda sold away by him is to be considered as given in istifa. The Munsif held that this showed that no previous istifa had been given and that the kabuliat was got up collusively between plaintiff and his tenant who was also his tehsildar for the purposes of this suit. The Subordinate Judge does not go so far as this but says that a mere paper transaction with the object of evading the provisions of the law cannot be considered a bona fide dealing with the lands and cannot get rid of the ordinary rule of law laid down by this Court that the transfer of a portion of a holding does not constitute an abandonment. The reason for the rule is given in the case of Kabil Sardar v. Chandra Nath Nag Chowdhry(1) and is that the sale and transfer of possession to the purchaser conveys no title to him, and as the ryot has left the holding and disclaims any interest in it, he must be held to have abandoned it and the land remains a piece of land within the zemindari to which the person in possession has no title. It is evident that it is essential to such a case that the owner of the land, i.e., the ryot, must have abandoned it altogether, as, if he has not, he is the person entitled to possession of it, and it is, of course, not sufficient to enable him to succeed for the zemindar to prove that the person who is cultivating land has no title to it: he must show that the ryot's interest has ceased, or that he is entitled to eject the ryot for one of the reasons mentioned in the Bengal Tenancy Act. This rule has operated very harshly upon zemindars and a notable instance is found in Pandub Nath v. Durga Churn Roy (2), which was referred to in a reference made to a Full Bench by Trevelyan and Wilkins, JJ., in Sir Maharaja Kissen Pertab Sahi v. J. R. Tripe (3). It was argued before these learned Judges that where a tenant sells a defined portion of his holding, makes over the portion sold and declines to pay any more rent in respect of it, he in effect has abandoned that portion and the landlord should be entitled to eject the purchaser as a trespasser from the property sold just as much as in the case where the whole tenure is sold; otherwise a tenant might, by retaining a small portion of the tenure, be always able to avoid the provision of law, which in the absence of custom or usage prevents alienations without the consent of the landlord [Sir Maharaja Kissen Pertab Sahi v. J. R. Tripe (3)]. The Court was inclined to accede to this argument but as the decision of Rampini, J., in Pandub Nath v. Durga Churan Roy (2) upheld in Letters Patent Appeal [Durga Charan Roy v. Pandab Nath (4)] by Petheram, C.J., and Macpherson, J. dated 11th August 1893, appeared to be expressly in point and against this view, they referred the question to a Full Bench. The Full Bench, however, did not decide it as it was held that there being no evidence to prove that the tenant had refused to pay rent for the portion sold by him, it was not necessary to answer the question referred.

(1) 20 C. 590.

RAMONI MOHAN ROY v. KALIMUDDI.

The case we have now to deal with is a more specialised case and raises a rather delicate and important question, viz., what is the effect of the kabuliat which the tenant gave the landlord 10 months after the transfer? This raises the question, whether the contract was a legal fiction which the landlord was entitled to resort to in order to recover from the purchaser who had no title as against him, or was it an act done by the tenant of the landlord in fraud of the purchaser to which the landlord made himself a party by taking the kabuliat.

The Munsif appears to have taken the latter view; the Subordinate Judge held that it was merely a paper transaction or legal fiction with the object of evading the law and that such a transaction would not be a bona fide dealing with the land and could not be operative. Now, it seems to us that unless it is shown that the landlord acted fraudulently in excess of his rights for the purpose of defeating the rights of the purchaser, the kabuliat cannot be inoperative.

Section 86, clause 7, of the Bengal Tenancy Act, provides that save in the case of an incumbrance existing on the holding, nothing in the section shall affect any arrangement by which a ryot and his landlord may arrange for a surrender of a whole or a part of the holding.

The unauthorised purchase of a portion of the holding by the defendant cannot, in our opinion, create an incumbrance on the tenancy since it is in no way binding on the landlord and the tenant has parted with his interest outright, though he may not have got rid of his obligation to pay the full rent to the landlord.

In order to succeed in ejectment against the defendant, the zemindar has to show that the ryot's interest has ceased, and as he has no duty or obligation in relation to the unauthorised purchaser, he cannot be said to be a party to any fraud on the purchaser by the tenant. He is in no way bound to recognise the purchaser and he can accept the tenant's surrender of the whole or a portion of the holding under section 86 (7). But we may go further and hold that the effect of the kabuliat was to surrender the whole original holding and create a new holding altogether. The case of Badan Chandra v. Rajeswari Debya (5), though not precisely on all fours with this case appears to clearly establish the principle which we think applies in this case.

(5) 2 C. L. J. 570.

AMOLAK SHAH v. CHARAN DAS.

We are of opinion that in this view of the matter, the cases on the point that have decided that the landlord is not entitled to maintain an action in ejectment either against the transferor or the transferee, can be distinguished from the present case.

Those cases will be found summed up in the judgment of Mookerjee, J., in the case of Rai Kamaleswari Prosad Singh Bahadur v. Maharaja Harbullab Narain Singh Bahadur (6).

The general rule is that the landlord cannot eject the transferee as long as the original tenancy subsists but we know of no authority for holding that the landlord cannot get rid of the original tenancy by a valid contract legally made with his tenant determining the tenancy and creating a new one, and although the tenant may be answerable to the purchaser for damages and compensation for breach of contract, the landlord cannot be in any way bound to protect or recognise any right in the transferee and cannot, therefore, be said to be a party to any fraud on the purchaser. To hold otherwise would be to hold that the landlord, by taking this kabuliat from the tenant had parted with all his interest in the land transferred, since he cannot after accepting the kabuliat demand any further rent from the original tenant nor can he get rent from the transferee unless the latter choose to attorn to him.

We are of opinion that the plaintiff has discovered a legal means of getting rid of the unavoidable hardships which the strict application of the law, as interpreted in former decisions, has involved. It does not appear to matter that the means used is in the nature of a legal fiction.

Many unintentional hardships, which were never contemplated when the law was enacted and which arise from inferences, perhaps necessary, from the wording of the law, have been before now got over in this way, and as long as a man, acts in a perfectly legal manner and within his rights, we cannot see why he should be debarred from the remedy he has succeeded in re-opening for his own relief from an undoubted hardship, merely because it involves an evasion of another rule of law which no longer applies to his case.

(6) 2 C. L. J. 369.

It has always been recognised that if a man can keep outside the four walls of the law, he is not bound by it in a case to which, ex hypothesi, the law has no application. This may be a thing to be deprecated in many cases, but in a case where an undoubted hardship has been unintentionally imposed on a person by a provision of law which the Legislature cannot have contemplated would have such an effect, we think the remedy by way of what is a strictly legal device is a salutary one.

The result is that the judgment and decree of the lower Appellate Court must be set aside and the plaintiff's suit decreed with costs in all Courts.

Appeal allowed.

PUNJAB CHIEF COURT.

FIRST CIVIL APPEAL NO. 749 OF 1909.

December 4, 1912

Present:—Mr. Justice Robertson and Mr. Justice Beadon.

AMOLAK SHAH AND OTHERS—DEFENDANTS—APPELLANTS

versus

CHARAN DAS AND OTHERS—PLAINTIFFS—RESPONDENTS.

Land Acquisition Act (1 of 1894), s. 30—Exclusive jurisdiction to determine right to, and apportionment of, compensation—Civil Procedure Code (Act XIV of 1882), ss. 521, 522—Separable parts of award—Void and valid portions—Court discovering before decree its incompetency to try suit—Dismissal of suit—Amount of compensation—Apportionment—Estoppel.

A. died about 1902. He left two pieces of land, (1) at X and (2) at Y. Mutation in respect of this property took place in favour of A.'s three sons, B., C. and D. The land at X. was acquired by Government, and the Collector's award was delivered in August 1903. Objections were put in and referred to the Court, which gave its final decision in August 1907, to the effect that D. was not separated from the family, and was entitled to ⅓rd share of the compensation awarded. This decision formed the subject of an appeal to the Chief Court.

After the reference by the Collector to the Court, B. and C., on the 4th January 1905, instituted a suit in the Court of the Subordinate Judge in respect of both pieces of land to have it declared that on the death of A., their father, they were exclusive owners of the land and that D. was not entitled to a share of the land, or to a share of the compensation awarded by the Collector in respect of the X land. The suit was referred to arbitration by the parties and the umpire's award, delivered on 22nd June 1906, declared B. and C. to be exclusive owners of the land and alone entitled to receive the compensation. Objections were put in under section 521 of the old Code of Civil Procedure and in addition a plea was raised that as the point in dispute was exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Land Acquisition Court, the Court of the Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. On this plea alone, the suit was dismissed without any inquiry into the objections under section 521 and any adjudication on the award. On appeal, the Divisional Judge upheld the Subordinate Judge's decision in regard to the X land, but finding that the Court of the Subordinate Judge had jurisdiction in regard to the Y land, enforced the award of arbitration and allowed the claim of B. and C. in respect of that piece of land. This decree of the Divisional Judge formed the subject of two cross-appeals by the parties concerned.

The first appeal under the Land Acquisition Act and the two cross-appeals mentioned above were heard together by the Chief Court:

Held, (1) that as regards the Y land, the decree of the Subordinate Judge not being in accordance with the arbitration award, the Divisional Judge had jurisdiction to entertain an appeal which was not barred by section 522 of the old Civil Procedure Code; on the other hand, the decree of the Divisional Judge in respect of that piece of land being in accordance with, and not in excess of, the award, an appeal from it was barred by section 522;

(2) that there was no reason for interference on revision in respect of Y land, the grounds urged being unsustainable, because (a) the award relating to the Y land was separable from the award relating to the X land, and (b) D. had by his silence abandoned his objections to the award in the Divisional Court;

Partab Singh v. Devi Singh, 5 P.R. 1883, distinguished.

(3) that the Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to try the claim in respect of X land;

(4) that the Subordinate Judge having discovered, before passing a decree, that he had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit as regards the X land, or to pass a decree which would be binding on the Land Acquisition Court, he had no option under the circumstances but to dismiss the suit in regard to that land;

(5) that D., by his agreement to the reference to arbitration, was not, under the circumstances of the case, estopped from questioning the Court's jurisdiction or from defending his rights in the Land Acquisition Court;

(6) that the Land Acquisition Court was competent to go into the question of apportionment, as the objections referred to the Court included one by B. and C. that they alone were entitled to the portion of the compensation awarded by the Collector to their brother, D.

A decision of the Chief Court in the previous appeal on the question of the amount of compensation does not bar the Land Acquisition Court from disposing of the point of apportionment which, in its first decision on the matter of compensation, it had expressly left for future decision.

In a claim disposed of by the Collector in the course of Land Acquisition proceedings under the special procedure prescribed by Act I of 1894, the Collector's order or adjudication of the rights of the owners or claimants to the property for which compensation was assessed and awarded, cannot be questioned otherwise than by a reference to Court under the provisions of the Act, and the Civil Courts are not competent to re-open and determine matters disposed of in accordance with the Act in a separate suit.

Sher Khan v. Shamsher Khan, 37 P. R. 1905; 35 P.L. R. 1905, followed.

First appeal from the order of the Additional Divisional Judge, Lahore, dated the 16th March 1909, awarding Rs. 5,111-11-4.

Rai Bahadur Bakhshi Sohan Lal, for the Appellants.

Rai Sahib Pandit Sheo Narain, and Lala Moti Lal, for the Respondents.

JUDGMENT.—This is a first appeal in a case under the Land Acquisition Act regarding the apportionment of the compensation awarded by the Collector for land acquired by Government under the Act. The objectors to that part of the apportionment which is now in dispute are Amolak Shah and Ragnath Das, and Charan Das and Ganda Mal sons of Gokal Chand deceased are the opposite party.

The two connected further appeals Nos. 418 and 633 of 1909 are cross-appeals and relate to a suit in which Amolak Shah and Ragnath Das are plaintiffs and Charan Das and Ganda Mal are defendants.

Manak Shah deceased was the father of Gokal Chand, Amolak Shah and Ragnath Das and the property to which these three appeals relate formed part of Manak Shah's estate, and consists of two pieces of land, i.e., (1) at Lahore and (2) at Ichhra.

Manak Shah died about 1902 and it appears that mutation in respect of this land took place in favour of his three sons in equal shares in spite of objection on the part of Amolak Shah and Ragnath Das. It also appears that Gokal Chand applied for partition and on objection by his brothers, they were referred to the Civil Courts.

In the meantime, the land at Lahore was acquired by Government and the Collector's award was delivered on the 3rd August 1903, fixing the compensation and determining the portion to be paid to a mortgagee, and the portion to be paid to the three brothers,

AMOLAK SHAH v. CHARAN DAS.

Objections to this award were referred to the Court on 19th September 1903, those by Amolak Shah and Ragnath Das being dated 14th August 1903. At first, by order dated 24th June 1904, the Court declined jurisdiction on technical grounds but on 1st May 1906, this order was reversed on appeal and the case was remanded for decision on the merits. Then on 19th January 1907, the Court decided the dispute as regards the amount of the compensation only and by its order it expressly left the question of apportionment for subsequent decision.

After the decision of an appeal on 7th August 1907 regarding its order relating to the amount of compensation, the Court then began the second part of the case relating to the apportionment of compensation and, as regards that part of the compensation which is not due to the mortgagee, it has decided that Gokal Chand was not separated from the family and that his sons are entitled to ⅓rd share. This decision is the subject of the present Appeal No. 749 of 1909.

After the reference of the objections by the Collector to the Court for decision, Amolak Shah and Ragnath Das, on the 4th January 1905, instituted a suit in the Court of the Subordinate Judge in respect of both pieces of land to have it declared that, on the death of Manak Shah, their father, they were exclusive owners of the land and that Gokal Chand was not entitled to a share of the land or to a share of the compensation awarded in respect of the Lahore land.

In the course of the suit, by agreement of the parties, the whole case was referred to arbitration and the final award by the umpire was delivered on 22nd June 1906. This award was in favour of Amolak Shah and Ragnath Das, who by the award were held to be exclusive owners of the land and alone entitled to receive the compensation.

After the award had been delivered, objections were put in under section 521 of the old Civil Procedure Code which was then in force and in addition to these objections, a plea was raised to the effect that, as the point in dispute was exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Land Acquisition Court, the Court of the Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. On this plea the Subordinate Judge decided that he had no jurisdiction in the matter and by his judgment, dated 21st July 1908, he dismissed the suit without considering the objections under section 521, Civil Procedure Code, and without adjudicating on the award.

On appeal, the Divisional Judge upheld the Subordinate Judge's decision in regard to the Lahore land but, finding that the Court of the Subordinate Judge had jurisdiction in regard to the Ichhra land, he remanded the case under section 562, Civil Procedure Code, for re decision on the merits in respect of that portion of the claim. In further appeal to the Chief Court, however, it was held on 23rd April 1907 that a remand under section 562 was not permissible and that, if the Divisional Judge was of opinion that a remand was necessary, he should take action under section 566 or section 568, Civil Procedure Code, and the case was remanded to the Divisional Judge with the direction that he should pass one decree disposing of the whole appeal. By the decree which the Divisional Judge has now passed, the award by arbitration has been enforced as regards the Ichhra land and the claim by Amolak Shah and Ragnath Das in respect of that land has been allowed but the first Court's decision, dismissing the suit on the ground of want of jurisdiction, has been maintained in respect of the Lahore land. This decree is the subject of the Cross-Appeals Nos. 418 and 683 of 1909.

As regards the Ichhra land, the decree of the Subordinate Judge dismissing the suit was not in accordance with the award and the Divisional Judge had jurisdiction to entertain an appeal which was not barred by section 522, (old) Civil Procedure Code. On the other hand, the Divisional Judge, having seen no cause to remit the award to the arbitrators for further consideration and having refused the application to set aside the award under section 521, has passed a decree in respect of the Ichhra land which is in accordance with the award and is not in excess of it. Consequently, the appeal from the Divisional Judge's decree in respect of the Ichhra land is barred by section 522, old Civil Procedure Code, or section 16, Schedule II of the present Code of Civil Procedure, and, as an appeal, the present appeal by Gokal Chand's sons (No. 683 of 1909) must fail on the ground that the appeal does not lie.

It has, however, been urged that, if the Appeal No. 683 of 1909 does not lie as an appeal, the decree in regard to the Ichhra land should be set aside on revision on the following grounds:—

(a) that the award relating to the Ichhra land was inseparable from the rest of the award of the arbitrators and ,consequently, the whole award is void and could not have been acted on by the Divisional Court and (b) that the objections, on which the application to set aside the award under section 521 were based, were not inquired into and properly decided.

As regards (a), Partab Singh v. Devi Singh (1), which is relied on, had reference to the filing of an agreement in respect of a suit not pending in Court and it was held that such an agreement dealing with matters beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, could not be filed under section 523, Civil Procedure Code. In such cases, the agreement must either be one capable of being filed as a whole, or it must be rejected as a whole. Fateh Singh Karm Chand v. (2) followed Partab Singh v. v. Devi Singh (1) and deals with the same point and these authorities are distinguishable from the present case.

In the present case, the suit had been instituted before the agreement to refer to arbitration had been entered into and, whether or not there had been a reference to arbitration, the Court was bound to adjudicate on that portion of the suit which was within its jurisdiction.

It cannot be held that the award relating to the Ichhra land is inseparable from the award relating to the Lahore land. The two pieces of land are distinct and separate and the adjudication in the award applies to them severally without ambiguity. Subject, of course, to any order which might be passed under section 521 in respect of the objections to the award, the award, for the purposes of the suit, is valid and binding on the parties to the suit, and, whether or not the Court had jurisdiction to pass a decree on the award in respect of the Lahore land, it is clear that the Court had jurisdiction to pass a decree in accordance with the award in respect of the Ichhra land.

As regards (b), it is true that the objections were not inquired into by the first Court and that the Divisional Judge did not cause inquiry to be made by remand either under section 556 or section 568, (old) Civil Procedure Code, but (see page 5, line 14 of the paper-book of Appeal No. 683 of 1909), the sons of Gokal Chand might have had these objections inquired into if they had so desired. When the case went back from the Chief Court for fresh decision, they did not ask for a remand on this point and it is clear that they abandoned these objections in the Divisional Court.

For these reasons, there is no good ground for interference or revision with the decree in respect of the Ichhra land.

Coming now to Appeals Nos. 418 and 749 of 1909, the first point for consideration has reference to the question of the jurisdiction of the Court of the Subordinate Judge in respect of the Lahore land.

There is no doubt that ordinarily the Court of the Subordinate Judge would have had jurisdiction to entertain the suit but in Sher Khan v. Shamsher Khan (3), it was held by a Division Bench of this Court that in a claim disposed of by the Collector in the course of land acquisition proceedings under the special procedure prescribed by Act I of 1894, the Collector's order or adjudication of the rights of the owners or claimants to the property for which compensation was assessed and awarded, cannot be questioned otherwise than by a reference to Court under the provisions of the Act and that the Civil Courts are not competent to re-open and determine matters disposed of in accordance with the Act in a separate suit.

This authority is exactly in point in the present case and supports the contention that the Court of the Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit, or to pass a decree, in respect of the Lahore land. It is true that this question of jurisdiction did not come to the notice of the Subordinate Judge till after the award of the arbitrators had been delivered but this makes no material difference. Before passing a decree, the Subordinate Judge discovered that he had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit as regards the Lahore land or to pass a decree which would be binding on the Land Acquisition Court, and under these circumstances, he had no option but to dismiss the suit in regard to that land.

AMOLAK SHAH v. CHARAN DAS.

It is, however, contended that, having agreed to refer to arbitration and having allowed an award to be delivered by the arbitrators, Gokal Chand's sons are estopped from claiming a share of the compensation and, consequently, the Land Acquisition Court was bound to give effect to the award.

In this connection and in connection with the question of the jurisdiction of the Subordinate Judge, reliance is placed on Pitchuvier v. Perumal Ronan (4), in which in proceedings in the Land Acquisition Court, which had exclusive jurisdiction in the matter, the Court itself passed an order by consent of parties for payment of the compensation money to one of them after four months, if in the meantime the other party did not institute a suit to establish his right to the money. The agreement had reference to the proceedings in the Land Acquisition Court, which by this agreement passed a final order which was not impeached and, in respect of the suit which was instituted in the Munsif's Court, it was held that the order of the Land Acquisition Court which was passed by consent could not be attacked collaterally and, consequently, the parties were estopped from questioning the Munsif's jurisdiction.

The circumstances of the present case are quite different. There was no agreement with reference to the proceedings in the Land Acquisition Court which terminated those proceedings or provided for the settlement of the dispute elsewhere. On the contrary, while the proceedings were pending in the Court having exclusive jurisdiction, one party, without the consent of the other party, brought a suit, in aCourt having no jurisdiction. It is true that in this suit, the parties agreed to refer the dispute to arbitration but at the time of this agreement they were under a misapprehension as regards the jurisdiction of the Court and, especially as the defect of jurisdiction came to notice before a decree was passed and before the award had become final by the disposal of objections under section 521, Civil Procedure Code, it cannot be held that the sons of Gokal Chand were estopped from questioning the Sub-Judge jurisdiction or from defending their rights in the Land Acquisition Court.

It is also contended that the Land Acquisition Court had no jurisdiction to go into the question of apportionment (a) because of an alleged defect in the order of reference and (b) after the Chief Court had decided the case on appeal on the question of the amount of compensation to be paid.

These contentions do not appear to have much force. By the Collector's award, the three brothers were given a specified portion of the compensation jointly.

The objections referred to the Court for decision included one by Amolak Shah and Ragnath Das that they alone were entitled to this portion of the compensation and thus this point was duly referred to the Court for decision. The case consisted of two parts, i. e., one relating to the amount of compensation to be paid by Government and the other relating to the apportionment of the money.

The Court took up these two parts separately and in the order disposing of the first part it was expressly stated that the second part still remained for decision.

The second part of the case was not before the Chief Court in the previous appeal.

The last point for consideration is whether or not, apart from the arbitrator's award, there was a partition in Nanak Shah's lifetime by which Gokal Chand was separated from the rest of the family.

There was apparently some dispute about money obtained in respect of some contract and, according to the witnesses, Mr. Barber and Lala Narinjan Das, this led to the separation of Gokal Chand but this evidence is not conclusive and, especially if the partition was the result of a quarrel, it is strange that no deed was drawn up and executed at the time of the alleged partition.

There is, no doubt, a letter (page 20 of the paper-book of Appeal No. 749), purporting to have been written by Gokal Chand on the 28th November 1902 but it is denied that this letter is genuine and, though Lala Narinjan

MAHOMED IBRAHIM v. ABDUL LATIF.

Das and Jas Mal (now servant of Amolak Shah) profess to identify Gokal Chand's signature, the letter appears to be most suspicious. The alleged date of the letter is long after the alleged separation and it is a significant fact that it is subsequent to the date of the Tahsildar's first report of 15th August 1902 in connection with the acquisition of the land. If the letter had been in existence at the mutation proceedings on 22nd February 1903, it would have been relied on in those proceedings when Amolak Shah and Raghnath Das, instead of relying on the letter, took their stand on an alleged oral Will. The letter was not made use of until proceedings for the acquisition of the land were in progress and an attempt was then made to get it registered but registration was refused.

We agree with the lower Court that on the evidence available, it is impossible to hold that the alleged separation is proved.

The result is, that all the three appeals fail and we dismiss this one (No. 749 of 1909) with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

MAHOMED IBRAHIM HAJI GULAM SAHIB LONDAY—APPELLANT

versus

ABDUL LATIF HAJI MAHOMED IBRAHIM JITAYKER—RESPONDENT.

Wakf—Trust—Perpetuity, rule against—Dedication to charity illusory—Perpetual family settlement—Muhammadan Law—Shaffei—Life-estate—Limitation Act (IX of 1908), s. 10, scope of—Resulting trust—Specific purpose—Estoppel—Possession of mutwalli also entitled to contingent beneficial remainder—Life-tenant obtaining possession from trustee—Evidence Act (I of 1872), ss. 115, 116.

It is doubtful whether the rule of the Muhammadan Law, that a life-estate is bad and would resolve itself into an absolute estate, can be sustained in the case of shaffeis.

A person, claiming under a resulting trust, may be barred by limitation unless the resulting trust is of such a kind as to fall within the scope of section 10 of the Limitation Act.

A trust for a specific purpose is a trust for a specified purpose.

A resulting trust in favour of the heirs of a testator, upon failure through invalidity of one of the trusts declared in the Will, is not a trust for a specific purpose within the meaning of section 10.

Kherodemoney Dossee v. Doorgamoney Dossee, 4 C. 455; 2 C. L. R. 112; 3 C. L. R. 315; Wundravandas v. Cursondas, 21 B. 646, followed.

The opinion of Beaman, J., in Casamally Jairajbhoy v. Sir Currimbhoy Ebrahim, 36 B. 214; 13 Bom. L. R. 717; 12 Ind. Cas. 225, that for the purposes of limitation there is no distinction to be drawn between resulting trusts and trusts for specific purposes, and that the only case in which limitation can run in favour of a trustee, whether by express words or by operation of law, is where he is in as a trespasser and not as a valid transferee, dissented from.

A trust for the grand-daughter of the settlor for life and thereafter on her descendants from generation to generation, and in default thereof on the settlor's husband's relatives from generation to generation in perpetuity and in default with an ultimate trust for the education and instruction of Muhammadan youths, is void as being an attempt to create a perpetuity in the nature of a family settlement under the guise of a wakf.

Where there are passages in a wakfnama, justifying the trustee in handing over to the successive life-tenants, the possession of the trust properties, so long as he does not abdicate the position of the mutwalli assigned to him, and the life-tenants obtain possession of the properties with the consent of the mutwalli on the footing of their title as life-tenants under the wakfnama, the life-tenants cannot be permitted to deny that the person from whom the possession was claimed had a title to such possession when it was handed over to them.

The estoppel so created binds all those who claim under or through the life-tenants so obtaining possession. This is specially so where the person from whom possession is claimed is not a bare trustee but is also entitled to a contingent beneficial remainder on failure of certain limitations.

When a wakfnama must be treated as valid between certain parties owing to estoppel, the mutwalli, when his beneficial remainder has taken effect, is entitled to the possession of the property under the terms of the wakfnama both as trustee and as beneficiary.

When the claim of settlor's heirs under a resulting trust has long been barred by the law of limitation, the person who is in possession of the trust property at the time of the institution of the suit, can successfully defend his possession against those heirs.

Appeal from a judgment and decree of Beaman, J.

The facts are given in the judgment of the Appeal Court. After giving his findings on the preliminary issues, Beaman, J., dismissed the suit by the following ORDER.—The conclusion of the whole matter has now been reached to find upon the last contested issue, namely, whether the plaintiff has made out adverse possession against all the world, in virtue of which he can now claim to recover this property from the hands of the trustee of the wakf into which it appears to have gone under the decree of Mr. Justice Macleod. The decision of this issue was deferred because I was given to understand that evidence had to be led upon it. The only evidence laid before the Court has been the evidence which was given before Mr. Justice Macleod, and this has been put in by consent. The course of the proceedings has certainly been peculiar and the result has been to bring about what I cannot help thinking to be a very singular position. Before Mr. Justice Macleod, the then plaintiffs succeeded in having the wakfnama, under which alone they appear to have been entitled to such rights as those on which they were then in enjoyment, set aside with the somewhat unexpected result that the trustee was declared to be no longer trustee of the then plaintiffs, there being resultant trust back to the heirs of the settlor if they could be found. Mr. Justice Macleod, when he had gone so far, was, of course, under the impression that the plaintiffs were among the heirs of the original settlor. On reference to the Commissioner, however, it was found they were not, and although in answer to advertisements in the newspapers, a certain number of people came in claiming to be heirs of the original settlor, the learned Judge naturally refused to have anything to do with them in that suit; so that the end of the matter was that the trust settlement was set aside at the instance of the parties who were found to have no further interest in the settled property. From the plaintiffs' point of view, that was a most unfortunate decision, for apparently if the plaintiffs before Mr. Justice Macleod and the plaintiff in this suit had left the wakfnama alone, they might have remained in quiet enjoyment of the rents and profits of this property as contemplated by the settlor. But here again the plaintiff impugns the wakfnama and insists upon a declaration that it is bad in law. As I began by saying, it is clearly so on the face of it; but if this suit had come before me first in this form and there had been no proceedings in 1906, I should then have contented myself to simply dismissing the suit leaving the plaintiff and defendant No. 4 as trustee under the wakfnama to settle their differences as best they could. Now, however, the position has been materially changed by what occurred as the result of the former suit, for the trust property having been sold to the City Improvement Trust, the proceeds thereof were available for disposal, but Macleod, J, thought that it was necessary to make an order dealing with that fund, and accordingly directed that it was to be given over to the trustee of the wakfnama, the intended trusts of which had all failed to be held by him as trustee for the resultant cestui que trustent the heirs of the settlor whenever found, and now the plaintiff has come in to make a claim to the trust fund in the hands of the defendant No. 4 under the consent-decree in the suit tried by Mr. Justice Macleod upon the ground that he had had adverse possession of the settled property against all the world. I think it would have been exceedingly difficult for the plaintiff to make good any claim of that kind; but although evidence has been led and a good deal of argument has been spent upon it on both sides, there is really nothing to be argued about; for the learned Counsel for the plaintiff admitted and reiterated over and over again in the course of the concluding argument that he did not even allege adverse possession to the trustee, and he appeared to think that having possession as beneficiary, taking under the trustee, who held the legal estate under such settlement, when the settlement was found to have failed so far as these trusts were intended, that possession of his would in some way, not clearly explained, give him a title against both the trustee and the real cestui que trust when found. If my view of the law be correct, it follows necessarily upon the admission of the plaintiff that he does not allege adverse possession to the trustee, then his whole case upon this issue completely fails.

The legal position is, in my opinion, too clear to admit of doubt or argument. When there is a trust settlement under which a trustee obtains a legal estate to be applied to certain uses and those uses are, after the lapse of many or few years it matters nothing, found to be bad in law, there is a resultant trust back of the whole of the settled property which had formerly been applied to the satisfaction of those uses, to the settlor, his heirs and legal representatives; and it follows from this that the possession of the trustee, which was until the trusts were discovered and declared to be bad for certain supposed cestui que trust, becomes converted into possession for and on behalf of the resultant cestui que trustent. As in this case, the possession of the defendant No. 4 having been found, as the result of the suit tried by Macleod, J., to be not for and on behalf of the plaintiff and other defendants in this suit but only, as soon as that decree was passed, possession for and on behalf of the resultant cestui que trustent, the heirs of the settlor. So that if the plaintiff and the other defendants do not and cannot allege adverse possession to the trustee, it is perfectly clear that no question of adverse possession arises at all in this case. It is hard to conceive of a case indeed in which persons admittedly enjoying the uses of the trusts, which were afterwards declared to be bad and to have failed, could maintain that their enjoyment of such uses, even accompanied as it sometimes is by physical possession of the real estate supplying them, could be adverse to the trustee in whom at law that legal estate is vested. A case of that kind might possibly arise but it must be very rare. Had this case been fought out upon that ground, it might have been necessary to go very deeply into the evidence and search further afield for authorities upon this somewhat difficult point; but once the plaintiff has admitted that he does not even allege adverse possession to the trustee, there was a final end of this case on this issue.

I must, therefore, hold against the plaintiff upon this point, and the effect of that, taken with the other findings already recorded, is that his suit must be dismissed against the defendant No. 4.

Considering the very unusual nature of this litigation, the best order to make as to costs will be to make the same order as Mr. Justice Macleod made that the defendant No. 4 obtain costs out of the estate and the plaintiff bear his own costs.

The defendant No. 6, the Kazi of Bombay, voluntarily offers to pay his own costs.

As between the plaintiff and the other defendants, it is only too clear that they all have been present with a formidable array of Counsel on the odd chance that if the plaintiff succeeded, they might obtain pickings from the estate. The plaintiff was not seeking any relief from them, and there was no need for them to appear until in case of his success against the defendant No. 4, the plaintiff had called them in to complete the administration of the estate. Their interest was virtually the same as that of the plaintiff in several instances, and as I say they were here watching to see what they may make should the plaintiff be successful against the defendant No. 4. Under these circumstances, each should bear his own costs.

The plaintiff preferred an appeal.

On the hearing in appeal, the Administrator-General of Bombay, as representing the estate of Fatehbibi, was added as a party respondent, in pursuance of the Court's order dated the 4th March 1912.

Messrs. Kanga and Mulla, for the Appellant.

Messrs. Bhandarkar and B. J. Walia, for Respondent No. 1.

Messrs. Robertson and Talyarkhan, for Respondent No. 4.

Messrs. Colah and Dastur, for Respondent No. 5.

Messrs. Mirza and Khan, for Respondent No. 6.

Messrs. Chitre and Captain, for Respondents Nos. 7 and 8.

JUDGMENT.—The facts of this case, which it is necessary to state for our decision, are to a great extent set out by Mr. Justice Macleod very concisely in his judgment of the 1st of July in Suit No. 338 of 1906 as follows:—On the 16th June 1851, one Fatehbibi executed a deed in the nature of a wakf whereby she settled two properties: (1) a house in Kazi Street, (2) a Chawl at Duncan Cross Lane in trust for her grand-daughter, Mariambibi, for life and thereafter on her descendants from generation to generation and in default thereof on the settlor's husband's relatives and their descendants from generation to generation in perpetuity and in default with an ultimate trust for the education and instruction of Muhammadan youths. The settlor's husband was appointed first trustee or mutawalli and provision was made in the deed for a due succession of mutawallis. Mariambibi received the rents and profits till she died in 1857. The first mutawalli, the settlor's husband, died in 1854 and his executors acted as mutawallis during the minority of his eldest son, Shaik Ahmed. They continued paying the rents to Mariambibi and, after her death, to Mahomed Hoosein and Aminabibi, the son and daughter of Mariambibi, in equal shares. Shaik Ahmed, on attaining his majority in 1867, took over charge as mutawalli and, in or about 1873, handed over charge of the property to the beneficiaries retaining possession of the trust-deed. In October 1875, Mahomed Hoosein and Aminabibi executed an agreement Exhibit F under which they agreed to divide the rents equally according to the trust-deed. Mahomed Hoosein died in 1892, leaving one son Mahomedally who in his turn shared the rents with Aminabibi until her death in 1901, when he took the whole until he died in 1905 leaving him surviving his mother and two widows, the plaintiffs in the suit of 1906. In 1903, the Improvement Trust were taking proceedings for the acquisition of the Chawl in Duncan Cross Lane and Mahomedally went to the first defendant Mahomed Hoosein, the son of Shaik Ahmed, and the then mutawalli under the trust-deed, to ask his advice and got the deed for the purpose of prosecuting his claim for compensation before the Special Collector. Ultimately, he got the deed on signing Exhibit I, a document recognising the trust-deed, and Mr. Pavri was instructed jointly by Mahomedally and the first defendant to proceed with the claim. The amount of the compensation money was deposited by the Collector with the Tribunal of Appeal appointed by the City of Bombay Improvement Trust Act and remains with the Tribunal invested in Government Paper. The plaintiffs in Suit No. 338 of 1906, at the date of that suit, were in possession of the house in Kazi Street and they asserted that the trust-deed was void and prayed for a declaration that they and the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th and 6th defendants were entitled to the properties and that their respective shares might be ascertained. Mr. Justice Macleod was of opinion that the trust-deed was invalid on the grounds that the ultimate gift for charitable purposes was illusory and the effect and intention of the deed was to create a perpetuity in favour of the settlor's descendants, and he came to the conclusion that the persons entitled to the property would be the heirs of Fatehbibi under the resulting trust of which the mutawalli had been the trustee. He expressed this opinion as to the rights of the heirs of Fatehbibi under the mistaken impression that they were before him as parties to that suit, but he referred it to the Commissioner to ascertain which were the heirs of Fatehbibi. The Commissioner, mistaking the reference, advertised for claims to the property by heirs of Fatehbibi and this advertisement brought in the claims by members of the Haindaday family, who claimed to be heirs of Fatehbibi, and the Commissioner reported that their claim was good. The report was excepted to and the learned Judge then explained that he had not intended that the Commissioner should admit claims by persons who were not parties to the suit and that the result of the Commissioner's report must be that the parties to the suit did not comprise the heirs of Fatehbibi. The result was a deadlock, because Makba was the only person who could show any title at all to the property, and his title was, in the opinion of the Court, only that of a trustee. He was not one of the heirs of Fatehbibi. The Court ordered that the property should be handed over to him as mutawalli.

There was an appeal from that decision, the Haindadays, the claimants before the Commissioner, still not being parties, and before the case had been argued out, a consent-decree was arrived at between Makba on the one hand and the plaintiffs and the other persons, claiming through Mahomedally and Mariambibi on the other, by which it was agreed that the property should be divided in equal shares, subject to the provision of a sum sufficient to produce Rs. 5 a month to protect a certain charity mentioned in the wakfnama in which the Advocate General was interested. That consent decree, however, by no means terminated the proceedings, for it turned out that one of the parties to the appeal was insane; and, he, subsequently, having recovered sanity, filed this suit to set aside the consent-decree claiming also the same relief as had been claimed by the plaintiffs in Suit No. 338 of 1906 and upon the same ground, viz., that Mariambibi was entitled absolutely to the settled properties. His suit was dismissed by Mr. Justice Beaman and he has now appealed.

MAHOMED IBRAHIM v. ABDUL LATIF.

When the case first came up in the Appeal Court, it became apparent that no final decision as to the rights of all possible parties in the property could be arrived at without the representation of the heirs of Fatehbibi. Accordingly, the case was adjourned in order that the heirs of Fatehbibi might be represented provided they could be bound by the proceedings in the suit up to date. Eventually they were brought on the record under cover of the Administrator-General, who took out Letters of Administration to the estate of Fatehbibi, and consents to be bound by all proceedings and submits himself in all respects to the orders of the Court. All the respondents, except Makba, support the plaintiff's claim and no longer desire to take the benefit of the consent-decree. During the proceedings in appeal, they have between themselves attempted to arrange a compromise with the Administrator of Fatehbibi's estate, so that they may secure the property in any event.

Now, it is apparent from the arguments on behalf of the various parties, who have presented their cases to the Court, that no one supports the wakfnama, and all are prepared to accept the findings of Mr. Justice Macleod in Suit No. 338 and Mr. Justice Beaman in the present suit that the wakfnama is void as being an attempt to create a perpetuity in the nature of a family settlement under the guise of a wakfnama. The Advocate General, who represented the valid trusts, if any, was discharged by consent on an undertaking being given that the Rs. 5 per mensem mentioned in clause 14 of the wakfnama would be secured. The plaintiff and the respondents other than Makba and the Administrator of Fatehbibi's estate claim either through Mahomedally, the grandson of Mariambibi, or through Mariambibi, or her daughter Aminabibi, and contend that Mariambibi had in law an absolute estate in the settled property, because she was the first life-tenant according to the terms of the wakfnama, and the life-estate according to the Muhammadan Law being invalid as a gift with a condition, the estate enlarges itself into an absolute estate for the benefit of life-tenant. As an authority for this contention, reference was made to the case of Abdul Gafur v. Nizamudin (1), decided in this High Court and subsequently in the Privy Council, where there are statements to the effect that under the Muhammadan Law, a life-estate is bad and would resolve itself into an absolute estate for the benefit of the donee. It is not certain that this proposition can be sustained in the case of Shaffeis to which sect the parties to this suit belong. There is some authority for the proposition that life estates are recognised among the Shaffeis and the alleged peculiarities of the Shaffei law brought to our notice by Mr. Mirza do not appear to have been considered in the case relied upon in either Court. We are, moreover, of opinion that the facts, which gave rise to the decision in Abdul Gafur v. Nizamudin (1), do not permit us to draw any such conclusion from that case as is contended for by the plaintiff, viz., that Mariambibi's estate must be regarded as an absolute estate. Their Lordships held that 'the intention of the settlor was not to create a series of life rents (a kind of estate which does not appear to be known to Muhammadan Law) but to make the fee devolve from one generation of his descendants to another without its being alienable by them or liable to be taken in execution for their debts.' In the present case, the facts are that those claiming under Mariambibi obtained possession of the property from the Mutawalli, Shaik Ahmed, in the guise of beneficiaries under the trust-deed. They did not obtain the documents of title, because Sheikh Ahmed as mutawalli retained the wakfnama. There are passages in the wakfnama which would justify the trustee in handing over to the successive life-tenants, assuming the validity of the settlement, the possession of the properties, so long as he did not abdicate the position of mutawali which had been assigned to him. If, then, Mahomed Hoosein and Aminabibi, the children of Mariambibi, obtained possession of this property by the consent of the mutawalli on the footing that Mahomed Hoosein was entitled as a life-tenant under the wakfnama, her descendants cannot be permitted to deny that the person from whom the possession was claimed had a title to such possession when it was handed over to Mahomed Hoosein. That is apparent from sections 115 and 116 of the Evidence Act; and if Mahomed Hoosein would be bound by the estoppel so created, all those claiming under or through him would be likewise bound. It is not simply a case of a beneficiary obtaining possession from a bare trustee, for Shaik Ahmed as one of the sons of the first mutawalli, Mahomed Ibrahim, was entitled, under the terms of clause 6 of the wakfnama, to a contingent beneficial remainder on failure of the limitations expressed for the descendants of Mariambibi, and we cannot hold that Shaik Ahmed handed over possession of these properties to Mahomed Hoosein except on the footing that the wakfnama was a valid document. Reliance was placed by the appellant's Counsel on the judgment of Buckley, J. in In re Anderson; Pegler v. Gilliatt (2), in which that learned Judge defined the limits of the rule laid down in Board v. Board (3), but in none of the cases cited in his judgment were the facts such as to raise an estoppel by conduct such as we have in the present case. On the death of Mahomedally, which occurred in 1905, the limitations in favour of the descendants of Mariambibi came to an end and the remainder for the benefit of the descendants of Mahomed Ibrahim took effect, if, for the purposes of this suit as between the parties other than the Administrator of Fatehbibi's estate, the wakfnama must be considered to be a valid document. Owing to the estoppel to which I have referred, we think the wakfnama must be treated as valid between those parties. Therefore, as against the appellant and the other original respondents, Makba is entitled to the property under the terms of the wakfnama both as trustee and as beneficiary. He was actually in possession of the property at the time when this suit was instituted by the plaintiff.

The only question remaining is as between Makba and the Administrator of Fatehbibi's estate. The Administrator of Fatehbibi can only claim under a resulting trust in favour of the settlor by reason of the invalidity of the trusts declared in the wakfnama. Such a trust would not be valid as a trust in the strict sense in which that word is used in the Indian Trusts Act nor would it be valid under the Statute of Frauds, because it has not been declared in writing, but it would be a quasi trust of the kind described in Chap. IX, section 84, of the Trusts Act. I do not refer to the Trusts Act as being applicable to the case because the resulting trust, if it arose at all, commenced long before 1891, when the Trusts Act came into force, but the reference helps to point the distinction between declared or specific trusts and trusts arising by operation of law.

Now, a person claiming under a resulting trust may be barred by limitation unless the resulting trust is of such a kind as to fall within the scope of section 10 of the Limitation Act. That section provides that "notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, no suit against a person in whom property has become vested in trust for any specific purpose, or against his legal representatives or assigns (not being assigns for valuable consideration), for the purpose of following in his or their hands such property, shall be barred by any length of time." The decision of the Calcutta High Court in the case of Kherodemoney Dossee v. Doorgamoney Dossee (4) is to the effect that a resulting trust in favour of the heiress of a testator, upon failure through invalidity of one of the trusts declared in the Will, is not a trust for a specific purpose within the meaning of section 10 of the Limitation Act. The argument of the appellant in this case is that if you have a trustee, who is created a trustee under a document vesting the property in him and that document contains a scintilla of valid trust though the greater part is invalid, the trustee is a trustee for a specific purpose with regard to all the property, the subject-matter of the transfer. This is substantially the same argument as was advanced by Mr. Phillips in Kherodemoney's case (4) and advanced unsuccessfully. Kherodemoney's case (4) was considered by this Court in Vundravandas v. Oursondas (5). Sir Charles Farran, there, explained how it is that a resulting trust cannot, except in one case which he mentions [which arose in Salter v. Cavanagh (6)], fall within the scope of section 10, and he stated that his decision upon the point was supported by the case of Kherodemoney Dossee v. Doorgamoney Dossee (4) and could not be substantially distinguished from it. In Churcher v. Martin (7), Mr. Justice Kekewich, discussing the question before him upon the assumption that those in possession were trustees in the proper and full sense of the term, said: "How can the possession of trustees enure to the benefit of him whose title was intended to be defeated by the deed which created the trust? How can the grantor be their cestui que trust? Because, it is urged, there is an express trust in his favour, an express trust necessarily resulting from the failure of the trusts declared. It would suffice to reply that such a resulting trust is implied by law, and that, whatever else it may be, it is not an express trust; but as Salter v. Cavanagh (6) was referred to, I may point out that the trust there spoken of as 'express' was one inferred from the deed, discoverable on the face of it, and not, as here, a trust against the deed, and due only to the fact that the deed is void." According to the English authorities, an express trust is a trust for an express purpose. According to almost all Indian authorities, a trust for a specific purpose is a trust for a specified purpose. Reference has, however, been made, on behalf of the appellant, to a judgment of Mr. Justice Beaman in the case of Casamally Jairajbhoy v. Sir Currimbhoy Ebrahim (8), in which that learned Judge states his opinion that for the purpose of limitation, there is no distinction to be drawn between resulting trusts and trusts for specific purposes, and that the only case in which limitation can run in favour of a trustee, whether by express words or by operation of law, is where he is in as a trespasser and not as a valid transferee. We dissent from that view of the law. We do not agree with the learned Judge that there is any indication in the judgment of the Privy Council in Runchordas Vundravandas v. Parvatibai (9), that their Lordships dissented from the decision of the Bombay High Court in Vundravandas v. Cursondas (5) as to the limited scope of section 10 of the Limitation Act. Had they considered that section 10 could be successfully invoked by the plaintiff, their decision, based upon the application of Articles of the Limitation Act relating to the period of adverse possession which, ex hypothesi, would not apply, is incomprehensible. Again the remarks of the Privy Council in Balwant Rao v. Puran Mal Chaube (10) show, [as pointed out by Candy, J. in Cowasji Nowroji Pochkhanawalla v. Rustomji Dossabhoy Setna (11)], "that the expression used by the Legislature 'for the purposes of following in his hands such property' means for the purpose of recovering the property for the trusts in question, i. e., for the purpose for which the property was specifically vested in the trustee. Whether in the case of a resulting trust, the trust is 'express' or not, the purpose for which the property is sought to be recovered is certainly not 'specific' within the meaning of section 10, where the purpose is directly contrary to the terms of the settlement which purported to create the trust."

The result is, that, in our opinion, the claims of Fatehbibi's heirs under a resulting trust have long been barred by the law of limitation and the respondent Makba, who at the date of the suit was in possession of the trust property, can successfully defend his possession against those heirs.

We dismiss the appeal with costs, that is to say, the appellant must pay the costs of the respondent Makba; all other parties must bear their own costs. The decree should recite the joinder of the Administrator of Fatehbibi's estate and declare the decision that the claim of her heirs is barred.

Appeal dismissed.

TRIPURARI PAL v. JAGAT TARINI DASI.

PRIVY COUNCIL.

APPEAL FROM THE HIGH COURT AT CALCUTTA.

October 31, 1912.

Present:—Lord Macnaghten, Lord Moulton, Sir John Edge and Mr. Ameer Ali.

TRIPURARI PAL AND ANOTHER—APPELLANTS

JAGAT TARINI DASI AND OTHERS—RESPONDENTS.

Will—Construction—Shebaitship, grant of.

Where a Hindu made a Will appointing his minor son shebait, and his widow as guardian of the minor son, and, in the event of his death without obtaining majority, herself as shebait:

Held, that the gift of shebaitship to the son was absolute and the right of the widow to act as shebait was extinguished on the son attaining the majority and taking over the temple, and could not be revived on the subsequent death of the son.

Appeal heard ex parte from a judgment and decree of the High Court at Calcutta, dated August 19th, 1907, reversing a judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge of Nadia, dated September 20th, 1905.

FACTS.—One Shib Chandra Pal died in 1884, leaving a widow, Brajomati Dasi, a son, Mukunda Murari Pal, two daughters, the defendants-respondents, Jagat Tarini Dasi and Nistarini Dasi and an adopted son. He made a Will of which the material part is as follows:

"My present begotten son, Makunda Murari, will be shebait for the performance of those ceremonies. If during the minority of the said Mukunda Murari Pal, I die, then my second wife, Brajomati Dasi, who gave birth to Mukunda Murari, will be shebait as his guardian, during the time of the said Mukunda's minority, and Mukunda, on attaining majority, will personally conduct the work of the sheba. God forbid, if during my lifetime or after my death, the said Mukunda dies, then the said Brajomati will be shebait and after her death my daughters Jagat Tarini Dasi and Nistarini Dasi."

The said Mukunda came of age and took over the shebaitship of the temple in question. On his death, the question was as to who was entitled to the shebaitship, Brajomati or the minor son of the said deceased Mukunda. The Subordinate Judge decided in favour of the minor son, the present appellant; but the High Court reversed the judgment of the lower Court and held in favour of the Brajomati and on her death, in favour of the aforesaid daughters of the testator,

HAJI AHMED v. ESSANJI TAJBHOY.

Mr. Dunne, on behalf of the Appellant, the minor son of Mukunda Murari, contended that upon the true construction of the Will, the title to the shebaitship and the debutter properties passed to the appellant on the death of his father. Norendro Nath Sircar v. Kamalbasini Dasi (1); Wills Act, section 111, referred to.

JUDGMENT.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—Their Lordships are of opinion that in this case, the decision of the High Court cannot be supported. There is, in their Lordships' view, an absolute gift of the shebaitship to the son, Mukunda Murari, on his attaining 21, and it is not cut down, as far as they can see, by anything that follows. There are provisions in the case of his death as a minor, but no provision cutting down the absolute gift to him. The words are: "My present begotten son Mukunda Murari will be shebait for the performance of those ceremonies."

Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal ought to be allowed, and the judgment of the Subordinate Judge restored.

There will be no order as to the costs incurred in the High Court, except that any costs paid under the order appealed from must be returned, and there will be no costs of this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

BOMBAY HIGH COURT.

ORIGINAL CIVIL SUIT NO. 917 OF 1910.

July 19, 1912.

Present:—Sir Dinshaw D. Davar, KT., Judge,

HAJI AHMED HAJI HASSAM—PLAINTIFF

versus

ESSAJI TAJBHOY—DEFENDANT.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Sch. II, cl. 15 (a)—Arbitration—Award—Misconduct—Award when to be set aside—Reference to arbitration on the basis of exclusion of certain evidence—Umpire admitting this evidence.

An arbitrator or an umpire is the chosen Judge of the parties; his decision is final and the Court has no power to touch that decision or interfere with it merely on the ground that it is not correct or that it is the result of bias.

HAJI AHMED v. ESSANJI TAJBHOY.

It is because the award of an arbitrator or an umpire is final and the party against whom it is made is debarred from appealing to any Court of law, however unjust the award may be, that Courts have been most anxious to see that nothing unfair or irregular is done by the arbitrator or umpire while discharging his duties as such. The Courts have always been most alert to interfere and set aside any award in which it appears that the arbitrator or umpire has not acted with scrupulous fairness towards both parties.

In cases of reference to arbitration through the Court, the Courts have always exercised a most vigilant supervision over the conduct of the arbitrator to whom at the request of the parties it delegates the duty of deciding disputes between the parties and any irregularity or action, which is not consonant with the general principles of equity and good conscience which ought to govern the conduct of an arbitrator, is resented by immediately brushing aside the award of the arbitrator against whose decision there is no appeal.

A reference to arbitration was made through the Court on the basis and footing that an alleged adjustment was not to be taken into consideration by the arbitrators or the umpire, who were explicitly and imperatively directed by the Court not to take the said adjustment into consideration. In spite of this direction, the umpire admitted, at the request of one of the parties and in face of a protest from the other, the adjustment in evidence and used it as evidence against the latter in deciding an important question of onus of proof :

Held, that the admission of the adjustment, being an obvious breach of the direction of the Court contained in the reference order and a grave error of judgment which prejudiced the case, was a clear case of "misconduct in law" on the part of the umpire.

Mr. Bahadurji, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Setalvad, for the Defendant.

JUDGMENT.—This suit was filed on the 11th of October 1910 as a Short Cause. The plaintiff is the mortgagee of several immoveable properties belonging to the defendant and he seeks to recover in this suit Rs. 5,69,166-8 9 with further interest from the 6th of October 1910. In his plaint, the plaintiff relies on an alleged adjustment of account, which he says took place on the 31st of August 1910, whereby a sum of Rs. 5,71,770-2 0 was found to be due by the defendant to the plaintiff. The defendant has put in a long written statement whereby he disputes the genuineness of the accounts of the plaintiff and states that the adjustment was obtained from him by false and fraudulent representations and is not binding on him and counter-claims that the plaintiff may be ordered to reconvey the mortgaged properties to him on payment of what may be found due to the plaintiff on proper accounts being taken by and under the directions of this Court. To his written statement, he annexes a formidable list of what he calls "particulars of false and fraudulent items in the plaintiff's books."

It was at first arranged between the parties that the matter should be referred to the arbitration of Mr. Lowndes but that arrangement having fallen through, on the 16th of March 1911, the parties obtained a Consent Order from the Court whereby all matters in dispute in the suit were referred to the arbitration of two Parsee gentlemen with a proviso that in case the arbitrators did not agree upon their award, the matters in dispute between the parties should stand referred to Mr. Kaikhushro Framji Modi as umpire. The arbitrators appointed by the order were unable to agree and the matters in dispute were referred to Mr. Modi as umpire.

The first meeting was held by the umpire on the 8th of September 1911 and the investigation of the accounts continued before him till the middle of March last when there was a serious split between the respective parties and Mr. Dinsha Jijibhoy, who represented the defendant before the umpire, retired from the reference alleging that gross breach of faith was committed on the plaintiff's part and that the umpire had acted in direct contravention of the order of the Court and intimated that his client was no longer willing to proceed with the reference and revoked the umpire's authority in the matter. The umpire, however, proceeded ex parte and on the 28th of March, six days after the defendant's attorney retired, made and published his award whereby he adjudged that Rs. 7,05,639 were due by the defendant on the 25th of March 1912 and he awarded that sum to the plaintiff with further interest at 9 per cent. per annum and directed that the defendant should pay the plaintiff's costs of the suit and of the reference before the arbitrators and umpire including the fees paid both to the arbitrators and the umpire.

On the 6th of April 1912, the defendant's attorneys gave notice that they would move that the award made by Mr. Modi, the umpire, may be set aside, that the arbitration may also be set aside and that the Court should proceed with the hearing of the suit. This notice of motion was partly argued before me on the 11th and 12th of April last and then stood over for further argument till after the summer vacation. The notice has now been fully argued before me after I had an opportunity of going through all the affidavits filed on the motion together with other papers in the suit and reference and the proceedings that have taken place before the umpire.

The main question in the suit is whether the umpire can be said to have so acted in the reference before him as to justify the Court in coming to a conclusion that his action amounts to what is known in law as "misconduct" and whether under the circumstances that have happened, this Court ought to set aside the award made by the umpire. After a very careful perusal of the affidavits of Messrs. Dinsha Jijibhoy and N. H. Moos, the respective attorneys of the parties, and the correspondence which has subsequently taken place, it is quite clear to me that the order of reference was obtained after due deliberation and much discussion between the said attorneys. The main consideration, I find, which induced the defendant to agree to refer matters to arbitration was the plaintiff's consent to abandon his contention as to the adjustment of the 31st of August 1910. The order specifically provides as follows:—

"And it is further ordered by and with such consent that the said arbitrators do proceed on the basis of there having been no adjustments and the adjustments relied upon by the plaintiff in this suit shall not be taken into consideration by them". It is further provided by the order that in the event of reference falling through for any reason whatever, the plaintiff would be entitled to rely on the adjustments in the plaint referred to.

The accounts between the plaintiff and the defendant which the umpire had to take are very long and extremely complicated. To the accounts filed by the plaintiff, the defendant filed numerous objections and surcharges. During the protracted hearings before the umpire commencing from the 8th of September 1911, I find that up to the middle of March 1912, the umpire was able to settle only three disputes. One was with reference to an item of Rs. 5,000, another was with reference to an item of Rs. 10-6-0 and the third was as to whether interest to be allowed to the plaintiff should be at the rate of 6 or 9 per cent. This last question was settled after prolonged hearings by the oath of the plaintiff and it got rid of about twenty-six objections but other objections remained to be dealt with. A formidable list of sur charges had to be considered and decided and long and complicated steamer-accounts had remained untouched. The split commenced when an objection as to Rs. 1,300 came to be considered. I do not think it is necessary to set out in detail the contentions of both parties as to this item of Rs. 1,300. As to what happened when this objection was taken in hand by the umpire, Mr. Dinsha Jijibhoy in his affidavit has given a very clear and explicit account. Although Mr. Moos has made two affidavits, he has not specifically denied the accuracy of Mr. Dinsha's version and I must accept this as the correct version. He says, in paragraph 4 of his affidavit affirmed on the 1st of April, this:—

"I this deponent further say that on objection 35 being reached in the proceedings before the umpire and my stating to him the facts relating to that objection, the umpire read the entry in the plaintiff's book relating to the acceptance by the plaintiff of the transfer of Rs. 4,800.*After doing so, the umpire told Mr. Moos that from that entry, it clearly appeared that the plaintiff had accepted the transfer and, that, therefore, if the plaintiff now wanted to hold the defendant liable for Rs. 1,300 which sum he, the plaintiff, had given up out of the said sum of Rs. 4,800, he, the umpire, was of opinion that the burden of proving that the defendant was liable lay upon him, the plaintiff. Thereupon Mr. Moos said that that would mean his calling the plaintiff into the witness box and that he would rather submit to that objection than put his client into the witness-box. The meeting was then adjourned and at the next meeting, both Mr. Moos and Mr. F. E. Dinsha appeared on behalf of the plaintiff and tendered in evidence the said writing of adjustment dated 31st of August 1910. I very strongly objected to the admission of the said writing of adjustment pointing out, as was the fact, that the plaintiff's attorneys in tendering the said document in evidence were, to their own knowledge, acting in direct violation of the specific arrangement aforesaid which was embodied in the said Consent Order of reference and that the said arrangement was the basis and a fundamental term on the footing and faith of which alone I had agreed on behalf of the defendant to the said arbitration".

After hearing and noting the contentions of the Solicitors, the umpire decided in favour of admitting the adjustment in evidence and he makes the following note:—"I admit this account purely as a statement of account acknowledged to have been signed by the defendant". And he marked the adjustment as Exhibit A18. From the further notes made by himself, it appears that the moment this adjustment was put in and marked as an exhibit, Mr. Moos relied upon it as a clear admission by the defendant and argued that the onus has now shifted and lay on the defendant to prove that he was not liable to be debited with this Rs. 1,300. Evidently what was taking place so dazed the defendant's attorney that he is not shown in the arbitration proceedings to have said anything against Mr. Moos's contention and the arbitrator records his decision that the onus of proving that he was not liable for this sum was on the defendant. On the following day, the defendant's attorney appeared and pointed out very clearly and forcibly the injustice and hardship of the action of the umpire and suggested that as a special case the question should be submitted for the opinion of the Court. Mr. Moos's only answer was that he had no notice of this application. The umpire referred the defendant's Solicitor to the Court and postponed consideration of that particular item only, for a week within which he directed Mr. Dinsha to make any application he liked to the Court. The umpire proposed to proceed with the reference without waiting to see if the defendant did make any application and if he did to see what was the result of such application. When Mr. Dinsha Jijibhoy found that the umpire proposed to go on with the reference, with the adjustment Exhibit A-18 before him, he decided to withdraw from the reference and gave notice of such withdrawal.

It is now for me to consider whether the action of the umpire in admitting Exhibit A-18 as evidence before him is such as to amount to what is in law called "misconduct", and such as would justify an interference of the Court. This application has been the subject of much anxious consideration. The umpire is an officer of this Court who occupies a high position and has, for many years, been doing very important and responsible work in this Court. I have been all along most anxious not to do anything that would in any way cast the smallest reflection on his ability or his capacity to deal with questions that come up before him for adjudication. I am glad to say that throughout the prolonged discussion of this matter before me, no reflections are cast and no allegations made of any kind affecting the strict probity of the umpire. All that is alleged against him is that he has committed a grave error of judgment and has shown a very strong bias in favour of the plaintiff and against the defendant. Mr. Setalwad has pointed out various circumstances in connection with the umpire's judgment with reference to the sum of Rs. 5,000 in justification of his imputation of bias against the umpire. I refuse to go into this question. The umpire was the chosen Judge of the parties. His decision is final and the Court has no right whatever to touch that decision or interfere with it merely on the ground that it is not correct or that it is the result of bias. I have no doubt whatever that when the umpire came to the decision adverse to the defendant, he did so on convictions forced on his mind by the evidence before him and it is not for this Court to express any opinion as to the correctness or otherwise of such a decision and, therefore, I have given no thought whatever to the arguments addressed to me on the item in question.

The admission, however, of the adjustment as an Exhibit in the case is a matter of very grave importance and requires very careful consideration. It must be remembered that that document, the adjustment of the 31st of August 1910, is a powerful piece of evidence against the defendant. If that stands and is established against him, all his contentions with reference to the plaintiff's accounts go by the board and it would be held that he was liable to pay Rs. 5,65,711 with further interest on the date of the adjustment. If the suit had gone to a hearing before the Court, the defendant would have found it necessary to establish the allegations of fraud, misrepresentation, etc., which he sets up in his written statement before he would be allowed to go behind that adjustment. His legal advisers seem to have realised the difficulties of his position and appreciated to very great gain to the defendant if this adjustment could be got rid of by some means. Mr. Dinsha Jijibhoy has stated that on behalf of his client he agreed to the reference to arbitration because thereby he got rid of the adjustment and he swears that "the basis and a fundamental term on the footing and faith of which alone" he agreed to go to arbitration was that the arbitrators were not to take into consideration this adjustment. The directions to the arbitrators in the order itself are clear, explicit and imperative. They are directed to proceed on the basis of there having been no adjustment and they are told that such adjustment shall not be taken into consideration by them. These directions contained in the Consent Order of reference are as binding on the umpire as they were on the arbitrators. In spite of this explicit order, in breach of clear understanding between the Solicitors, in the face of the strenuous opposition by the defendant's Solicitor, the plaintiff's Solicitor, Mr. Moos, not only tendered this document, which it had been agreed should be excluded from the arbitrators' consideration, but insisted on having the same recorded as an exhibit in the proceedings and unfortunately succeeded. I feel almost certain that if the umpire, instead of acting on the spur of the moment, had taken time to consider his decision, as he seems to have done on many other points of far smaller importance, he would have realised that the opposition to the admissibility of the adjustment was sound and would have decided accordingly. It was argued before me that the defendant's Solicitor himself had got this document marked for identification at an earlier stage of the reference before the umpire. I have read notes of proceedings when this document was marked for identification. It was merely called for as one of various other documents which the defendant alleged he had been induced to sign. It was never intended to be used as evidence in the case by the defendant. Here, however, not only has it been admitted in evidence but used against the defendant in deciding an important question of the onus of proof. In the face of the Havala entry in the plaintiff's own book, the onus of proving the defendant's liability to the plaintiff for this Rs. 1,300 lay clearly and heavily on the plaintiff. That was the opinion of the umpire. The meeting of the 16th of March stood over on that understanding. At the next meeting of the 18th of March, the umpire was engaged in considering the question of initialling the books of the plaintiff. At the meeting of the following day, the 19th of March, Mr. Moos re-opens the question of the onus, tenders the adjustment and advances certain plausible but fallacious arguments in support of his application to get this document in. The umpire admits the adjustment, marks it as an exhibit but at the same time attempts to make some sort of distinction. He says:—"I admit this account purely as a statement of account acknowledged to have been signed by the defendant." It is quite clear from this, that the umpire had before his mind the fact that he was implicitly directed not to look at the adjustment He, therefore, tries to make a distinction between an adjustment of account and a statement of account acknowledged to be signed by the defendant. I confess I fail to see the distinction. As soon as it is put in, it is made use of for the purpose of shifting the onus. What is then the position of the defendant? He must establish his allegations of fraud and misrepresentation before he can get rid of the effect of the admission said to be contained in that adjustment. If this merely affected one item of Rs. 1,300, it might have been said to be a matter of small importance, but once this document is before the umpire, it is quite clear that it would affect a great many very large and very important items; and while it would, in some cases, be used for shifting the onus from the plaintiff to the defendant, in many other matters, it would be used as it was used as admissions on the part of the defendant. When this matter was argued before me by the Advocate-General on behalf of the plaintiff, he stated that when the document was admitted, the umpire had decided most of the important matters in dispute between the parties and that very little remained to be done. He asked me to take a note of the offer he made on the 12th of April and accordingly I took the following note:—

"The Advocate-General offers to have Exhibit A-18 struck off from the proceedings and all matters decided after the admission of Exhibit A-18 be set aside and be re-considered by the umpire, if the defendant will consent to have the award remitted to him,

This offer to be without prejudice to all his contentions."
